Let us see. We hear before the law is passed of Mr. Hoover's printed regulations, officially signed, "Herbert C. Hoover, United States food administrator," and sent to the dining-car companies as their instructions how to feed the American people. Oh, for such modesty as this let every maiden pray. So shall her blushes be a certificate to all the world of sweet virginity.

Food administration rules suggested for dining cars.

I thought somehow, somewhere, the poor consumer was to have his day. He was to get a little more for the same money or the same amount for a little less money, but behold:

1. All wheat bread and butter portions are to consist of not more than two medium-sized slices of bread or toast and one pad of butter, and a charge should be made for them. A charge should also be made for all crackers and biscuits. Charge for each extra pad of butter.

Behold now the wayfarer, the old farmer, for instance, who is traveling across the continent and has to go into a dining car and get a meal, and who picks up their dining-car card and finds thereon in good bold type such prices as these:

Celery, 35 cents.
Two scrambled eggs, 35 cents.
Corned beef and cabbage, 60 cents.
Baked beans, 35 cents.
Ham, 25 cents.

"Lettuce," a barrel of which in the market to-day brings about $1, I think, or it may be less, "35 cents."

Behold this old farmer now, who thinks he is going to get out cheap, who orders a cup of coffee, for which he pays 15 cents, and orders bread and butter, but Mr. Hoover's hand has been laid upon the menu and he only gets two thin slices of bread and butter, and accordingly in the interest of economy he has to order something else.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; for an inquiry. I am seeking after knowledge now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know where Mr. Hoover has been for the last eight years, but if he has been on a Pullman dining car in any part of the United States where I have been, and I have been from coast to coast, they have been charging already for bread and butter in the last eight years.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; but sometimes they give you more than two slices. Against that enormity Mr. Hoover loudly protests.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no discussion of that kind to offer. The only place I ever saw where a man got more than he was entitled to was the big potato on the Northern Pacific Road. There he got a very liberal potato portion.

Mr. REED. It so happens that to-day the consumer traveling upon one of these dining cars may be able to stealthily reach out and get hold of a cracker that is still allowed to remain as a sort of fugitive flotsam on the modern dining table, but Mr. Hoover warns, "Take away the crackers; do not let these people have crackers"; and likewise, sir, if your physical body cries out for fats and you prefer your fats in the shape of butter instead of in grease, ladled out to you in a spoon by a food administrator, you are prohibited from having an extra pad of butter, as he expresses it, unless you produce the coin of the realm. Oh, wise, wise Hoover!

No. 2. Serve no wheat bread, crackers, or wheat cakes for lunch or breakfast.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator was reading the price of commodities on a dining car. Was that fixed by Mr. Hoover?

Mr. REED. Oh, no; Hoover takes these fixed prices that are here and advises that you shall cut down the portion, and advises that he wants more money, because he says if a man wants any bread make him pay for it, if he wants any crackers be sure and collect for it. If he wants an extra pad of butter demand that he shall produce the coin.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understood the Senator to say that the prices were fixed by Mr. Hoover.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I think they are more moderate, perhaps, than we will be permitted to have. I continue to read:

No. 2. Serve no wheat bread, crackers, or wheat cakes for lunch or breakfast. Use instead corn bread (baked thin).

O, stepmothers! I have always been led to believe that your virtues were in direct proportion to the thickness of the bread you served, but Hoover comes and says give it to them thin. It may taste better thin, but in these days of grim starvation and of awful want I prefer mine thick.

Use instead corn bread (baked thin), corn muffins, corn cakes, fried mush, rye bread, oatmeal, oat cakes, buckwheat cakes, rice cakes. Serve honey and sirups with cereal stuffs whenever possible as substitutes for cream and sugar.

Now just imagine a man in the morning coming in with his stomach slightly disorganized for reasons, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] suggests out of the abundance of his experience, too delicate to mention; imagine that man coming in and ordering a dish of oatmeal, fondly expecting to have oatmeal and cream, a dish that he has been taught contained all the virtues and dietary incidents that have ever been conceived, and having a colored waiter plump it down in front of him with a can of strained honey and be told to mix and eat the nauseous and disgusting sweet mess of stuff.

But now I come to a bit of wisdom compared with which old Aristotle's brightest dream or most profound thought becomes contemptible. It is the very quintessence of economy. It beats the individual who got his horse down by gradual processes to one straw a day and then found to his disgust that the animal insisted on dying. Moreover, it strikes at the Yankee in a way that ought really to delight the hearts of all those Southerners who still retain some measure of sectional feeling.

No. 3. Make tarts instead of pie, leaving off bottom or top crust.

Each time and place, somewhere, somehow, Hoover manages to reduce the portion. Think of the infinite cruelty of one who would deprive a Yankee of his pie at breakfast and substitute for that a tart devoid either of its top or bottom crust! It makes no difference to Hoover whether it is the top or bottom crust so that somewhere you lose some portion of the crust.

There are some things in this that are not so senseless, but they are things that, lying on the surface, every child knows. Here is one against which I protest:

Use no butter in cooking. Fry foods in animal fats or vegetable oils.

So far as I am concerned, I decline to eat cottonseed oil or to cook my beans or potatoes with any of John D. Rockefeller's extractions.

Notice this, for always he is after your cream:

Serve cream in individual portions only, with special charge.

And now, all you who have been accustomed to going into a dining car and ordering just one portion, because it was a generous one, and eating that one portion and making a meal of it, harken to the warning that I give, for thus saith not the Lord, but Hoover:

Avoid waste by serving smaller portions, particularly of bread, butter, meats, milk, creams, sweets.

HERBERT C. HOOVER,
United States Food Administrator.

Was there ever a man who came into an office so long before the office was created? Was there ever one so forehanded as this gentleman, so quick to grasp opportunity that he doth outrun the fact and reach the hands of anticipation into the future and grasp the thing that yet is uncreated?

And so he advises us, among other things, to eat vegetables. I have been looking up a vegetable dinner for an ordinary hungry man on a dining car, the portions of which are to be generously reduced—buttered beets, 25 cents; string beans, 25 cents; baked beans, 35 cents; and creamed potatoes, 25 cents. If there was an ordinary Massachusetts gentleman on that train and he wanted buttered beets and two varieties of beans, it would cost him 85 cents. When he got through with his bread and butter, with reduced portions, he would be out about $1.25, to say nothing of tipping the waiter. All of this is to the point that the man is talking about something of which he knows nothing.

A brief chapter in demonstration of that I now take leave to submit:

The woman citizen—be a Hoover helper—

Notice the beautiful rhythm; how nicely those words chime and gink together—

Hang these rules on your kitchen hook.
Save the wheat.
One wheatless meal a day.
Use corn, oat meal, rye, or barley bread, and nonwheat breakfast food.
Notice: Order bread 24 hours in advance, so your baker will not bake beyond his needs.

Where in all this world did Hoover get the notion that the American citizen went to the bakery in the morning and bought his bread from a baker. If he had sojourned in America for three hours at a time, outside of the most palatial hotel he could find, he would learn that the American housewife who does not bake her own bread or have it baked in her house goes to the nearest grocery store, buys a loaf of bread from the grocer, and never sees the baker. She only knows that Corby is on earth because she sees the sign "Use Corby's mother's hot bread" on the wagon as the wagon drives along the street. Imagine the American citizen obliged to go out each morning and serve notice upon the baker that he is going to want a loaf of bread next day! Only the man who has lived outside of America so long that he has forgotten all about American habits could ever have perpetrated a thing like that.

Now, O you ignorant women who have kept house, you silly mothers of children, you grandmothers who have reared men to the proud years of maturity and then seen their children cling about your feet, let me give you a little advice from Sir Herbert Hoover and tell you something that you never knew before! I read:

Cut the loaf on the table only as required.

How have we gotten along all of these years without that knowledge? How does it occur that in the flight of time and the mutations of life the human race has blundered on and on without some Hoover to tell them to cut their bread on the table and only as required? Then he adds:

Use stale bread for cooking toast.

And so forth. What poor imbecile in all this world, who has ever been inside of a kitchen to kiss the cook or beg the cook for something to eat, who has not known that you do not make toast out of freshly baked bread? But Hoover brings it to us as a new discovery.

Here is another gem that scintillates like some bright diamond thrown among the dross of this vain world:

Use buttermilk and sour milk for cooking.

As long ago as woods first began to grow and waters learned the habit of running downhill the half-naked people who dwelt amidst the rocks knew that you used sour milk, and not sweet milk, with which to make bread; but Hoover comes along and gives to it the holy sanction of his great approval, and now all the old ladies who have been using sour milk with which to make bread and biscuit will feel content and happy that their labors are approved by this great man.

As a Democrat, and recollecting the ancient slander of my party, I rise to protest against this.

Soap contains fat. Do not waste it.

Here we come to the final chapter in this bit of wisdom and warning, that I confess the American people well did need, and but for it we might have gorged ourselves to death. For this one thing Hoover should live through all the ages; he should have a monument on which the figure of old Æsculapius should be put beneath his, for a greater has come.

Do not eat a fourth meal.

Do not eat a fourth meal in America! In some of the strange lands where Hoover has dwelt there may be people who have eaten a fourth meal as a regular thing. Perhaps the head-hunters that he commanded, having acquired an appetite, when luck is good may have eaten a fourth meal; it may be that in "merrie England" there are people who eat a fourth meal; but in this country the average American citizen is happy if he can get three squares a day, while about two-thirds of my lady acquaintances insist that they only eat one meal a day, on account of the new fad called "reduction."

Do not eat a fourth meal.

Is it possible that Mr. Hoover has become so accustomed to the after-theater supper or the cabaret that he thinks all Americans now indulge in them?

You need not give that advice to the East Side in New York; you did not need to give it to the hungry mother of the hungry children when Hoover was cornering the bean market, throwing 1,000 tons into the market to break it, and then buying them back and running the price up, and then throwing them into the market again to break it. You did not need to tell that mother not to eat four meals a day.

What does this tell? Why do I spend this much of the Senate's time in talking about these things that are so small and so contemptible? Because they tell the sum of this man's competency; his lack of knowledge of the commonest affairs of American life.

It seems to me a man who had a grasp of the food situation, who posed as an expert, instead of talking about saving a crust of pie or substituting tarts for pumpkin or apple desert, would be talking about building vast warehouses to store the potato crop, which is so large that it may go to waste; that he would be thinking about millions of bushels of food that could be saved by being stored carefully away; that he would be thinking in big figures of big things; but that he would not be indulging in such drivel as "avoid a fourth meal" in a land where a fourth meal is never eaten, except as a rare exception.

Then, lest the American people should take him too seriously, and in starving themselves also starve their children, he adds:

Do not limit the plain food of growing children.

Then—

Watch out for waste in your community.

By which I presume each one is to become an inspector of the garbage can of his neighbor.

Mr. President, the substitute that I have offered for the second section of the bill proposes that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be the chairman of a committee of five. I have not always agreed with the Secretary of Agriculture; but he has given many years of his life to the study of agriculture from the big, broad, scientific standpoint; he is in touch with the agricultural situation of the United States of America; he has beneath him now a trained corps of assistants numbering far into the hundreds, I believe, who are scattered all over the United States, who are in touch with communities, with local conditions, with crop conditions generally in the United States, with the problems of consumption and of production, experts who have studied markets, means of transportation, improvement of varieties of seeds, and all that class of machinery which we have been creating here for a score or more of years. It exists; it is at hand.

I propose that we shall create a commission, and at its head shall put the Secretary of Agriculture, and that we shall trust him, as the chairman, with all the vast machinery of his office, to look after this important work. I propose in this substitute that there shall be one practical farmer—one American farmer—and I propose that there shall be the presidents of two agricultural colleges, selected from somewhere in the great wheat belt—all of these to be approved by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

I think the presidents of these agricultural colleges are the best men we can call to this work. They are in touch with the great problem of production; they are as nearly scientists in this matter as we can hope to get, and if the two presidents are selected from the chief colleges of the principal wheat States we will have upon this commission men whose names are known wherever the agricultural expert is known, great men and learned men.

Then, Mr. President, I propose finally that these men shall be qualified electors of the United States, men who live here and vote here, men whose fortunes are here and whose future is here, men whose hearts are bound to our soil and whose souls mingle with the souls of our people, men who love America and who have no interest save in beloved America, men who believe this country is good enough to live in, good enough to make their fortunes in, good enough to die in, and whose palaces, if any they have, are erected on American soil beneath the American flag. I do most earnestly beseech you all that we shall not put the great powers of this bill, which controls the destiny of the farmer and may ruin him, which controls the destiny of the consumer and may greatly injure him, in the hands of any one man. Rather, if these powers must be concentered, if they must be given, let us grant them to a commission composed of men as good and as faithful as we can select.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] the other day seemed to intimate in the course of his speech that it was only when California was concerned that I was moved to take part in the debate.

I have listened to the philippic against my esteemed countryman, Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, delivered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and I can not see, after listening for several hours, that in any way has his personal integrity been impugned, his capacity impeached, or his ability to serve his country in this crisis in any way discredited. If he were not a man who had attracted the attention of the world, he would not be the subject of discussion in this Chamber. If he were not a man who had already demonstrated his fitness, his name, which is not before us in any official way, would not be considered in a long and serious argument. The Senator from Missouri seeks more to criticize the methods proclaimed by Mr. Hoover, growing out of his long experience abroad, than to inform us positively why in this emergency, if he should be selected, he would not be the most admirable and capable man of whom the world to-day has knowledge for this special task.

I know the Senator from Missouri has been accustomed in his own State to try before juries men indicted for and doubtless guilty of petty offenses. He has pursued a style in his argument which reminds one more of the method of a lawyer pleading to a jury in condemnation of some culprit than of trying to convey information to the Senate now engaged in the consideration of a measure which but incidentally involves the services of Mr. Hoover. I think the Senator from Missouri enjoyed quite as much as we have enjoyed his address and discussion, because he was relieved from following the rules of evidence, and he introduced any kind of matter without regard to its relevance in order to make his address, if not convincing, at any rate entertaining.

The first indictment the Senator made against Mr. Hoover was that there was a doubt as to his Americanism. The Senator from Missouri did not say that Mr. Hoover was not born in the wheat belt, because he was born, confessedly, in the State of Iowa. The Senator did not say that Mr. Hoover lacked experience in a State where the products are so diversified as in California, because as a young man he went to California, lived among her people, participated in their activities, and was graduated at the great Stanford University at Palo Alto, by which he is considered to-day one of its honored trustees and worthy sons. The faculty take an especial pride in the achievements of the boy whom they sent out upon the world.

His sin began when, with the advantages of birth in Iowa and education in California, he dared to go to China and to Australia and South Africa—certainly a most serious offense. No American can tolerate, in his amiable conceit, the thought of one of his fellows going out of the limits of the United States, because, be it known, our country embraces everything that is both good and wise, everything in the domain of the vegetable, the mineral, the animal, and the intellectual kingdoms, and therefore a man is put on the defensive when he goes abroad. But

> How much the fool who has been sent to roam
> Excels the fool who has been kept at home.

It has occurred to the proverb maker, and possibly it is within our own experience, that a man who has traveled not only becomes possessed of more information but I believe he becomes even a better American. If he goes abroad and garners experience in every field and still remains an American, his asset to us as an American citizen is very much greater than had he remained at home.

He went to Australia. We know that vast field. He went to China to open mines. He went to South Africa. In those countries he not only acquired knowledge and experience of men and affairs but he acquired an honorable fortune. Going away from the apron strings of his native land into the hard places of the earth, there in competition with men, engineers like himself and miners like himself, to have wrested from the reluctant earth a fortune, which he has wisely employed, certainly should not be a matter of reproach. All these things he has done.

Before the war he found himself in London. My first knowledge of Mr. Hoover's work was in London, when in 1913 I went there in an official capacity to interest the British Government to participate in the Panama-Pacific Exposition. At that time Mr. Hoover stood at the head, not of Englishmen, not of Australians, not of Africanders, but of Americans. It became advisable to organize a committee for the purpose of proving to the British Board of Trade that there was a real and valuable trade purpose to be subserved by participating in that international exposition. Mr. Hoover undertook that work, having been unanimously selected by his fellows. I may say here that a remarkable thing about this man is his quality of leadership and genius for organization. There, in a strange land and among his compatriots he was regarded as the first citizen and to him they turned.

Then the war broke out, and Mr. Hoover, among the Americans who were in London, not as exiles, but in prosecuting the world's work in which Africa, Australia, China, and America were all involved, had become international, not only in his vocation, not only in his affairs, but in his comprehensive understanding of and sympathy with the needs of humanity. When a man has traveled he learns probably better to understand his fellow man and does not confine his affections and exclusive interest to those who are nearest to him. It is a kind of religion, an elevation of spirit, a broadening of vision. As Thoreau said, "When a man has traveled, when he has robbed the horizon of his native fields of their mystery and trampled the blue of the distant mountains with his feet, he begins to think of another world"—the world of humanity.

Travel is an expansive process, giving breadth, love, and universality of vision to the man who is so fortunate as to enjoy its opportunities.

As was said when America began to grow—

> No pent-up Utica confines our powers,
> But the whole boundless continent is ours.

And now that the world war has given us the world for our stage, let us have a world-wide man to do our work.

There is a craving to get out of our provincialism and expand more and more. Hoover is a pioneer American, you may say, in that realm of usefulness, both in the world development of resources and in the practical expression of humane sentiments. What was the magnitude of the enterprise which gave him fame? How much money was involved in his work in Belgium, of which we have heard? He presided over the Belgian relief committee and organized it. We have relief committees on every corner in the United States. Everybody within his limitations is trying to help; but there he was at the head—and he was the head, and it is well that he was the head—of a commission which possessed the confidence of England, of France, and of the United States. Into his hands—I am speaking of him individually now—there was deposited no less than $250,000,000 for Belgian relief and for the relief of the people of the north of France within the very few years during which the war has progressed.

I was told on one occasion that he was given a check on the French Treasury for $4,000,000, without any understanding whatever that it should be accounted for, nor was he required to make an accounting; but he did make an accounting. He is a business man. He was not going to expose himself to the taunts of the malicious or the ignorant. He kept books, and the overhead expense in the administration of that great fund was only one-sixteenth of 1 per cent. It was a labor of love, and he calls upon those to help in the same spirit as volunteers; and here to-day in Washington, rallied by his side, are hundreds of volunteers, willing under his leadership to carry on this work of relief and conservation. An overhead expense of one-sixteenth of 1 per cent is certainly a most excellent showing in the administration of a relief fund involving $250,000,000 in a strange land; and, having acquired that priceless experience, he is available for our purposes. Do we not need such a man?

The Senator has intimated that he was a self-seeker. I interrogated him to ask whether as a matter of fact the President of the United States had not sent for him. The President did not know him personally; but the President lives in the world. As a citizen of the world he knew of the fame of Hoover, and he called upon Hoover, not to confer any benefit upon Hoover; he called upon Hoover to render assistance to his native land. While the Senator from Missouri was talking I rang up Mr. Hoover and asked him as to his citizenship. "Why," he said, "I am an American. I never for one minute relinquished my citizenship. I am a citizen of the United States and a resident of California, qualified to vote in California. I never had any other thought."

It is rather painful that a man should be expatriated, even in the course of an afternoon's speech, when his great achievements are the glory of his country. Hoover, the American—so he is regarded abroad, as he should be regarded at home, with appreciation and affection. He is a man that gives no offense. He is a man, as you have observed, of quiet manner. That he has been the subject of voluminous advertising is no fault of his own. The instincts of our journalists are very often true. They find a man modest, and in proportion to his modesty they make him conspicuous, if he has merit. If he is a self-seeker, they leave him alone. Because Mr. Hoover has won the esteem of the press and his achievements have been published far and wide is no reason why Mr. Hoover himself is not a modest man. He is a modest man, because "modesty is the chastity of merit."

He can not make a speech as eloquent as a speech by the Senator from Missouri. If he could, how convincing indeed he would be, having both the eloquence and the facts! He lacks the ability to present his case; and because he is here this afternoon made the subject of such severe criticism I have ventured, all unprepared, to tell you the manner of man he is and the character of his work.

I do not think, though, that anything in the remarks of the Senator from Missouri really made any impression, except—and it was new to me—the assertion that he engaged in speculation in foodstuffs. In an inspired article, as I should call it, by Ernest Poole, in the Saturday Evening Post of May 26, 1917, I find that among the difficulties experienced by Hoover in purchasing supplies from charity funds, meager as they were in proportion to the vast need, it was incumbent upon him as a humanitarian as well as a business man to drive as hard and fast a bargain for the suffering poor as though he were engaged in a gainful business for himself. There is no charge here that he did engage in speculation for himself. The learned Senator from Missouri exonerates him from all fault of that kind; but still he says that he did speculate. This is the character of the speculation, the object manifestly being to get the most food against the hoarding of speculators for the hungry mouths of the unfortunate people for whom he had been administering this great trust.

I read from the article I mentioned:

It—

This great work—

must be done cheaply and without fail. And, in order to save every possible dollar, only those kinds of food must be bought that would give the greatest nourishment. This they learned from expert dietitians.

But as to purchasing supplies there were big men on the C. R. B. who needed no expert advice. They knew all the tricks of the business. When the price of beans began to rise they bought 1,000 tons of beans and threw them back in one lot on the market. Down went prices. They bought in small lots. Slowly again the price began rising; but once more the terrific impact of 1,000 tons of beans was felt. Again the price dropped, and again their agents bought beans in small lots.

So again and again did that same thousand tons of beans hammer down prices and save the day. The same was true wherever they went. In food and in shoes and clothing repeatedly through expert advice of business men as shrewd as themselves they went into the market and bought at cost, and often below it.

These are the facts. That is the method of the speculator, if you please—to buy and to sell—and the market is affected by purchases and by sales. That is where he utilized his knowledge of the business methods of the world and turned them to good account. Certainly that is not a reproach.

While the Senator from Missouri was talking, I rang up Mr. Hoover on the telephone again and said that he was being accused of speculating, not necessarily in his own interest, with the funds of the Belgian relief commission. I said, "What truth is there in it?" desiring to communicate his own statement to the Senate. He expressed very considerable indignation. He may be a mild-mannered man, as is described, but, mild mannered as a man may be, he would naturally resent any imputation which he thought reflected upon his good name or his honor. I hastily assured him there was no accusation of that kind; but I said: "What was the practice in securing your food supplies, in making your purchases in the open market, with a view possibly of getting better rates for the trust which you were administering?" He said there was no speculation of any character. He went into the open market and purchased goods, and if he sold goods it was in order to make more advantageous purchases; and the nearest thing that might approach speculation, he said, was when in the United States he purchased a quantity of goods of some character, and could not find a ship for it, and therefore was obliged to sell it in the market, netting, I believe, a profit; but that profit went into the Belgian relief fund, and made more easy the administration of his trust in meeting the demands of those who were dependent upon it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the Senator, now, be specific. I should like to know if Mr. Hoover repudiates this bean story that is printed over Mr. Poole's signature in the Saturday Evening Post?

Mr. PHELAN. I have read approvingly the bean story published by Mr. Ernest Poole in the Saturday Evening Post. I have not Mr. Hoover's word for it. I had not read the story when I telephoned half an hour ago to Mr. Hoover, but I do not know why Mr. Hoover should disavow it, and I am willing to assume that it is true——

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. PHELAN. For this reason: This excerpt was given to me by Mr. Hoover's friend, Judge Curtis Lindley, of California, who is one of his coadjutors. I asked him for information about Hoover, and he handed me this. That is why I said I believed it was inspired, and therefore true.

Mr. REED. When the Senator says "He handed me this," he has in his hand the Saturday Evening Post containing Mr. Poole's article, and that is what he refers to as an inspired article.

Mr. PHELAN. It is.

Mr. REED. The Senator admits that statement to be true, and in addition to that says that Mr. Hoover states that if he sold anything in this country it was with the idea of buying more. Now, will the Senator tell the Senate and the country why a man engaged in buying foodstuffs for Belgium, and having bought foodstuffs for Belgium, should sell them for the purpose of buying more, unless he did it to affect the price? Why sell the very goods you had bought with the intention of immediately buying more unless you did it for the purpose of breaking the market?

Mr. PHELAN. I think it was perfectly plain in my statement, Mr. President, that the deliberate intention of Mr. Hoover, according to this article, was to force down the mounting prices which heartless speculation had sought to impose even upon a charity fund. I can not see that any apology is necessary for Mr. Hoover in a warfare of that kind, fighting the devil with fire, to unload a carload here and there in order to buy more advantageously a larger quantity for the purposes which I mentioned.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. PHELAN. It does not interrupt me.

Mr. REED. The Senator, then, admits that the process was to go into the market and buy in small quantities until a very large amount had been accumulated? That, of course, would have the effect gradually of raising the price. Having raised the price, the process then was to throw the whole of that which had been bought into the market and break it, and repeat the operation. Now, if that be not strictly in accordance with the most approved methods of Wall Street gambling and of wheat-pit gambling, will the Senator please tell us what the better methods are?

Mr. PHELAN. It is not the gallows that makes the crime.

Mr. REED. No; but it is the crime that makes the necessity for the gallows.

Mr. PHELAN. Granted. An act may be done by a patriot which, if done by a lesser mortal, would be crime. In history, patriots have committed what we call crimes believing that they were acting in a righteous cause. History, for instance, has never put Brutus in the category of ordinary offenders. A man may commit an overt act of any kind not strictly in accordance with the law and history would find justification for him on account of the purity of his motives. It is all a matter of ethics and viewpoint.

To buy and sell speculatively in Wall Street is an offense, if you please. I do not know that it is even a statutory offense. To buy and sell in the wheat pit in Chicago is an offense according to the Senator from Missouri. I do not know that it is a statutory offense. At any rate, it is frequently practiced. But assuming that it is an offense, it is not an offense of such a character as to deter from engaging in it a man actuated by good and pure motives in a conflict with speculators. He might buy in the ordinary market from jobbers and from brokers and easily consume the entire sum which was at his disposal without accomplishing one tithe of the good which he would have accomplished had he resorted to the methods of the broker and the speculator.

I am not here to apologize for Mr. Hoover's action as described in this article by Mr. Poole. If these acts in themselves were of a reprehensible character—which I can not admit, because they violate no law, the buying and selling on the market—if these acts were of a reprehensible character, what must be the character of the conduct of those men who presented an almost impassable barrier to the Belgian Relief Commission seeking food for hungry people? In order to overcome that barrier it was necessary for Mr. Hoover and his confrères to break it down or to scale it. They accomplished their just purposes by resorting to the methods practiced by brokers, let us admit, and those methods are not wrongfully employed when employed for good purposes; certainly not wrongfully employed when employed to overcome a barrier against the Belgian relief, in this instance, seeking food for hungry people.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PHELAN. I do.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will yield for one further interruption, the Senator speaks of a barrier that had been created.

Mr. PHELAN. The barrier of high prices.

Mr. REED. Yes. Now, let us see. Mr. Hoover went into the market and bought his 10,000 tons of beans. He bought them on a market that existed. It is not claimed that the market then was very high; but the buying of these 10,000 tons of beans ran the market up. Now, he had his beans; he had bought them in a market that was not controlled; but having thus gained control of the market, he proceeded to hurl all the 10,000 tons of beans into the market at once, and, to use the expression of the writer, the eulogist, the impact of that blow broke the market; and so he repeated the operation. Now, I think the Senator is not warranted in saying that there was any barrier of high prices set against him in the first instance. He simply did as others have done; in buying enough to control the market he boosted the prices. He was safe in doing it because, having complete control of the market, he could drive them down. I think the Senator's assumption that he had a barrier of high prices is not borne out by anything stated in the article, or by any fact known to anybody. However, I thank the Senator. I should not have so long interrupted him.

Mr. PHELAN. I think the Senator from Missouri understands quite as well as I the nature of the offense which he has charged to Mr. Hoover, and I am confidently disposed to offer a plea of justification; and I will leave that to the consideration of the Senate.

There is one other point which the Senator made, and were it not so serious it would be amusing. I think the Senator overlooks the fact, so accustomed is he to these piping hours of peace within these precincts, that we are at war, serious war, and in order to win a victory it is not only necessary to have men and munitions and those "great guns which make ambition virtue", it is necessary to have food supplies not only for the combatants but for the noncombatants, for the civilian population. We have lived so long in luxury and abundance that it is hard, I admit, to conceive of any condition where there will not be enough food for us all, even when traveling in palace cars. We have been unused to privation.

Now, we are to profit only by our own experience? The wise man has said that experience is the mistress of fools. We must profit by the experience of others if we are wise; and I have here this startling statement:

This year we are faced with a world shortage.

This statement was made by Mr. Hoover at Brown University.

Next year this shortage will be greater. * * * Our whole food problem revolves around one single factor—the diminishing productivity of Europe and the disruption of commerce by armored barriers.

He goes on to say:

Uppermost in my mind, and present I hope in yours, is the problem which I was recalled from Europe to engage myself with on behalf of the President.

In passing, I may say that Mr. Hoover was not a self-seeker, but was brought to this country by the President. At Washington on May 19 the President issued the following statement. After calling attention to the desperate condition in which this country would be involved on account of a food shortage and speculation, he adds:

I have asked Mr. Herbert Hoover to undertake this all-important task of food administration. He has expressed his willingness to do so on condition that he is to receive no payment for his services, and that the whole of the force under him, exclusive of clerical assistance, shall be employed, so far as possible, upon the same volunteer basis.

He has expressed his confidence that this difficult matter of food administration can be successfully accomplished through the voluntary cooperation and direction of legitimate distributors of foodstuffs and with the help of the women of the country.

Although it is absolutely necessary that unquestionable powers shall be placed in my hands in order to insure the success of this administration of the food supplies of the country, I am confident that the exercise of those powers will be necessary only in the few cases where some small and selfish minority proves unwilling to put the Nation's interests above personal advantage, and that the whole country will heartily support Mr. Hoover's efforts by supplying the necessary volunteer agencies throughout the country for the intelligent control of food consumption and securing the cooperation of the most capable leaders of the very interests most directly affected, that the exercise of the powers deputed to him will rest very successfully upon the good will and cooperation of the people themselves, and that the ordinary economic machinery of the country will be left substantially undisturbed.

Now, continuing Mr. Hoover's own statement before Brown University, the food controller by appointment of the President, says:

I do not propose in these few minutes to enter the forest of dietetic, administrative, and economic difficulties with which the problem is surrounded. I wish to present but one theme to your mind. Our whole food problem revolves around one single factor—the diminishing productivity of Europe and the disruption of commerce by armored barriers.

Since the wonderful world harvest of 1915 the food supplies of the world have been steadily lessening. This year we are faced with a world shortage and next year the shortage will be greater. Seventy million men in Europe have been called out of productive labor and devoted to fighting and the production of implements of war. The women have been unable to in full renew the harvest, and there has been a great diversion of animals and transport to war. The land is no longer receiving the fertilizer of old. In order to decrease the production of fodder grains and increase the production of bread grains, and to secure protein and fat supplies, Europe is eating into her capital of animals. This again reacts on the productivity of the land, and foodstuffs are beyond this daily being destroyed at sea in shiploads. Our own allies are separated from their normal markets of Russia, Bulgaria, Roumania, while the Argentine has had a crop failure, and the shortage of our allies therefore is more acute than their own decline represents.

It is the impact of this shortage that has knocked at every door in the United States. We are a country of abundant surplus, yet the reverberation of Europe's shortage would have thundered imperiously, even had we never entered the war.

The reaction of Europe has raised our prices above the endurable level, and will, if we do nothing, raise them still higher, for their need grows yearly. By our entry into the war we arrive at two issues: First, the issue we must have partially fronted in any event, the control of our food so as to ameliorate prices, for unless we can do so we must meet a raise of wages with all its vicious circle of social disruption at a time when maximum efficiency, is vital to our safety; second, that we may also meet the increased demands of our allies that they may remain constant in the war.

These problems are not insoluble if taken in time. In their solution lies a prime test of democracy. The question is, Can our form of government put forward the organization, the devotion, the self-denial, the efficiency, the preparation in advance of storm? Must we wait until disaster is upon us and then reap the whirlwind in a lament of "Too late"? Can it not only do this in time, but can it also do so without resort to measures of Prussianism? I believe it can. I believe our faith is right. I believe democracy can not only defend itself but it can prepare in time. I believe that the spirit of self-sacrifice and idealism runs higher among our people than in any other land. I believe with the mobilization of the voluntary support of our people these problems are soluble, but I know that no people are of such idealism but that some individuals and their selfishness would defeat the majority. To this end we must give power, but that is not the power of Prussianism any more than is the power of police to repress crime.

In our abundance, our undeveloped resources, our wastage and extravagance, we hold it in our power, and ours alone, to keep the wolf from the door of the world. This duty is wider than war—it is as wide as our humanity.

I submit that a man who has such broad experience, who so well marshals his facts, who is so convincing in his statements, is entitled to be considered an authority upon a subject on which most of us are densely ignorant.

There is nothing in his career to indicate that he has any other purpose than that of doing good to his country and to our allies. He wishes to conserve the food at reasonable prices; and I have heard him, in the presence of many Senators, say that one of his first concerns was to give an adequate return to the farmer. Certainly there is no plan involved under the administration of this American to deprive the producer of adequate returns for his product. I have heard him debate in conversation with a Member of this body whether it would not be better to fix a price of $1.50 for wheat rather than $1.25, and he favored the larger amount.

It is only to prevent excessive charges, speculative prices, that he is to act as a food administrator. He is there now in a volunteer capacity under the authority of the President, and his only purpose is to be of service. Shall we not enlist his service?

The Senator from Missouri, in the defense of the spirit of American liberty and the Constitution, again reverts to the danger of investing too much power in one man; that the power of a food regulator might be administered for the injury of the people and that it might be easily abused. I think we must assume in giving a man a position of power and responsibility that power brings with it that he is there to serve the Government that selected him for a particular task, and not to serve private interests or speculation; that is, he is there in the spirit which seems to be the atmosphere of a man, in the spirit of helpful and patriotic service.

Of course when we get in trouble, as in war, we turn aside for the hour from the so-called established principles or doctrines of democracy. We have done it in the Senate time and time again, and we let down our checks and balances. We see that effective and prompt action is vitally necessary. But let us hope it will very soon be over; everything done is for "the period of the war." We can not use the methods of peace and win victories in war; that seems to be conceded; and that we have a President who has none of the taint of the usurper in his composition is a very good thing for us in a national crisis like this. We are working under our "war powers," and our President has become the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

History has given us examples of men who, invested with power, were loath to give it up. It was the surprise of Europe that Washington having been in the supreme command should have relinquished his authority. It was unknown in the Old World for a man to have attained power and yield it. Byron expressed a surprise and gratification when he said:

Where may the wearied eye repose
When gazing on the great,
Where neither guilty glory glows
Nor despicable state?
Yes; one, the first, the last, the best,
The Cincinnatus of the West,
Whom envy dared not hate,
Bequeath the name of Washington,
To make man blush, there is but one!

In the long succession of American Presidents the example of Washington has been such that there has never even been so much as a suspicion of usurpation, of seizing power which the people would fain deny. The unwritten law even has been observed with respect to a third presidential term. Can it be possible that a food conserver, invested with the power of regulating the supplies of food, is going to menace our democratic institutions? That is not the kind of power that destroys democracies, but I really think, having heard the gentleman describe the dietary which the food controller is about to impose, it would, if observed, improve rather than impair our constitutions!

Now, Mr. President, can we not safely accept this dictator without fear?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment? When I heard the statement some days ago that Mr. Hoover has practically expatriated himself, or, rather, concluded from the statement that he was really not a citizen of the United States, to satisfy myself I asked and received a brief statement from his secretary as to his life, which I submit to the Senator and in the Senator's time I ask that he read it into his speech. It is very brief and it will save any further questions.

Mr. PHELAN. At the request of the Senator from Oregon, I am very glad to read the brief statement, which is authentic.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was sent to me by Mr. Hoover's secretary.

Mr. PHELAN. It is vouched for by the secretary of Mr. Hoover. Here is the true story of his life:

Herbert Clark Hoover: Born West Branch, Iowa, August 10, 1874. Quaker parents. After death of parents in 1883, sent to Oregon in charge of relatives, residing at Newberg and Salem, Oreg., until 1891. Became self-supporting at 13 years of age. Went to Stanford University, California, 1891, graduating 1895 as mining engineer. Employed professionally in New Mexico, Colorado, California, and Oregon until 1897, part time with United States Geological Survey. In 1897 went to Australia in administrative metallurgical work and mining.

Returned to California 1899. After few months left for China as an engineering adviser to the Chinese Government. Returned to California 1900, after outbreak of Boxer rebellion. After few months left California again for China as manager of industrial works, comprising coal mines and works, fleet of 20 ships, canals, railways, and harbor works, employing some 25,000 men. Returned to California in 1901.

I observe that he has always returned to California; he could not stay away.

Mr. REED. How long did he stay there? A few months?

Mr. PHELAN (reading)—

Thereafter opened offices in San Francisco, New York, and London, visiting all points annually. Employed in administration of large industrial works, embracing railways, metallurgical work, mining, iron and steel, shipping, land, and electrical enterpises in California, Colorado, Alaska, Mexico, India, Russia, and China, until the war broke out in 1914. Was a trustee of Stanford University, Cal., and spent much time there, 1901–1914, in affairs of that institution and on conduct of business in that State. Went to London just before war broke out. When the war broke out became engaged in the organization of return of stranded Americans.* In October, 1914, organized commission for relief in Belgium, and remained in Europe during the war with the exception of a return to the United States in the fall of 1915 and the winter of 1917.

The commission for relief in Belgium from October, 1914, until April, 1917, handled the import of upwards to 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, rice, beans, peas, and other cereals, together with many thousands of tons of meat products; operating its own fleet of from 50 to 70 ships, its own mills, and in addition thereto acquired and redistributed cereals and several other staples in the occupied territory involving between 30,000,000 and 40,000,000 bushels of other cereals and large quantities of meats, et cetera, et cetera. The commission for relief in Belgium organized and distributed a ration to 10,000,000 people, directly employing upward of 125,000 people in its operations. The personnel was in a great majority volunteer, and the total overhead expenses of the commission up to April, 1917, were three-eighths of 1 per cent. The aggregate amount of money expended on imported foodstuffs and through the organization in the purchase of native food supplies was approximately $500,000,000.

Never sought public office in any shape or form—

I hope he is not reproaching the rest of us—

Returned to the United States on the direct request of the Government, acting entirely as a volunteer for service during the war only.

It shows his close association, Mr. President, with the United States through his California citizenship and residence. That he is an American there is no question. That he is a usurper with a sinister and malign design of seizing power for some unholy use is absolutely out of the question; that is not in the genius of an American, and he is par excellence an American. It is true he has traveled, but "in spite of all temptations to belong to other nations" he remains an American.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD an article on Mr. Hoover, the subject of discussion, published in the Saturday Evening Post of May 26, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOOVER OF BELGIUM.

[By Ernest Poole.]

Whether this war is to be won for democracy and a lasting peace, or is to be halted, through starvation, in a truce that will make its bloodshed of no avail to humanity—this, to a very large degree, is to be settled now and here by the people of America. We must feed not only our own population but the people of our allies. That we can do this there is little doubt. The resources of this land are so varied and exhaustless that, given the will, the way will be found. And to rouse the will and point the way the Council of National Defense has chosen Hoover of Belgium.

A better leader could not have been found. To rouse the will of this Nation—a will mysteriously vast, compounded of the purposes, the small desires, selfish plans, the hopes and dreams and great ideals, the firm beliefs and the suspicions of more than a hundred million people—here is one whose very name is a great national asset now. For it has become a symbol of that honesty and generous will, that clean, efficient action, which will sweep out of our Yankee minds the suspicion of graft and slackness here. There was no graft in Belgium and there shall be none here. There was clear, hard thinking, exhausting toil and unselfishness in Belgium, and there shall be those qualities here. But to those sentimentalists who love to hear great stirring appeals to their emotions, let it be clearly said at the start that Hoover will disappoint them.

BIG JOBS IN BOTH HEMISPHERES.

For a more intensely sensible man it would be hard to discover. He is 42 years old. Though by no means large of frame, he gives at once an impression of force. His limbs look hard; his smooth face is strong; there is a determined look to his jaws, and his eyes are steady and direct. He is a mining engineer, a man from a ruthless, fighting world, to whom at the outbreak of this war something very like a miracle happened.

Herbert Clark Hoover was born, in 1874, in Iowa. In his boyhood there and in Oregon he early developed an instinct for striking out on his own account. To a large extent he worked his way. He went to school, but learned much more from life itself and the struggles he had. At 17 he entered the School of Mines at Stanford University, where he not only supported himself but was always loaning money to friends. At 21 he graduated and went out with the Geological Survey. One year later he was appointed assistant manager of two large Australian mines, and his work there was so successful that in 1897 he was chosen by the great British mining firm of Bewick, Moreing & Co. to become their chief of staff in western Australia. He held that position for three years.

Then the Chinese Government asked him to take charge of its bureau of mines; and a year later he became general manager of a Belgian corporation there. During the Boxer rebellion Hoover worked a machine gun. Soon after that he was made a partner of Bewick, Moreing & Co. and director of their mining activities. He was still but 28 years old.

Living in London his work now took him far and wide. "In Russia," said a friend of his, "I went with him to a mining region he was directing in the Ural Mountains. This property was larger than Belgium. It took us several hours by train, and many days more in sledges over snow and ice, to inspect it all. One reason for his success in this project was the way he treated the Russians. They did not care for foreigners, who had always treated them with varying degrees of contempt. Hoover did the opposite. He took the Russian ways of work and whenever possible made them his own. He cooperated in every way, and they had soon taken him as their friend. And this is typical of him. He has always somehow or other turned each obstacle to his use."

In his hospitable London home he has led a simple life. He is no society man at all; his manners are far from "finished," and small talk bores him to extinction. He seldom tells funny stories himself, though he likes to hear them. When he plays bridge he plays it hard. When he has a day off he likes to motor with his family out into the country, build a fire, and cook in the open. Another dissipation of his is the reading of detective stories. In these he takes a huge delight. But the rest of Hoover's life is work. At times he labors day and night. "When you're with him on a job," said a friend, "you can call him up at 1 a. m. and he won't appear in the least annoyed." The same is true of his reading. He reads hard and grows absorbed. He has a passion for histories and biographies of all kinds.

By sheer work he has made himself a decidedly forcible writer. His book the Principles of Mining gives in a clear, simple style the methods he himself used to rise. And his other achievement in this line is the translation of De Re Metallica, an old book on metals and mining, written in 1530 by Georg Agricola, a Saxon, who wrote in a doggrel Latin that had defied the efforts of translators for over 400 years. In slaving at this puzzle Hoover took a grim delight. For several years it took his spare time. It was one of his ways of resting.

He was always quietly helping young engineers to get a start. His house was always open to them. As for outsiders in need of assistance, whoever asked Hoover for money was asked, in turn, for his name and address, and these were promptly sent to an officer of the Salvation Army whom Hoover employed to look up such appeals. He was a generous giver—but always, first, he had to be shown. He often helped the Salvation Army; but to other large organized charities or social work of any kind he had given little thought or time except when approached for funds.

Such was Hoover's early life—a swift, almost miraculous rise. In 1914 he was living in London, wealthy and successful, though but in his fortieth year. The fees he received as an engineer amounted to hundreds of thousands of dollars. He was known among miners all over the world. It had been a ruthless, fighting world of big mining operations and finance on an international scale. He had not lived the sort of life that is very likely to make a man kind.

Then came the war. On the morning of August 4, 1914, the American consul in London called Hoover on the telephone. "Mr. Hoover," he said, "there's a mob of American citizens here, trying to change letters of credit, bank drafts, and express orders for English gold. And we're swamped! For God's sake come over and help up out!"

GETTING FUNDS FOR PENNILESS TOURISTS.

Hoover went over and got to work. He telephoned to all his friends: "How much money have you in your safes? Get all the cash you can raise at once; get in at the back doors of the banks. Get it anyway short of larceny." These friends responded to his call. They raised about $200,000. The Government loaned the same amount. And, through their efforts, in two months 45,000 Americans were sent safely home.

Meantime, over in Belgium things were getting desperate. Seven and a half million people were facing starvation; and Hoover was asked to handle the work of relief in Belgium and northern France. At once he called together a few big, able Americans, most of them engineers like himself; and they lost no time in getting to work. The first day they had three rooms—the second day, a dozen.

Their office was organized with a speed that made old England gasp for breadth. As a rule, it took two weeks at least for the Government telephone company to install a telephone. In this office it was done overnight, with a switchboard and dozens of instruments. And they thanked the company in a way that has won its devotion ever since. Meantime Hoover had organized. He had sent one man to arrange for ships, and another over to Rotterdam to make ready to transport the supplies from there into Belgium. Others were already buying food.

Hoover's way is to do things first and ask permission later. He and his associates had only $500,000 promised from the English Government. But, with this in sight, they arranged to place orders every week for $2,000,000 worth of food! They purchased food, got it to the docks, chartered vessels, and loaded them. Then, when the hatches were all closed, Hoover sought permission to make shipment. He went before the proper official.

"Unless I get four shiploads of food to Belgium before the end of the week those people will starve," he said.

The high official deeply regretted his inability to aid him. The food could not be purchased; the railroads were choked with munitions of war; the ships were all under Government orders. Hoover heard him to the end.

"I have attended to all that," he said. "The ships are loaded and ready. All I need now is clearance papers."

The official stared at him.

"Young man," he said, "there have been men sent to the Tower for less than you have done here. If it were anyone else, or for any other cause, I hate to think what might happen."

The ships sailed a few hours later. So the work of the C. R. B. began.

"We had thought initially," Hoover said, "that so terrible a situation could exist only for days; that we must find a few millions of dollars. But within a month we realized that we were confronted with a task not merely over days but months, and an expenditure far beyond the dreams of any relief hitherto known."

FEEDING THE HUNGRY.

He appealed to the French and English Governments for immense appropriations; and meantime, in tactful cooperation with native leaders over in Belgium and northern France, Hoover and his American friends began to bring order out of chaos. The generous men who intended to help only for days or weeks stayed on for years. Hoover's spirit held them there. The number of these volunteers swelled to 50,000. Some 200 were Americans; the rest were French and Belgians. Thousands labored day and night, and practically all served without pay. The overhead charges of the commission have been six-tenths of 1 per cent; for there was a great cause and a great leader here. And week by week and month by month there grew up a vast intricate organization, with some 4,000 committees all over the world raising money and purchasing supplies, and in Belgium and northern France a carefully worked-out system of over 4,000 other committees, large and small, resting at the bottom upon a group in every commune, with a small warehouse from which food and clothing were issued upon ration cards.

There were soup kitchens, baby canteens where 400,000 babies got special food. In addition 1,200,000 school children got a special meal each day to help check the rapid and ominous spread of tuberculosis among them. This meal cost a million and a quarter dollars a month; but, even so, it did not go far. The public health had to be carefully watched. There had to be rigid control of the distribution of all supplies, both native and imported. Justice must be done to all. Fertilizers and seeds must be found. By the decrease of these and of live stock the native supplies now swiftly declined. The problem grew harder every month. Always more money must be secured; always new remedies must be found.

Nor was it only a problem of feeding. One-half of the Belgians were out of work; and there were the regular paupers—the blind, the orphans, and the helpless. Three million five hundred thousand people in Belgium and 2,000,000 more in northern France were wholly destitute. They must be clothed with millions of garments, warmed by thousands of tons of coal; and those who were homeless must be housed. New committees constantly had to be formed. In the presence of diminished shipping the inward flow of food must increase. It must be done cheaply and without fail. And, in order to save every possible dollar, only those kinds of food must be bought that would give the greatest nourishment. This they learned from expert dietitians.

But, as to purchasing supplies, there were big men on the C. R. B. who needed no expert advice. They knew all the tricks of the business. When the price of beans began to rise they bought 1,000 tons of beans and threw them back in one lot on the market. Down went prices. They bought in small lots. Slowly again the price began rising; but once more the terrific impact of 1,000 tons of beans was felt. Again the price dropped, and again their agents bought beans in small lots.

So again and again did that same thousand tons of beans hammer down prices and save the day. The same was true wherever they went. In food and in shoes and clothing repeatedly, through expert advice of business men as shrewd as themselves, they went into the market and bought at cost, and often below it.

They employed some 70 cargo ships flying the flag of the C. R. B. They used hundreds of tugs and canal boats and railroad cars. They operated not only warehouses but large mills and factories. And they distributed every month 220,000,000 pounds of bread, 20,000,000 pounds of bacon and lard, 5,000,000 tins of condensed milk, beans, corn, coffee, sugar, and thousands of tons of other supplies. Each month their dependents consumed the wheat product of nearly 200,000 acres. The commission expended $14,000,000 every month, and made every dollar count. Hoover was in full action now.

But, despite all these resources and these Herculean efforts, "We were haunted in every dark hour," he says, "by the grim tragedy of possible failure; for we never saw a time when our finances were certain for 60 days ahead, or a time when our contracts did not exceed our assets from five million to twenty million dollars." They went begging to the world, and at first the response was promising.

"In a moment of desperation," he writes, "I assessed the miners of Australia, where I had had a connection for years. I told them what they ought to give, and I received in two months $750,000 for Belgium from a country already combed to the bottom for relief and distress work. We appealed to the miners of Johannesburg, and the laborers in the mines gave 10 per cent of their wages, and the owners duplicated the amount."

THE OLD LADIES' GIFT.

So it was in other parts of the world. There were responses large and small. A letter from two old ladies in England inclosed 12 silver buttons, which they had cut from their best gowns. They said it was all they had to give. Hoover replied, I was told by a friend, to this effect:

"DEAR LADIES: It is not necessary yet to permit such sacrifice as yours. Your action has led one of us here to contribute £10 to the Belgian cause. So what you have done was not in vain. I return your buttons—all except one, which, if you will allow me, I shall keep as a reminder that there are people like you in the world."

But there were not enough people like that, it seemed. And for its work the C. R. B. has been driven to count more and more on the French and British Governments. Of the $250,000,000 spent in the work more than four-fifths has come from them or from their banks and has been debited to the Belgian nation or to the communes and municipalities in northern France that have received its benefits.

Hoover soon won such implicit trust from the French and British Governments that they asked for no accounting. They put their money in his hands and simply told him to go ahead.

But Hoover did not do business that way. Before many months he had organized an immense and tortuous system of bureaus of accounting, audit, statistics, and inspection covering the whole range of their work from New York and Buenos Aires to the last village in northern France.

"The monument of our efficiency," he said, "lies in the fact that the bread sold in Belgium to those who can pay has always been from 15 to 20 per cent cheaper than in New York City."

From such a record Hoover's fame spread over Europe far and wide. All the Governments of the allies were soon seeking his counsel in regard to the pressing food problems they had at home. And in Germany when Herr Batocki was made the food dictator there he was prompt in asking Hoover's advice.

Hoover's relation with Germany made the most difficult part of his task. In the life he has led for nearly three years, in London and in Paris, in Holland and in Belgium, foremost among the chaos of tasks was the anxiety of dealing each day with an occupying army, with arbitrary methods and everchanging rules and laws. He had to negotiate and maintain international agreements for the protection of foods and ships; for guaranties that his supplies should not be consumed by the invaders. It required tact and dogged persistence.

At first the Germans could not understand him. He did not fit into their scheme of things. His Kultur was not the same, and he had no Schrecklichket at all—except his Yankee stubbornness. At last, however, they trusted him. They could not let the Belgians die, and here was relief work free of charge.

His businesslike ways appealed to them. Individual German officers became his warm friends and gave him support, and their Government gradually came into line. He still had his troubles, but overcame them. When one of his ships was torpedoed Hoover took a trip to Berlin, where he was solemnly assured that it would never happen again.

"Your excellency," he said to the German, "there was a man once who was annoyed by a snarling dog. He went to see the owner and asked him to muzzle the dog. 'There is no need of that,' said the owner, 'the dog will never bite you.' 'Maybe,' said the man. 'You know the dog will not bite me. I know the dog will not bite me. But does the dog know?'"

"Pardon me one moment, Herr Hoover. I will telephone at once to the dog."

Hoover's parable got action.

That was over two years ago, and there came a respite from submarines. There were other troubles, but he stood his ground. He tried to talk to the German officials as though he had behind him an America ready to rise to a man. But the Germans refused to believe it.

They knew that, in spite of all the appeals Hoover had made to this country, we had contributed to his cause less than 4 per cent of the total amount. And this notwithstanding the fact that his commission had spent more than $150,000,000 here in the purchase of supplies! Our profits out of the Belgian relief had been $30,000,000 at least. We had given $9,000,000 in return. And Hoover felt this deeply.

"Time and time again," he has stated, "when the door of Belgium threatened to close we defended its portals by the assertion that this was an American enterprise, and that the sensibilities of the American people would be wounded beyond measure—would be outraged—if its work were interfered with.

But the Germans scoffed at this idea. In one crisis with a high official, when Hoover had made a veiled threat of this kind, the official responded as follows:

"Mr. Hoover, I will grant your request—not on account of your country, but on account of you and your friends, a small group of eccentric gentlemen who happen to be of American birth. You have worked miracles here in Belgium and the world will not forget you. But don't speak to me of America; for it is not behind you. Your country cares for nothing on earth but money, war profits—only that."

In sizing up other countries, however, Germany has not been strong. And as the causes have piled up and the great issue has grown clear—democracy or tyranny—the nation despised by the German official has at last roused to the summons and taken, with its free allies, the great road that leads to a liberal world.

And so Hoover has been called back home to lead us in that part of our task which is perhaps most pressing now. He is coming to the aid of our Department of Agriculture with the most careful and comprehensive knowledge of all such problems as we must solve, gathered not only from his own work, but from all that he has observed of similar vast operations in the countries of the allies.

Moreover, before coming home he took nearly a month for consultation with members of the British, French, and Italian ministries, and for an accurate survey of the food and shipping situation. And the groundwork has been laid for interallied cooperation in handling and transporting the vast food supplies required from us.

As to the great cause at stake and to the Germany he has known, Hoover has had this to say:

"For two and a half years we have been obliged to remain silent witnesses of the character of the forces dominating this war. But we are now at liberty to say that, though we break with great regret our association with many German individuals, yet it is our conviction, born of our intimate experience and contact, that there is no hope for democracy or liberalism, and consequently for the real peace and safety of our country, unless the system which brought the world into this unfathomable misery is stamped out, once and for all."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I congratulate the defender of Mr. Hoover on having produced an authentic certificate of the fact that he is a citizen of the United States, and particularly that he was able to get that certificate from Mr. Hoover's own private secretary. It is somewhat remarkable, however, that a man seeking these great powers, greater than were ever possessed by any king or potentate of modern times, should be in a position where his citizenship is so doubtful that even the Senator from his own State can not personally certify to it, and hence we have to have read into the RECORD the certificate of the gentleman's own private secretary that he really is a citizen of the United States and that he has occasionally visited this land.

The Senator from California would have us believe that because Mr. Hoover has been a trustee of Stanford University of California for a number of years he was therefore a bona fide resident of that State during that time.

Let me again call the Senator's attention to a paragraph of Mr. Irwin's article in the Saturday Evening Post, "The autocrat of the dinner table," already referred to, page 54 of the June 23 issue:

Stanford University, in which he has always maintained a loyal interest, made him a trustee. Hoover, traveling from London to San Francisco via the fastest trans-Atlantic steamer and the Overland Limited, always made the meeting of the board of trustees.

So it would appear that, though Mr. Hoover has been a trustee of this American University for a number of years, he always, according to his friend Mr. Irwin, used the fastest trans-Atlantic steamers and the Overland Limited to aid in his speedy trips to the annual meeting of the board of trustees and return again with all possible haste to his home in dear old London.

The Senator from California tells us that this gentleman has astonished the world with his greatness; that particularly the State of California has been proud of his wonderful achievements; and yet the Senator from California tells us that when he visited London in 1913 he heard of this wonderful man for the first time in his life. Knowing how the Senator from California, with his remarkable brain, surveys all fields, grasps all situations, and allows nothing whatever to escape him, I wonder how so large and distinguished a career of a Californian entirely escaped the Senator and he had to go to London to find out that such a remarkable gentleman lived.

There is one sentence of the Senator's I shall not pass over without a moment's notice. It is his assurance that Mr. Hoover proposes to give an adequate return to the farmer; that Mr. Hoover has actually promised the Senator from California that he will give an adequate return to the farmer. Mr. Hoover is to be placed in a position where he gives an adequate return to 45,000,000 American citizens. Upon Mr. Hoover's good will, upon Mr. Hoover's gracious kindliness these 45,000,000 men are to depend. He assures the Senator from California he will deal gently with the American farmer. He says that when this power is given to him he will be most generous with the American farmer. Well, go and tell the American farmer that you propose to take away from him his market; that you propose to take away from him his independence, the proud boast of every farmer, the pride that he sucked in with the very milk at his mother's breast, that his occupation was the most independent on earth. Go and tell him that for that independence you have substituted the gracious assurance of Mr. Hoover that he will deal kindly with them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment? I think each one of the bills—both the Gore substitute, so called, and the Senate committee bill as well—provides for a minimum price, a guaranteed price to the farmer. It is possible that the statement of the Senator from California was based on that provision of the bill. Both these proposed measures, I think, have a minimum price guaranteed to the farmer.

Mr. REED. Guaranteed in the bill?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so.

Mr. REED. Senator, your own bill has no price guaranteed in it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. A minimum price.

Mr. REED. Your own bill has no minimum price. Has all this discussion gone on for all these days, with you here the sponsor of your bill, and do you not know that you have not named a price to the farmer for his wheat?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It guarantees a minimum price. I think the section was written by the Senator from Oklahoma himself. It was suggested by him in the committee.

Mr. REED. It does not guarantee a minimum price. It states that a minimum price might be guaranteed, and is hereby guaranteed, but in the bill there is no price named, and if there is no price named in the bill, but may be by the food dictator, then Hoover makes the price. If this bill becomes a law, I hope it may have a price fixed in it below which no authority can go, for if you take away the farmers' market surely Congress ought to see that he has some guaranty left. I am glad the Senator in charge of the bill is so thoroughly in favor of putting a guaranty in the bill that he thinks it is already there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say to the Senator I am in favor of it.

Mr. REED. Very well. That is a very happy progress that we have made. Perhaps all this talk has not been in vain.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If there is no one who wishes to address the Senate this afternoon, I will move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. STONE. I hope the Senator will not press the motion for a recess at this moment. I have been asked by those interested that we may have a short executive session. The Senator's motion for a recess can follow it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would have no objection in the world to it except that some Senators on both sides of the Chamber wanted to know if anything was going to be done further than to take a recess until to-morrow, and I told them I thought not. In view of the fact that they have left with that assurance, I hope the Senator will not move an executive session until to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. It is not at all vital, and if the Senator from Oregon feels that he is under some obligation of the kind he suggests, I shall not insist on the motion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask for an executive session to-morrow, but in view of the statement I made to Senators who are absent I would not like to ask for it this afternoon.

Mr. STONE. Very well.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 17, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 17, 1917.

(Legislative day of Monday, July 16, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock m., on the expiration of the recess.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	Myers	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Smoot
Brandegee	Husting	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Thompson
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Tillman
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Townsend
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Poindexter	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kendrick	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Kenyon	Reed	Walsh
France	La Follette	Shafroth	Warren
Gore	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Gronna	McCumber	Sherman	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Simmons	Williams
Harding	McNary	Smith, Ga.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] are detained on important public business.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate on public business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is necessarily absent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the time will soon be here when this great food-control bill will be voted on in the Senate. Senators have gone very exhaustively into all sides of the question. I shall not attempt at this time to go into the merits of the bill.

I believe and hope that some sort of a food-control bill will be passed, whether in its present form, which seems to me to be entirely too comprehensive, or in some such form as the Gore amendment, which I much prefer and which limits the bill to food and fuel, is yet to be determined. The country, I believe, wants the bill. The President asks for it. The war warrants it, and it will probably become a law.

I do, however, have one suggestion to make, and I hope that this Congress will see fit to adopt it.

On Friday of last week the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] stated that it was exceedingly unfortunate that the Senate and the House of Representatives had so little opportunity to be informed about what the Council for National Defense and the advisory board were doing; further, that he thought it would be a helpful thing if these two bodies would from time to time, upon appropriate occasions, through methods that are proper and feasible, inform Senators individually or collectively of what was being accomplished by them. I believe that the Senator from New York is right. I believe that there should be the very closest touch between these men who are to have so much to do with running this country during the period of the war and the Congress, which alone can give them their powers and which alone can appropriate the money necessary to enable them to carry out these powers.

But I would go further than the Senator from New York. I would provide for a committee to be made up from both branches of Congress, whose business it would be to keep in touch with these boards and committees and controllers, who would find out for our benefit what they were doing and how these great appropriations were being used and who would give us the necessary information about future appropriations to be asked of us. The powers that we are granting under this very bill are enormous. They may or they may not prove beneficial to the country. If not, by the same token that we gave them we can take them away, and should we not be kept fully advised in case we may want to do so? We, and we alone, give these powers. We, and we alone, appropriate the money. We are elected to do so by the people of this country. Granted that the war demands a centralization of power that we have never before needed or dreamed of, surely we are not required so far to emasculate the powers given us under the Constitution that we may not be able to explain to the people who elected us the whys or wherefores of the legislation we have enacted or account to them for their moneys that we have appropriated.

There is now a resolution before the Senate introduced by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] providing for a committee on the conduct of the war. I am very much in hopes that the Senator from Massachusetts will introduce the subject matter of that resolution in the form of an amendment to this bill. If he does not do so, I shall offer a similar amendment myself. I should like to see it apply as soon as this bill becomes a law. I can conceive of no opposition to it. We in Congress are entitled to the information the committee would get. The advisory board would welcome it. I have talked with one of its members and have been assured of this. It has been suggested that the President is opposed to such a committee. I do not believe that this can be the case. I do not believe that the Chief Executive to whom we have delegated such great and unparalleled powers would wish to deprive a coordinate branch of the Government—the Congress of the United States—of the necessary means to enable it effectively to legislate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, more than a week ago the Legislature of Georgia passed a joint resolution on the subject matter relating to this bill and embraced in it. I wish to present the resolutions now to the Senate for its consideration. I ask the Secretary to read them in my time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolutions.

The Secretary read as follows:

Whereas the press carries to the country this morning the information that the United States has placed cotton and its products under Government control; and

Whereas cotton has not yet reached a price equal to the basis at which cotton goods have been and are now selling; and

Whereas the Government refused when, in 1914, the farmers sought its help when by reason of the European war starvation prices obtained for their product and ruin for owners of distressed cotton came; and

Whereas the Government, through its Interstate Commerce Commission, did relieve railroads for the same assigned war reason and allowed an increase in their rates, which was approved by the President; and

Whereas the Government did create a Bureau of Loans, and thereby protected the price of cotton at that time in the hands of speculators, gamblers, and exporters, and after refusing aid to the southern cotton growers; and

Whereas cotton has not yet reached a price which will make an equitable and evening-up price when the price of the last three crops are considered together; and

Whereas the present rise in prices is based on the natural demand for said product and the shortage in the supply of same, together with the poor prospect for the 1917 crops: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That it is the sense of the General Assembly of Georgia that there does not exist at this time any necessity for Government control of cotton prices.

Resolved, Second, that we protest against the Government touching the cotton prices at present, when it refused to aid us when we were in distress and needed help.

Resolved, Third, that it is absolutely unfair, unjust, and inequitable for the Government to control the higher prices of cotton unless it will aid the farmer when in distress and fix a minimum, remunerative, and profitable price above the cost of production.

Resolved, Fourth, that copies of this resolution be prepared and at once transmitted to the United States Senators and Congressmen from Georgia.

JOHN N. HOLDER,
Speaker of House.
E. B. MOORE,
Clerk of House.
SAMUEL L. OLIVE,
President of Senate.
DEVEREAUX F. MCCLATCHEY,
Secretary of Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, with the resolutions of the Legislature of Georgia I am in complete sympathy, yet if I favored this bill as it now stands I should not be for the resolutions. It is utterly useless, in my judgment, for the people who grow cotton to expect that the people of every other section of the country will submit to governmental control and regulation of their products and be willing to make an exception in favor of cotton, unless, indeed, the exception be made along lines that are clearly demarked by the application of general principles.

Of course, if the bill should be confined to food, or to food and fuel alone, then there would be no excuse for including cotton in its provisions; but if steel and iron and copper and everything else are to be included, there is no reason on earth why the cotton grower should expect a different treatment from what is accorded to these other products and commodities.

In 1914, Mr. President, when the European war broke out the bottom dropped out of the cotton market. We were about to market one of the largest crops that this country had ever produced. War was declared about August 1; the great part of the cotton begins to come in soon after that date, and early in September the market is usually almost glutted with it. The bottom did drop out of the price of cotton in 1914, and on this floor, in this Chamber, and in the other House of Congress, all sorts of schemes and proposals of a more or less utopian and socialistic nature were suggested to remedy the situation. Some people wanted the Government to buy cotton and to hold it for better prices; other people wanted the Government to lend the cotton growers money directly in order to enable them to hold their crops. None of those things was done, for the very good reason that it is almost impossible to discriminate between products in this country; and once the Government embarks in the project of financing the cotton crop, it will have to finance the potato crop, or the wheat crop, or the bean crop, and every other sort of crop that is grown and produced in the country.

There was one suggestion, however, made at the other end of this Capitol that, in my judgment, ought to have been adopted. Some of us who were not socialistic in our views, and who did not want any undue or unusual amount of Government aid, even in the face of that calamity, did insist that under the independent treasury system it had always been the policy of the United States Government to deposit money in the national depositaries at whatever point and place the industrial fabric was weakened or threatened. Repeatedly, under a general application of that rule we had sent enormous Government deposits to Wall Street.

Under a very recent—at that time—application of the rule we had deposited a large amount of Government funds in a certain bank in Washington to save another bank here. So in the House of Representatives certain of us insisted that, while we did not want any governmental loans to cotton growers and we did not want the Government to go into the business of buying and selling cotton, we did think in the period of great stress which confronted our people the Government of the United States ought by all means to send to the regular national bank depositories in the South a large sum of money as public deposits, so that those banks in turn might lend it to the farmers and they might thereby be enabled to hold their crop until things were stabalized and a bottom to the market was found. Even that was denied on the plea, expressed to me, that it was absolutely essential that the cotton crop of this country should be liquidated at the earliest possible date, because Europe was calling us for our loans at the outbreak of the war and cotton was the only thing that we had that was easily convertible into gold at that time. So nothing was done.

Naturally the cotton growers think that when you would not help them when they were in distress, when you opposed every scheme—and some of them were reasonable enough as business propositions, too—that could be suggested to aid them while they were facing ruin, now that the boot is on the other leg, you had better let them alone. They worked out their salvation when it looked like there was none, and the minute they get all right you propose to see that they do not charge our English cousins or somebody else too much for cotton that is grown in this country. It is an awful poor rule that does not work both ways.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Georgia will pardon me, I want to say that the wheat farmers of the West did not get a single dollar from the Federal reserve banks as a loan in order to enable them to hold their crop. It was understood that some money was sent to the South; that the cotton farmers did secure loans from the Federal Government. I am glad to have the Senator state the truth.

Mr. HARDWICK. We did not get any deposits that year. Next year, when we did not need it, they offered us some, and most of the banks in my State would not take it, in any considerable amount, at least.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator that the same condition that he has described as to the cotton crop existed in my State and in the western country generally with regard to wheat. The price of wheat was abnormally low; during the first part of the year 1914 it was down as low as 60 or 65 cents a bushel; but I did not notice that the Government came to the rescue of the farmers by offering to loan them money in order to hold their crops.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, our people feel that, inasmuch as you would not help them when they were drowning, it is better not to hinder them while they are prospering. I am in complete sympathy with them. If I were for this bill and for it on a wide enough scope and plan to embrace generally the products of this country, I think I would not ask that cotton be exempted; but, so long as I am against the bill, I am against putting anything in it—cotton or anything else—but even if we are to have a bill limited to foods and feeds, and fuels, there is certainly no reason whatever that cotton or any of the other products that are now included in the pending bill should remain in it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am much interested in what the Senator says, and I should like the Senator to give the Senate any reason why the wheat of the farmer should be limited in price more than the cotton of the farmer.

Mr. HARDWICK. I can give the Senator the reason, if he asks me to do so. Mind you, I do not think that the necessity exists for doing any of this, and therefore I am against the bill; but I can very well see how it might be true, and if it should be demonstrated before this debate is concluded to my satisfaction that it is true, that there is an absolute necessity that the food supplies of this country should be conserved and that food production should be stimulated, I could see why wheat, which is the principal food staple, should be treated very differently from cotton, which makes cloth; it is a different proposition entirely.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. To make a low price for wheat and to put wheat in the bill in order that a low price may be made certainly will not stimulate its production nor add to the food supply.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; that is true, but the professed object of the bill is to protect people from extortionate prices, to keep down prices. On the one hand, it is claimed for this bill that it is going to stimulate production and on the other it is going to prevent extortion. Well, it is a regular Mulberry Sellers proposition. We are going to help the consumer by giving him lower prices and help the producer by giving him higher prices. I should like to see it worked out, and I suppose we will all have that chance before the thing is over; but when the proposition is tested by actual experience, I think it is going to be "Dead Sea fruit" on the lips of some men.

So much for that. If I favored this bill as it stands to-day, I would favor leaving cotton in, but since I am opposed to the bill, I am opposed to putting cotton or anything else in. If I could support the bill at all, along any lines, it would be limited strictly to food, feeds, and fuels, and even in that event there would be no excuse for and no necessity for putting cotton in it.

Mr. President, during my temporary absence from the Senate the prohibition question came up in connection with this bill, as it comes up in connection with every bill of any importance before we finish its consideration. I did not have the opportunity of saying anything about what was proposed or what was done in the Senate at the time, and I do not care to say a great deal now, although my position is very well known to the Senate and to the people of my own State. I am not in favor of nation-wide prohibition, never have been, and unless I change my mind never will be, and I am not likely to change my mind. Prohibition is purely a local question that each State ought to settle for itself. At the same time a portion of the proposal pending in the Senate has my approval; at least I am willing to agree to it. There may be, it is conceivable that there is, a necessity to forbid the further distillation of alcoholic liquors during the period of this war as a food conservation proposal; indeed, if there is any necessity whatever for any of this legislation it is probably true that there is some such necessity with reference to the distillation of alcoholic liquors. So that I would support, and will support, a proposal to prevent and forbid further distillation of grains, and so forth, into liquors during the period of this war.

The Senate, however, went one step further. After determining to do that they decided that the only way to have real prohibition—not having, I think, the two-thirds majority necessary to pass a constitutional amendment—was to handle the whole business as a war measure, and to do the whole job as a war measure, and they undertook to do it. How? Not only by forbidding the further distillation of intoxicating liquors during the war, but by commandeering the present supply of liquor and paying for it a certain price and in accordance with a certain rule laid down in the amendment which was adopted. The professed object of commandeering it for the use of the Government was so that the whisky might be redistilled and be used for munition purposes to aid in the prosecution of the war. That proposition would be sound enough, and is sound enough, if two things are true. First, do we need it and have we not already ample supplies of alcohol for munition purposes; and, second, even if we have not an ample supply of alcohol for such purposes, can we possibly get it under this procedure; and if so, can we get it at a fair price?

In connection with that question, Mr. President, I desire to read a very short opinion which has been prepared at my request by one of the oldest and most valuable Government employees in the Internal Revenue Service, in which he takes the position that if we buy all the two or three hundred million gallons of whisky now in bond we can not use any of it for munition purposes. If that is so, I do not see where we are left with the proposition, except that we will incur the loss of enormous taxes and the loss of untold millions of dollars that we must pay out to buy this stuff, and I do not know how you can use that liquor, unless you are going to turn liquor sellers and sell it for beverage purposes, which, of course, we can not and will not do.

CONVERSION OF WHISKY INTO MUNITIONS IMPRACTICABLE.

Aside from the stupendous loss of revenue entailed in the Smoot prohibition amendment to the food measure—based under the proposed revenue bill upon $2.20 per proof gallon (50 per cent alcohol)—chemical and commercial authorities are of the opinion that the conversion of commandeered whisky into alcohol suitable for powder making would be wholly impracticable. Under the Army and Navy specifications for smokeless powder alcohol can not contain in excess of 0.01 per cent of acid (calculated as acetic acid) or leave more than 0.006 per cent of residue after evaporation, and must be otherwise absolutely pure, colorless, and odorless. In aged whiskies the charred staves of the barrel produce an amount of tannic acid, which alone is estimated to average twenty times more than such allowed minimum. To eliminate all objectionable acids, aldehydes, and ethers the alcohol redistilled from whisky would have to undergo further and more or less expensive chemical treatment, and it is considered extremely doubtful whether even then the neutral product essential for reliable smokeless powder could be obtained. Furthermore, as whisky distilleries do not have redistilling columns or alcohol stills such whiskies would have to be shipped to plants possessing the necessary apparatus, of which, comparatively speaking, there are but few, and the capacity of those has already been taken up for long future periods. Practically every barrel would have to be recoopered to prevent loss in transit, and box cars, to assure protection against theft and tampering of contents, would be required. In these times the transportaion problem alone would be a knotty one.

According to the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (which is the last available record for statistical purposes), there were on that date 228,677,773 gallons of whisky in distillery and general bonded warehouses. That the entries into and the withdrawals from bond during the succeeding 12 months would not materially change these figures is shown by the fact that on June 1, 1917, distilled spirits of all kinds in bonded warehouses, including fruit brandies, approximated that amount.

Figuring 47 gallons to the barrel would aggregate 4,865,485 barrels. These whiskies will average four years in bond and the governmental allowance for leakage, evaporation, etc., would be 9½ gallons per barrel, equaling 46,222,108 gallons, which, deducted from the original amount in bond, would leave 182,455,665 net gallons in warehouses.

Over 80 per cent of whiskies in bond are owned and controlled by at least 175,000 retailers and 5,000 wholesalers and jobbers throughout the country. The owners of such 80 per cent have paid as high as $1.25 per proof gallon in bond, and the warehouse receipts are changing hands by sale in the ordinary course of business almost daily.

Assuming conservatively that the average cost of such whiskies to the people holding the warehouse receipts would be 80 cents per proof gallon, original gauge, the Government's investment for the bare goods in bond would amount to $182,942,218.40, which, divided by $182,455,665—the net amount remaining in bond after deduction of the Government allowance—would make the whisky cost $1.0026 per proof gallon in bond. The average freight to the point of redistillation would be at least 2 cents per proof gallon, thus increasing such price to $1.0226 per proof gallon. In redistilling the whiskies into alcohol the production would average one-half gallon of alcohol, 190 proof, for each gallon of whisky redistilled, making the alcohol produced therefrom cost at that state $2.0452 per commercial gallon. The actual expense of redistilling the whisky into alcohol, without regard to the powder-making test, would be at least 5 cents per proof or 10 cents per commercial gallon, which would increase the cost of each gallon obtained by redistillation to $2.1452 per commercial gallon naked, plus cartage, insurance, freight, and other charges incidental to delivery of the product at Government arsenals or other powder works.

If the Government buys such whiskies from the owners thereof there would probably have to be included in the cost State and county taxes and storage, which are lawful liens against the whiskies in bond. This would add millions of dollars to the purchase price. No account of these and other contingencies has been taken in computing the above figures.

Alcohol guaranteed to meet the United States Government and its allies' specifications for smokeless powder, hospital supplies, and other war uses, can now be bought in the open market at less than $1 per commercial gallon.

It would cost you a good deal over $2 per commercial gallon this way.

In the above connection it is proper to note that if the Smoot amendment was intended to prohibit the manufacture and limit the distribution of drinkable alcoholic spirits during the war, it falls decidedly short of accomplishing that object for several obvious reasons, but principally because the suggested section, of which it is a part, refers only to foods, fruits, food materials, and feeds, whereas ethyl (potable) alcohol, easily made adaptable to abnormal beverage trade conditions and demands, is now manufactured in large quantities from sawdust and sulphite liquors (waste of pulp mills). It can also be readily made from other nonedible substances containing fermentable matter, and commercial chemists agree that if there be an adequate market therefor it can be produced without even resorting to a fermentable base.

So that, Mr. President, while, in my judgment, it is all right as a food-conservation proposal to forbid the further distillation of alcoholic liquors during the period of this war, it would be useless and worse than useless to undertake to say that we will commandeer the two hundred and odd million gallons that are now in bond on any theory or idea that it can be used, at anything like a commercial price, if at all, to make smokeless powder or any other munition of war. It seems to me that we had better stop about where we started and forbid the further distillation of alcoholic liquors during this war, leaving the stock in bond alone. We can not do anything with it, unless we want to take it over and sell it, and thus become the greatest whisky seller in all the world, and that is inconceivable.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to take just a moment of the Senate's time to refer to the statement that has just been made by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in relation to the prohibition amendment that has been adopted by the Senate to the pending measure.

I do not know who prepared the statement read by the Senator to the effect that it would be impossible to use the alcohol distilled from whisky in the manufacture of smokeless powder, nor do I know where the Senator got his figures as to what it would cost the Government of the United States to take over the whisky and liquors in bond. I do know, Mr. President, that the figures that were given me by men from the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, men who have this matter directly in hand, do not conform in any respect to the figures that have been given by the junior Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, that is exactly the source from which these figures came.

Mr. SMOOT. If this question comes up for discussion later—and it may after the conference report is made—I shall give the figures that have been given to me by the department, and there can be no question about them. When I asked the assistant of the commissioner for the information I told him that I desired the information to be used publicly, and I wanted it officially.

There has been a good deal said in the press about the cost that will result to the Government if my prohibition amendment is adopted. Mr. President, it is not going to cost nearly what I thought it would cost in the first place. It is not going to cost half what I said it would cost when I first offered the amendment; and as far as the Government of the United States is concerned, it will pay the actual cost of producing the liquors in bond, plus a profit not exceeding 10 per cent.

That does not mean that wherever there have been transfers made, in some cases a dozen transfers of the same liquor, and a profit made upon every transfer, the Government of the United States is not going to pay for profits made upon such transfers and figure it in as part of the cost of producing the liquors in bond. The amendment does not so state. The amendment is plain and unmistakable in its terms, and any officer of this Government in administering it will know just exactly what "cost" means.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he has any information that he himself regards as reliable as to whether or not, if you were to commandeer all of this whisky, you could really use it to make powder with?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no question, Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not mean "question"; I wanted the information, if the Senator has it.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, I have the information that we can.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to have the benefit of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say that as this matter is settled and can not be changed in the bill I think it is a waste of time now to go into it; but when the question comes up again I assure the Senator that I will have plenty of evidence that I think he himself will be satisfied with.

Now, Mr. President, as to the amount that the Government of the United States will have to purchase, if this bill does not become a law for 30 days longer, the way the withdrawals of liquor from bond are going on and have been going on for two weeks past, if it continues to go on, there will be mighty little liquor left in bond. The Government of the United States not only will receive the $1.10 per gallon that the distillers are paying now to take the liquor out of bond, but just as soon as the revenue bill passes and becomes a law they will have then to pay an additional $1.10 per gallon; and the Government of the United States will not sustain a loss, as far as revenue is concerned, with the exception of on that liquor which is in bond that under the law can not be withdrawn. So we need not worry over what my amendment is going to cost the Government of the United States, and I want to say now that if the amendment is adopted and the prohibition feature is left in the revenue bill, in my opinion the distillation of liquors in the United States for beverage purposes never will be allowed again. I think it will be settled, and settled forever. I think that is enough for me to say in relation to this question at this time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he sits down. I was not here during all of his remarks. How much does the Senator estimate now that the amendment which he offered to this bill will cost the Government?

Mr. SMOOT. If every gallon of distilled spirits that can not be withdrawn remains in bond and we pay the actual cost, plus a profit not exceeding 10 per cent, and we have the sworn statement of the distillers of the United States as to what it costs, it is not going to cost the Government of the United States, if we purchase it all, more than $70,000,000. I want to say now that the cost of all of the liquors that are in bond to-day, taking the testimony of the distillers that is in print, not at one time but at different times and places, and allowing increased cost under present conditions would not be over $70,000,000 to-day if we had to buy it at cost.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator take into consideration the fact that during the last few days there have been great quantities of liquor withdrawn from bond, and the Government tax paid upon it?

Mr. SMOOT. I have just referred to that matter.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I did not suppose that it would amount to $150,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I am saying that if all the liquor that is in bond that has not been there for four years remains, and the Government has to pay the actual cost of all of that liquor, and if it converts it into alcohol, it will not cost the Government of the United States, including the loss of tax and the cost of the liquors, more han $150,000,000.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest to the Senator that we have settled this question, and we are to commence to vote on this bill on Thursday, and there are quite a number of important amendments pending. There is one pending now before the Senate, a committee amendment, for which a substitute has been offered, and for four days we have been discussing everything under the sun except that amendment. Therefore I do hope——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator just heard me make the statement that I was not going to take the time of the Senate further, and I would not have spoken any longer if it had not been that the Senator from Colorado asked me a question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before the Senator takes his seat I want to say just a word with relation to this matter. It has been rumored, Mr. President, that the constitutional amendment absolutely prohibiting the manufacture of intoxicating liquors could be passed through Congress in the morning hour if the friends of prohibition would consent that the purchasing clause that has been inserted on the motion of the Senator from Utah be eliminated from the bill. I will ask the Senator whether it is his desire, if such a constitutional amendment could be passed, that that should be the case?

Mr. SMOOT. I had one distiller who is in favor of my amendment tell me that the distillers thought the constitutional amendment could not pass the House of Representatives, and if they could get rid of the prohibition amendments in the pending bill, by the Senate passing the constitutional amendment, all prohibition legislation would fail at this session of Congress.

I wish to say to the Senator that I have briefs from some of the best attorneys in this country showing that my amendment is constitutional, just as much as many other provisions of the bill are.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I voted for his amendment, but I am exceedingly anxious that a national prohibition amendment to the Constitution shall be adopted. While some people may think the House of Representatives will not indorse it, I am satisfied when that question comes up there they will indorse it by fully as large a majority, if not larger, than it would be indorsed in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the Secretary may state the pending amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the amendment of the committee, which is a new section 3. The Senator from Ohio offers a substitute.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I know some of the Senators are anxious to get to the point of voting on the amendments to the pending bill, but I will take a short time to make a few remarks on the very remarkable speech delivered in the Senate yesterday afternoon by the able Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I have very high regard for the Senator from Missouri; I admire his ability, and I have very warm personal friendship for him, and I shall not enter into any personal controversy with him about the grave charges and imputations he made yesterday; but I will not allow the occasion to pass without expressing my emphatic dissent from his very severe attack yesterday on Mr. Herbert C. Hoover. I do not want to remain silent under it. Mr. Hoover was well and ably defended by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], a Senator from the State of Mr. Hoover's residence, and I think his defense was adequate and sufficient; but I do not think the occasion ought to pass without some Senator other than a Senator from the State of Mr. Hoover's residence expressing his dissent from the attack upon Mr. Hoover and some of the charges made against him. I am not content for the occasion to pass without saying a few words on the subject for I am sure Mr. Hoover was unjustly assailed.

I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I had nothing to do with preparing or drafting the bill now before the Senate. I am in nowise connected with the handling or the management of the bill on the floor of the Senate, and I hold no brief for Mr. Hoover. I have not the honor of Mr. Hoover's acquaintance; I have never met him; I do not know that I ever shall. He has not consulted me about his plans and may never do so. I know of no reason why he should.

But what have we in regard to the food situation? Every country, other than the United States, which is engaged in the present gigantic war has some sort of food control; some system, with somebody in charge, for the judicious and economical control and handling of its food in order that its soldiers and its civilians may be as well supplied with food as possible under the circumstances, and in order to make the supply of food go as far as possible. Food is as important as munitions in the waging of war. A successful war can no more be waged without adequate food than without adequate munitions. This country is the only country engaged in the war which has not some provision of that kind, and I believe it is manifest that it is just as absolutely necessary for this country to have some provision of that kind as it is for each and every other country engaged in the war. We are confronted with just as extraordinary circumstances in the course of the war, the war means just as much to us, our responsibility is just as great, the duty rests just as heavily upon us to feed and provision our troops and to take care of our people as is the case with any other of the warring nations.

In addition to the war necessities of the occasion, it is undeniable that the cost of living in this country has increased enormously in the recent past; increased to a most unprecedented and outrageous extent, and our people who will remain at home need relief and care in that respect as well as the troops we shall send to Europe. Those at home will have just as important work to do and already ever-rising prices are beyond the reach of hundreds of thousands of our people.

Now, what arose under those circumstances: President Wilson, recognizing the necessity of some control of the production, distribution, and disposition of food in this country, called Mr. Hoover to the position of food commissioner. Some one had to be put in that position. Mr. Hoover, it appears, is a native-born citizen of this country. He has lived here all his life, except when away on business. I believe the debates disclose—and I only speak from them, for I have no personal knowledge, not knowing Mr. Hoover—that he has had more experience in food control than any other man in this country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or in the world.

Mr. MYERS. Yes; or in the world. There is no man in this country whom the President could have called upon to fill that extraordinarily important position who has had anything like the experience of Mr. Hoover. I believe that he did the greatest work which has been done during this war when he handled millions of dollars of contributions and saved millions of Belgians from death by starvation. He has had the experience; he is a successful man; he is a man of affairs; he has been engaged in different business ventures and undertakings in different parts of the world; he has had a world-wide experience in business, and particularly he has had experience in the business of food conservation, the particular experience which is necessary in the work to which he has been called. He was not only successful in the work in Belgium, but not a shadow of suspicion against his honesty or integrity has ever arisen. He not only handled that great mission successfully, but I have heard no question of his methods, his honesty, or his integrity in doing so.

The President called him to that position. What was he to do under the circumstances, as a patriotic American citizen? Should he have refused to serve? Suppose he had refused; what a miserable and wretched slacker he would have been. Then doubtless the charge would have been made against him that he was a slacker; if he had not come to the rescue of his country in the time of its dire need and distress, when his wide experience and valuable services were needed, that charge would have been just. He was able to give his services; he had had the experience; he was called; and what excuse would he have had if he had not responded to the call? Who would have excused him? He did respond and is now temporarily and ably discharging the preliminary duties of that highly important position, discharging them earnestly and devotedly, under a storm of criticism. Of course, until he is vested with authority by Congress he can only act in an advisory capacity. That is all he is undertaking to do, so far as I can learn.

I know of nothing else that he is undertaking to do. Of course, anything he says or does, until vested with authority by Congress, is merely advisory to the American people; and what harm is there in a man of special knowledge, skill, and experience on this subject advising the American people about how to conserve their food supply and make it go as far as possible?

He has given some suggestions to the management of the dining cars on the railroads of the country. Is there any crime in that? Is there any harm in doing so? Of course, it is only advice; there is nothing compulsory about it. The managers do not have to accept it; but if he can call their attention to methods by which food may be saved and waste may be avoided, and if the managers of the dining-car systems on our railroads are patriotic enough to follow his advice and avoid waste and save food, has not some good been done? Who will be hurt by it? Why complain of it? He has cautioned the people of this country against waste in food, merely by the way of advice, and for that he has been bitterly assailed as having committed a monstrous crime, an awful wrong. Oh, what an awful crime! What a monstrous wrong! Oh, what impudence in this time of war, when every resource is needed, when there is use for every grain of food; in this time of stress, in this emergency, oh, how wrong to advise the people of America not to be wasteful! Two or three years ago, when we were in a time of profound peace, before we had engaged in this awful war, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made a very able speech in the Senate advising the people of this country against waste and advising that less go into the garbage cans of the country. It was an able, thoughtful effort. He delivered words of wisdom, well spoken, and gave good advice to the American people, and he was lauded for it; he received credit for it all over the country. Nobody found fault with him; and yet it seems what was a virtue in the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is little less than a crime in Mr. Hoover, although the advice is now more needed than it was then.

Mr. Hoover has indulged in some advice to the American people in plain and homely language, such as to avoid a fourth meal. Of course, we all know the people of this country do not make a practice of eating four meals a day, but we know there are many people, especially among the wealthy and fashionable classes, who have their midnight suppers and their teas and lunches of afternoons. If he can impress upon them the advisability of dispensing with that indulgence and confining themselves, as do ordinary people to three sufficient and wholesome meals a day, is he not doing some good for the American people? Is he to be derided and held up to contempt and scorn and ridicule for it?

President Wilson urged this legislation, and I believe wisely urged it. If we do not adopt some legislation of this kind we will be the only nation engaged in this war that does not have it. We need it, or will need it, as badly as any of them.

The President brought it to the attention of Congress and recommended its enactment, and I do not believe anybody will undertake to charge President Wilson with wrongdoing or excessive zeal; with lack of fidelity, patriotism, care, and painstaking in the management of our affairs in this awful war. He is carrying the greatest burden that ever rested on the shoulders of a President and is doing it devotedly, faithfully, uncomplainingly; putting his whole energy, mind, body, soul, and life into it; and he is doing it to the satisfaction of the people. He has their confidence. They trust him. I believe his devotion to the welfare of our country and the success of our arms in this cause is beyond question by anybody, even though a few may differ from him in some of his policies. Where is the person who will say he has not our interests at heart? Congress was painfully slow in enacting the legislation recommended by him, and the President temporarily, in advance of and while waiting for legislation, designated Mr. Hoover as food commissioner, to make a food survey of the country, to coordinate our food resources; to bring the attention of the people of this country, in a preliminary way, while the legislation was being enacted, to the necessity and the wisdom of preserving and conserving our food supply, he knowing full well that anything that Mr. Hoover might say or do before the enactment of the needed legislation would be only of an advisory nature. Mr. Hoover accepted the trust and is only attempting to act in an advisory nature, and when the legislation may be enacted all that he will have power to do will be what Congress may give him. If you do not want him to have much power, you do not have to give him much power. He can exercise no more than may be given.

So, while the position is necessarily temporary and will last only during the existence of the war, yet during that time it will be virtually on a par with a Cabinet office. It will be endowed by Congress with certain powers, and the incumbent can exercise no more and should exercise no less. What he does will be subject to review and to approval or to be set aside by the President.

Whether it may be wise to intrust this extraordinary but necessary power to one man, a commissioner, or to a board, a commission, is a question which Congress must decide and must put into the form of legislation; but why a man who consents at a personal sacrifice to serve his country in an advisory capacity until Congress may determine how this trust is to be administered should be attacked so violently as Mr. Hoover has been attacked on the floor of the Senate, not only by one Senator but by a number of Senators, and not only on one occasion but upon a number of occasions, is beyond my comprehension, and it is repugnant to my sense of fairness and justice.

What have we here? We have a man, successful and patriotic, who has had experience; who has known and recognized ability; who has high standing; who has patriotism; who is devoting his entire time and talent and all of his skill and ability, everything he has, without compensation, without remuneration, to the welfare of his country, in the time of its dire stress and necessity, in a time when this country needs such assistance more urgently than it has ever before needed it in all of its existence since the time of the Revolutionary War. All that he has—his skill, his ability, his experience, his talent—all is laid upon the altar of his country and dedicated to his country in time of need and stress. Everything is devoted freely, and unselfishly, without compensation, to his country. Yet, as a result, not only by one Senator but by different Senators he has been denounced and held up to the scorn, contumely, contempt, and ridicule of the people of this country. He has been subjected to all the denunciation, sarcasm, scorn, contumely, contempt, and ridicule of a master of invective. Is it fair or right? I, for one, can not see the cause of it. Is it a just return for patriotic self-sacrifice? While, as I said, I am not personally acquainted with Mr. Hoover, not having met him, I believe that he is doing a patriotic, noble, and self-sacrificing work for the benefit of his country, a work of love and devotion, and that he is entitled to praise rather than condemnation. I would that we had more such men. While I have kindly personal feelings for the Senators who have attacked him and am not seeking controversy with them on the subject, I am at total variance with the attacks that have been made on Mr. Hoover. I have no sympathy with them. I regard them with disfavor. I have heard them day after day for weeks past, and I do not care to let this opportunity pass without expressing my emphatic dissent therefrom and my belief that they are wholly unwarranted.

I receive in my mail every few days letters from citizens of Montana, some of them men of prominence and known ability, others unknown to me but doubtless just as patriotic, offering their services to their country, saying they are ready to serve their country at any time, anywhere, or in any capacity, wherever they may be called, and some of them offering their services without remuneration. If they knew that men who do that are to be subjected to condemnation, held up publicly to ridicule, contempt, and sarcasm, they might not be so ready to offer their services; they might think that such services are not desired by the Members of Congress, and they might not feel so free to make the offer. Such offers should be encouraged and appreciated, not denounced and criticized. We should glory in such patriotism. It is of such material that wars are won. It is such men who make a nation great.

I believe that the people of this country want this legislation. As I have said, it may be a question whether the contemplated power should be intrusted to one man or to a number of men. I am strongly inclined to the belief that it would be better to intrust it to one man, a man who has had experience, a man who has been successful, a man who understands the business, a man who has initiative and decision, a man of firmness, a man of action, a man who can act decisively and promptly, without the delay incident to the proceedings of a board composed of several members, but, at any rate, be that as it may, I believe the people of this country want this legislation and want it quickly and without further delay. They are already impatient of the delay, and I do not wonder at it. Congress has sorely taxed their patience. Wrangling over Mr. Hoover and criticizing him does not give them what they want.

In a paper which reached me yesterday from Montana, the Great Falls Daily Tribune, one of the leading newspapers of Montana and of the entire Northwest, was a lengthy editorial urging this legislation and urging that it be speedily enacted. The editorial closes with this apt and terse language:

> For God's sake and your own, gentlemen of the House and Senate at Washington, say yes or no to the administration request for power to control the high cost of living, and do it pretty quick.

I believe that expresses the sentiment of the people of Montana. It expresses that of millions, I am sure, all over the country. I say let there be no more delay in this highly important matter. Quite to the contrary of some of the sentiments which I have heard expressed in the Senate is an editorial on this subject, written by Mr. Samuel Gompers and published in the July number of the American Federationist, which expresses my views on this subject, and which I will read. I think it worthy of publication in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It shows deep appreciation of the gravity of our situation, breathes lofty sentiments of patriotism and devotion to country, and shows commendable confidence in our honored President. It is thoughtful and broad minded. It is as follows:

> The food problem appeals to millions. The very roots of living have been affected as the prices of necessities have steadily risen in every market of the country. Nor is this alone a national problem. The probability of world-wide want makes immediate legislation to regulate food prices and distribution imperative.
> It is difficult for us as a Nation to grasp the meaning of that statement. With our boundless wealth and undeveloped resources we have never considered economy in the use of food or methods of stimulating production. But now all over this country thousands are feeling the pinch of want. Increasing prices for the necessities of life have made thousands of families alter family customs.
> It is now certain that the wheat crop of the world will be seriously below normal. The United States must feed the allies—that task will mean an unprecedented drain upon our food resources. We must also feed our own soldiers and civilian population. The task is stupendous and one with which our present agencies can not grapple. If methods and agencies are not developed that will enable us to control distribution and prices of the necessities of the people, prices will become prohibitive, and to imagine that the people will rest content under such conditions and work and fight on is unthinkable. The problem must be met with big constructive thinking, unprejudiced by previous methods.
> The food pirates have for months been diligently profiting through the needs of the people. Speculation has forced prices and food riots have already happened in this rich country. The Assistant Secretary of Agriculture tells that in a Polish district in Chicago within the past three months five women have committed suicide or gone insane—driven to that desperation through inability to feed their children.
> To-day speculators are trying to buy up crops before the plants are out of the ground. Speculators gamble on human needs. By creating human want these ghouls expect to coin enormous profits. Should our Government fail to establish control before crops move to the elevators and markets, the success of the war and the cause of human freedom for which the allies contend, will be imperiled.

Commercial, agricultural, and industrial conditions are abnormal. The normal checks of competitive conditions are lacking. The Government must interpose control in the interests of the people.

Legislation is pending in Congress to give us agencies to control the food situation. The Lever bill, to provide further for national security and defense by encouraging production, conserving the supply and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, is a war emergency measure. The bill establishes a number of agencies by which control over prices of necessities can be established by interposing a stabilizing force at some place in the distributive chain. It is not a bill to establish a food dictatorship, but to provide a way for food administration. Its purposes, broadly stated by the Committee on Agriculture, are to stimulate production, to reduce waste, to facilitate and clear the channels of distribution, to prevent hoarding, to assure fair prices, to eliminate injurious speculation, and to prohibit evil practices by food-gambling agencies. The legislation deals with foods, feeds, fuel, and articles required for production which are designated as necessities. It is proposed to authorize the President to license and regulate any business or importation, exportation, manufacture, storage or distribution of necessities in order to prevent uneconomical manufacture and inequitable distribution. The President is authorized to purchase or provide for the purchase and provide for the production or manufacture of necessities, to store and provide storage facilities for them, and to sell them, and also to requisition necessaries and storage space therefor and to fix reasonable prices. Power is bestowed on the President to regulate exchanges in order to prevent illegitimate speculation, and also to stimulate production by fixing a reasonable guaranteed price for necessities. This guarantee is made effective by authorizing the President to purchase such products, to use and dispose of them.

Of course it is realized that a law such as is proposed in the Lever bill is a wide departure from our American conception of governmental functions, but so is compulsory military service. We are not now living in normal times or conditions. The people and the Government of the United States have embarked on a venture to maintain and defend the principles of right, justice, freedom, and democracy for the peoples of all the world; we have entered into a war and pledged our man power and our resources to destroy imperialism and despotism from the face of the earth. In this titanic task there has arisen the financial pirates who gamble in and speculate with the people's essentials to their life, and therefore, aye, therefore alone, must the Government of our Republic come to the rescue of our people in this life and death struggle.

The broad powers which the Lever bill would delegate to the President are in accord with the spirit of our people, which regards the President of this Nation as the sentinel on guard to protect the rights and interests of the masses. He has always been found conscious of the needs, the desires, and the problems of the common people, and because of the confidence which millions feel in the President, based upon his course during his years in the office of the Presidency, it is believed and felt that the food problems can be safely entrusted to him and to his chosen representative, Herbert C. Hoover.

The legislation now before the House of Representatives will provide sufficient means for the months immediately following. The imperative problem is to secure the enactment of the Lever bill before July 1. After that date it will be too late to secure the full benefit of the legislation because contracts will have been made, control over the harvest will have been at least partially established, and Government regulation of prices will become a more difficult problem—a problem impossible of solution.

It is safe to say that there was never a measure before Congress that was of more immediate, vital interest to a greater number of people that the Lever food-administration bill. The demand from all parts of the country is for its immediate enactment. Food control means the maintenance of our allies in warfare; it means the maintenance of our own Army and our civilian population; it is a pivotal factor in the determination of the war. Congress can not afford to delay action on this measure and thus through inaction write over our food policy "To late."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I join with the chairman of the committee in the plea that we get down to the amendments to this bill and vote on them. There are a great many important amendments pending to be voted on by the Senate and there are others that will be offered. Time is slipping by pretty fast.

The amendment now before the Senate is section 3 and the substitute therefor offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. When the substitute was offered, Mr. President, on Saturday last I was very much inclined to believe that we should accept it and end the controversy over that section, but if the amendment is the same now as then offered, upon further reflection, for my part I can not vote for it, for it seeks to legalize the very things which we are trying to prevent.

Mr. President, I know that nobody wants in any way to prevent the Government having the advice and assistance of these great and successful business men of the advisory council, many of whom have come here out of the highest patriotic motives. There is a conflict between that situation involving the desire not to deprive the Government of the services of those men and the other question involved, which is a question simply of plain honesty—whether these men on the advisory commission, even if they do not make these contracts, should be permitted to secure contracts for their own firms.

I do not know just where we can stop and where we can draw the line. I do not believe that it is fair whenever this subject is referred to for some one to suggest, as has been suggested on the floor, that discussions of this kind simply "cheer the Kaiser." It must be that the American people have some right to have contracts fairly and honestly entered into for the purchase of Government supplies without "cheering the Kaiser." I think the language of former Attorney General Wickersham about the Kaiser explains how all of us feel in that regard; but when it is openly charged in the country, as I am going to take a moment or two to show, by distinguished Members of Congress in public speeches that members of the advisory commission are securing contracts with their own firms for prices in advance of bids for the same work from those who are not connected with the council, it certainly is proper to refer to it.

I send to the desk and ask to have a few sentences read from a speech of Representative GOOD, one of the leading Members of the House of Representatives, second in rank on the great Appropriations Committee, a man who has a genius for figures, a man who is exceedingly accurate in all of his statements, one of the best public servants in the Nation. At Cedar Rapids, Iowa, Tuesday night, I think it was, of last week, he made a speech so startling in its statements that I wired Mr. GOOD to know if the statements as published were correct, as I wanted to call attention to them on the floor. I will follow the reading of the article by the telegram from Mr. GOOD, and the citation of figures to which he referred.

I will ask the Secretary to read the part of the statement I have marked in ink.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUSTING in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Chairman Fitzgerald, of the lumber committee, is one of the influential lumber kings. This committee bought lumber from all the firms who had representatives on the lumber committee at from $1 to $5 a thousand feet above the lowest bid made by firms who did not have representatives on the committee.

What is true of the committee on lumber is equally true of the committee on metal and on coal.

THE GRAFT IN COAL.

The price of coal in February, 1916, at the mines, bought for the Government, was $1.94 per ton. The coal committee chairman, Mr. Peabody, and members of other large coal barons, jumped the price to $4.86 per ton at the mines. On May 5, 1916, it was $1.59; on May, 1917, $4.40; on May 18, 1916, $1.42 to $1.56; on May 18, 1917, $5.08 to $5.54. This is the work of the coal committee of which Mr. Peabody is chairman. How generous of such men to "serve the Government without pay." Because of them and their greediness many a family will feel the pinch of the frost and the cold during the coming winter.

AS TO SHOES.

The committee on shoes bought 2,610,000 pairs of Army shoes. Mr. McElwain, head of the great McElwain Shoe Co., is chairman of the committee. He bought a hundred thousand pairs of shoes from his company, the McElwain Shoe Co., at $5.17½ per pair and sold them to the Government at that figure, which was 15 cents a pair more than the lowest bid made by shoe men not represented on the committee. Other big shoe manufacturers represented on the committee made similar profits McElwain's company made $68,000 more than it would have made had he not been a member of that national defense act committee.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, before calling the attention of the Senate to that matter, I wired Mr. GOOD to know if the statements were correct. I will read his answer. The message is a little garbled:

Sent data on shoe contract July 12. Republican account—

That is the Cedar Rapids Republican—somewhat garbled. Six hundred and ten thousand pairs original marching shoe purchased. Low contract awarded at $5.09½ per pair. W. H. McElwain Co. awarded 100,000 pairs at $5.17½, or 8 cents more per pair than low contract. Brown Shoe Co., represented by John A. Bush, on committee, awarded 50,000 pairs at $5.24 per pair. Department purchased 1,500,000 pairs new field or trench shoe, with heavy hobnails and steel plates. Low price, $4.64½—

That is, per pair—

McElwain Co. awarded 400,000 pairs at $4.79½, or 15 cents in excess of low-contract price.

JAMES W. GOOD, M. C.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I merely desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if he has made any inquiry, or if Representative GOOD made any inquiry, as to whether or not the speed in filling these contracts had anything to do with the discrepancy in price?

Mr. KENYON. I do not know as to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course under certain specifications that is an exceedingly important factor.

Mr. KENYON. I hope that there is some explanation of that kind, and I am calling the attention of the Senate and the country to it in order that Mr. McElwain or his company may make such explanation as Congress is entitled to have.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa a question similar to that addressed to him by the Senator from New York. Has the Senator from Iowa inquired, or does he know, whether the quality of these shoes was the same, whether the workmanship was the same, and whether the specifications were the same?

Mr. KENYON. Of course the quality of the workmanship must have been the same, because——

Mr. POMERENE. Well, does the Senator know as to that?

Mr. KENYON. I will demonstrate to the Senator, if he will just wait a moment. There are three types of shoes by specification numbers—1206, which is the original marching shoe; 1257, the new field or trench shoe, heavy, with hobnails and heelplates; and 1258, the revised marching shoe.

Now, take that particular type, 1206. The contracts are let to some eight or nine different concerns. They are for the same kind of shoe. In the case of 1206, the lowest bid is $5.09½ a pair, by C. A. Corbin, of Webster, Mass. He received a contract for 25,000 pairs. Now, it runs along up to the McElwain Co., of Boston, Mass., 100,000 pairs at $5.17½ a pair.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator whether he possesses any information which would enable him to say whether or not that firm whose bid was the lowest could make or deliver within the time they were required any more shoes than they did?

Mr. KENYON. I have not such information.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Frequently, you know, if you have a million pairs or sets or bushels of a thing to get you can get only 25,000 from one man at a certain price, and you must take more from somebody else at a higher price, and perhaps still more from yet somebody else in order to secure all you want by the time they shall be needed.

Mr. KENYON. That may be true. I notice that Rosenwasser Bros., of Long Island City, N. Y., have a contract for 100,000 pairs, at $5.10 a pair; Eaton & Co., of Brockton, Mass., 50,000 pairs, at $5.12½. It may be that there are some explanations of that kind that can be made, but it simply does not look good on the face of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I could not hear the interrogatory which was addressed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the Senator from Iowa, and it may be that this matter was covered in his question; but the time of delivery is often the essence of these contracts. There is not anything to indicate whether any or all of these men have bid up to their full capacity, and there are many circumstances which might enter into the price which is to be charged for these shoes. I do not know these contractors, but I have had some little experience with some men who have been trying to contract with this department, who have been saying that they have been dealt with unfairly; and the only ground for complaint which they had was that they did not get the lion's share of these contracts. It seems to me that in this way many of these things could be explained. It is an easy matter to question the good faith of a man acting in a public capacity; but until I can get some evidence which to my own mind shows that these men have been acting unfairly and have been financially benefited, I am willing to wait before I condemn them. If, on the other hand, they have been guilty of anything which has been derogatory to the interests of the Government, I will go as far as the Senator from Iowa or any other Senator in trying to bring them to book.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I do not want the Senator to imply by his statement that I am condemning all of these men. I am seeking for information; but these statements of Congressman GOOD seem to me to present such a situation that Congress ought to take some note of it. I shall myself, I think, unless I can get the information otherwise, offer a resolution to investigate a transaction of this character, and I think these statements ought to be specific as to specific transactions, so that the whole board will not be involved in any indictment that might be made.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to say that I agree with the Senator entirely that if there has been any favoritism or discrimination of any kind, on this subject or any other subject, I should be glad to have the investigation, so that we may know the facts.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I really wanted to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. The Senator refers to complaints that he heard of on account of people not having gotten the lion's share. I should like to ask the Senator if he has heard of any complaints of that character from any of the members of these committees that have had to do with the placing of orders?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I have not; it has come from outsiders who came protesting that they had been treated unfairly, and when I went to investigate I found that they had contracts for a very substantial part of the supplies which the department was ordering.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator has not heard of any complaints from members of these subcommittees to the effect that they themselves have not fared well, has he?

Mr. POMERENE. I have heard nothing said on that subject, except some criticism of an indefinite character.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I shall have to have pretty conclusive proof to demonstrate that these citizens who compose the different parts of the advisory commission are in Washington for the purpose of letting contracts to themselves and making money——

Mr. KENYON. Well, Mr. President, wait a minute. If the Senator rose to make that observation in my time as indicating that I have charged any such thing, he is entirely mistaken. He evidently has not been here while I have been talking.

Mr. WEEKS. No; that is a preliminary to the suggestion I am going to make. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Iowa just suggested that rumors of this kind which have come to him and come to others should be investigated for every public reason. This morning the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] referred to the same matter very pertinently, it seemed to me, and he suggested that unless I were going to offer as an amendment to this bill the proposition which I introduced in April, relating to a committee on the conduct of the war, he thought seriously of doing it. I want to say, Mr. President, that I think I have shown reasonable patience in waiting for a report of the Committee on Rules on that proposition.

Anyone who knows anything about the situation here knows the reason it has not been reported back to the Senate; the fact remains that it has not been done, and it is my purpose to offer it as an amendment on this bill. Every day there are questions coming up here which demand public consideration, about which the public is entitled to information. There is one question which is bound to come up for investigation; it appears pretty nearly every day in the newspapers—I refer to the operations of the Shipping Board. They have literally become a public scandal. The most important development which we have before us is the creation of enough shipping to take the place of that which is destroyed every day; and yet contracts have been tied up for three months, owing to disagreements about which I do not propose to express an opinion here now, but which have prevented action. Now, the public, which is perfectly willing to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for these purposes, is entitled to some action; and if the President does not take it, then there should be a committee in session which will investigate, without any further motion from anyone, such matters of public importance.

Mr. KENYON. I am very glad the Senator interjected that in my remarks. He is exactly right, and I hope he will secure the adoption of that amendment. I can not understand why anybody should oppose it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. Let me proceed just a word or two more, and I am done.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator yield for just a question?

Mr. KENYON. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say that I have served in the other body with Mr. GOOD, of Iowa. There is no Member of that House more careful, more painstaking, in regard to the correctness of a report than Mr. GOOD. The Senator from Massachusetts said that until he was reasonably sure that some one of these gentlemen had profited by a transaction of this kind he would not believe it. Now, I do not know Mr. McElwain; I do not know whether he is engaged in the shoe business or not; but if Mr. McElwain secured a shoe contract and was paid 15 cents per pair more than any other bidder, is there any doubt in anybody's mind that he did make an extra profit?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to correct the Senator from North Dakota. I did not say he was paid 15 cents a pair more than any other bidder, but 15 cents a pair more than the lowest bidder. I think it ought to be said, in fairness to Mr. McElwain or his company, that there were some bids of even a higher price than his, and some part of the contract was let to them.

Mr. GRONNA. I stand corrected, then; but even at that statement, the man making the lowest bid would certainly know his business and he would not bid to make a loss.

Mr. KENYON. Well, it is rather unfortunate that in the case of the one who is on the advisory commission his firm secures a contract at 15 cents a pair higher than the lowest bid from a man who is not on the advisory commission.

Now, I want to refer to that same type of shoe, 1206. The Brown Shoe Co., of St. Louis, Mo., obtained a contract for 50,000 pairs at $5.24 a pair, even higher than the McElwain Co. Then, turning to the interesting statement of the committee, we find that Mr. John A. Bush, of the Brown Shoe Co., of St. Louis, Mo., is a member of this advisory committee on shoes and leather.

On type 1257, the McElwain Co. obtained a contract for 400,000 pairs at $4.79½ a pair, while the lowest bid was that of E. H. Weyenberg, of Milwaukee, 100,000 pairs at $4.64½ a pair. There are 400,000 pairs at 15 cents a pair more than this lowest bid. Now, I want to be fair about everything, and I want to say that there are bids above the $4.79½ a pair, running to $4.85 a pair, from four or five companies, and they received portions of these contracts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator from Iowa will pardon me if I interject a remark about the McElwain Co.—that there is no better and only one or two larger shoe-manufacturing concerns in the United States. I assume that in letting those contracts it was necessary to give them to a great many manufacturers——

Mr. KENYON. It evidently was.

Mr. WEEKS. Because one manufacturer, with his ordinary, normal orders, could not nearly supply the demand. While I know nothing about the price, I am confident that anyone connected with the McElwain Co. is not guilty of any double dealing with the Government, but is trying the best he can to help the Government.

Mr. KENYON. I want just to refer to an article in the editorial columns of the Wall Street Journal of June 25, 1917, showing that the McElwain Co. is nowhere near the rocks:

> Some of the big shoe manufacturing concerns are quite in the running with the steel and equipment companies as regards the phenomenal profits, if the records hung up by the W. H. McElwain Co. are any criterion. This big concern in the year ended May 31 far surpassed any previous year in its history.
> It is understood that net sales were in excess of $28,000,000, an increase of over $3,600,000, or 15 per cent, compared with the 1916 year next. * * *
> The most remarkable showing in the year just closed, however, was made in net profits, which were in excess of $2,000,000. This compares with the previous high record of $904,019, established in 1916, and represents an increase of over 100 per cent.

Mr. President, I have just referred to these things, because I have felt it a duty. I am getting a little tired, myself, whenever we refer to anything of this character, of having some one rise on the floor and accuse us of trying to block the war, or trying to cheer the Kaiser, as I have heard from a distinguished Senator here that if this organization is torn down it will carry great cheer to the Kaiser. Nobody wants to tear down that organization. I have said before, and say now, that there are patriotic men there; but I believe there are a few men there also who are endeavoring to use their positions to get contracts for their concerns from the Government; and as the President so well said the other day, it is time to divorce profits and patriotism. No man can serve two masters and serve both faithfully.

I have brought these figures here showing that a great concern represented on the advisory commission has a contract for 400,000 pairs of shoes for our soldiers at 15 cents a pair above the low bid and considerably above other bids that run along. Now, I just put that in here for what it is worth. I am not trying to injure the war in any way. I believe this war can be fought by democracy, and fought honestly. The American people are entitled to know all about these contracts. They are entitled to know all about this war. It is their war. It is not anybody else's war.

I join with the Senator from Massachusetts in the hope that his resolution for a joint committee of Congress may be brought up and passed or attached to some bill. These little straws show the direction in which the wind is blowing, and they show the necessity for something of that character.

I ask permission to attach to my remarks an editorial from the Wall Street Journal, from which I have read extracts and also figures as to bids obtained by Congressman Good from Capt. Wonson, of the Quartermaster's Department, War Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

W. H. MCELWAIN CO.—NET INCREASE 100 PER CENT—YEAR ENDED MAY THE LARGEST—SHOE COMPANY'S NET SALES OVER $28,000,000 AND PROFITS $2,000,000—EARNINGS AFTER PREFERRED DIVIDENDS 60 PER CENT ON COMMON STOCK.

BOSTON.

Some of the big shoe manufacturing concerns are quite in the running with the steel and equipment companies as regards the phenomenal profits, if the records hung up by the W. H. McElwain Co. are any criterion. This big concern in the year ended May 31 far surpassed any previous year in its history.

It is understood that net sales were in excess of $28,000,000, an increase of over $3,600,000, or 15 per cent, compared with the 1916 year. Sales of this company have year in and year out shown a steady and consistent growth. In 1913 they first crossed the $20,000,000 mark. In five years they have increased more than $11,000,000.

The most remarkable showing in the year just closed, however, was made in net profits, which were in excess of $2,000,000. This compares with the previous high record of $904,019, established in 1916, and represents an increase of over 100 per cent. These net earnings were also after allowing liberal charges for depreciation.

After providing for dividends on the first and second preferred stocks, earnings were equivalent to over 60 per cent on the $2,500,000 common stock outstanding May 31. The outstanding stock was increased by $500,000 in May, so that the earnings on the average amount out during the greater part of the year were nearer 70 per cent than 60 per cent. The company paid the usual dividends of 6 per cent on the first preferred stock and 9 per cent on the second preferred, but 12 per cent was paid on the common stock, against 3 per cent in the 1916 year.

The company put into effect a profit-sharing scheme for superintendents and foremen, in which 187 people participated, and profits amounting to $200,000 divided.

The company increased net quick assets by approximately $1,600,000 in the last year. They now amount to over $156 per share of first preferred stock. The company retired $150,000 of first preferred stock during the year, and will shortly retire $50,000 more.

Liabilities will probably show an increase this year, owing to the fact that the company has a large stock of materials and merchandise on hand to insure its supply and profits against the very large orders for shoes on its books.

It is understood that the company has $12,000,000 of unfilled orders on hand. Possibly $3,000,000 of this represents contracts for Army shoes. In the business of the past year practically no Government work figured. It was essentially all normal domestic business. Orders now on hand are sufficient to insure full operation of the McElwain factories through the fall. (Editorial, Wall Street Journal, June 25, 1917.)

ENLISTMENT OF ALIEN RESIDENTS.

Mr McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and ask that it may be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. As it deals with a most important subject, I ask that it may be read before being referred to the committee. It is very short.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 83) looking to the enlistment of certain alien residents in the Army of the United States was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas there are in the United States a vast number of subjects and citizens of the several European nations now waging war against the allied central powers of Europe; and

Whereas nearly all of said subjects and citizens have emigrated to this country either for the purpose of becoming citizens thereof or for the purpose of securing the benefits of the greater wages and better opportunities afforded in this country, which opportunities have been created, defended, and maintained by the energies and sacrifices of the American people; and

Whereas it is the moral and patriotic duty of said subjects and citizens to support the several governments to which they owe allegiance in the desperate warfare in which such governments are engaged; and

Whereas the United States is also engaged in war against the said central powers for the protection of the rights of the several nations so waging war against the said central powers, as well as its own sacred rights; and

Whereas it is most unjust to ask or require the American people to sacrifice their sons, their brothers, and their treasure in battling for the mutual rights and welfare of all the other nations prosecuting this war against the said central powers, while their own subjects and citizens in vast numbers enjoying in this country the special and wonderful industrial opportunities which this war affords them are wholly relieved from service or sacrifice: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, empowered and requested to immediately propose to all European nations engaged in war against the said central powers, and, if possible, secure from them an agreement authorizing and empowering the United States to apply the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, to all such subjects and citizens domiciled in this country in the same manner and to the same effect as such provisions are applied to the citizens of the United States in selecting and raising an army or navy for service in the present war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To what committee does the Senator from North Dakota wish to have the joint resolution referred?

Mr. McCUMBER. To the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so referred.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, of course I know nothing about the details of the contract to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has referred, and I agree with him in this respect, that I would like to have any question of that kind investigated. If the contract as let will not stand investigation, then those who are responsible for it should suffer the penalty. But we can not on a mere statement of a contract being let at a higher price let that question stand without some kind of an answer.

About 25 years ago the older of two brothers named McElwain, a shoe salesman without influential friends and without capital, leased machinery, borrowed a little money, and started a shoe-manufacturing business in Massachusetts. He lived 20 years, and when he died he left the third largest shoe-manufacturing establishment in the United States, which is now managed by his surviving brother.

The point I wish to make is that no such industry can be developed in any community unless the men connected with it are of the highest standing in that community, without their being honest and doing all their business in an honest way. Nothing would make me believe that anybody connected in an important way with the McElwain Co. would do a dishonest act or take a position in connection with governmental affairs which would be for the purpose of promoting the letting of contracts to themselves out of which they could make an undue or unreasonable or unrighteous amount of money.

My statement, of course, is made without knowing anything about the details of this case; but I wish it to be investigated, because I dislike to see honest men pilloried before the country, without any intent to do so on the part of any Senator, giving the impression that they are using their official position for personal reasons without its being investigated and proven or disproven.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to make an observation in connection with what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] have said in reference to the unfortunate situation which confronts us at the very beginning of our war. It seems rather melancholy that we should at the very beginning of this war be hearing of charges of overreaching and sinister influences and, to use a common phrase, "grafting." If we are hearing of those things at the very beginning, it is hard to tell what will be the situation after we have run along for a year or two.

It devolves upon Congress to avoid that situation, and it seems to me that the bill ought to contain somewhere and in some way provisions for the creation of a tribunal whose business it will be to pass upon these contracts and to pass upon these prices, a tribunal which will interpose between the Government and those who have the goods to sell. These men, I understand, have been called from the different parts of the country to sit as advisory members of the Council of National Defense, or something in that capacity, and doubtless their judgment and their opinion and their advice are supposed to be valuable, but that is no reason, Mr. President, why a situation should be permitted to continue which will give constant rise to criticism whenever these contracts are made or these prices are fixed. In other words, there ought to be some tribunal, some body which will pass upon these contracts which will have no interest in the situation other than the fixing of a fair price and the approval of a fair and honest contract.

I offered an amendment some time ago to this bill providing for the creation of such a tribunal. I did not think at the time that the amendment was perhaps sufficient in all respects to cover the entire situation, but out of it I have hoped that something would be organized and developed so that we could have a fair tribunal to pass upon these contracts and prices. If we do not have that, we will have scandal from now on, whether it is based upon real facts or not.

I had brought to my office some three days ago what was stated to be the data or information with reference to another contract. If that information was correct—and I have no reason to believe that the man who gave it to me was giving something that he thought was incorrect; in other words, he supposed at the time it was correct—it is an intolerable contract. it is an indefensible situation, and while I am not going to discuss it nor give the facts, because I do not feel justified in doing so upon such information as I have now without making my own investigation, yet these things will be constantly arising and good men will be vilified and good men will be criticized. On the other hand, I have no doubt but that there will be times when they ought to be criticized. If there is not some tribunal which will take off the obligation and responsibility of passing upon these contracts, a tribunal which will have no interest in the contracts whatever, we will have this situation to continue during the entire war.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I think it is very wise that Congress take cognizance of these reports and do what it well can to avoid scandal or corruption in the course of this war. I hope, however, that there will no resolution be passed forbidding the purchase on the part of the Government of supplies from any of the concerns represented by gentlemen who have been drafted into the service as advisors at this time.

The fact of the matter is, as I understand it, these men have been called into the service; they are not volunteers, but they have, in fact, been ordered in because of their proven ability and extensive business experience. They are connected with large business, perhaps the largest businesses of the country, and without their concerns it is altogether improbable that the supplies of the Government could be purchased in sufficient quantities and in proper time to meet the extraordinary demands of the present emergency.

I agree with Senators on the proposition that any man connected with the Government should be prohibited from making a contract for profit with himself to furnish supplies, but this committee is nowhere authorized to make contracts with itself. It is an advisory council or committee, as its name implies, called in to advise with the heads of the departments who are authorized to make contracts.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a moment. If there be fraud, it occurs to me that it will be properly chargeable to those officials of the Government who are authorized to make contracts. It is the principal and not his advisor who is held responsible. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. These men are called in an advisory capacity, and it is presumed that their advice will have weight and that their counsel will have effect and influence, or they would not be there. While it is true that technically these contracts are made by the head of the department, yet does the Senator think it is a tolerable situation to have men sitting there, advising there, day after day, and counseling upon these matters which finally result in the making of a contract in which they may be interested? Suppose, for instance, that a member of the Supreme Court who was interested in a lawsuit would nevertheless, while not joining in the decision, join in the discussion and the councils and the consideration of the case before it was finally rendered.

There must be some other means by which to settle these contracts than the one which is now desired or you will have the public of the opinion that this advice and this counsel is effective for consummating these contracts.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, Mr. President, the example the Senator from Idaho suggests, comparing the Supreme Court, is not at all applicable here, it seems to me, although a court would not be excused for advice of counsel. This is an extraordinary occasion, and, as I said at the beginning, it is altogether improbable that the Government could purchase its supplies in a sufficient amount without the aid of these gentlemen.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator allow me to answer the Senator from Idaho, please?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. They did not want to come here. They have been called here to give their advice to the heads of the departments. If they are corrupt, if that advice is such as to show that it is detrimental to the Government, the heads of the departments ought not to have them for a moment. If it shall turn out by investigation that McElwain & Co. or any of these others have overreached the Executive and have really induced the purchase of supplies at an unreasonable and improper price, it shows not only that they are unfit but that the heads of the departments are unfit to administer the duties of their positions.

If it is true, as has been intimated, I do not say by the Senator from Idaho, but by people generally, a good many people, that unconscionable contracts have been forced upon the Government, then the Congress should know that fact, and the sooner it is disclosed the better.

But I can not conceive that the class of men, some of whom I know personally, who are serving the Government in this great emergency without pay, could be guilty of wrong dealing with the Government. It is easy for me to imagine and to know that there are flocking to this capital at this time a host of vultures looking for contracts, and who, because of their disappointment many times are circulating all kinds of reports as to corrupt conditions. I know what some of those people have said. I have listened to some of their tales of woe, and upon investigation I have found that they were not well founded, but that the department through its advisers was acting under all the circumstances in the best and most efficient manner possible, taking into consideration the fact that they had to have goods of a certain kind, and that they had to have them within a reasonable period and of sufficient quantity to meet the demand. All those things have to be considered, and I have no doubt they are considered.

I am not saying what I am saying now for the purpose of trying to excuse any corruption, because I think it should be condemned at the beginning, and the punishment can not be too severe. I am in accord with what the Senator from Idaho says, that there ought to be some power not only for the safety of the Government but for the protection of the heads of departments who have these matters in charge—some power to pass upon these contracts, and know that the Government is not being overreached. I had supposed that the heads of the departments constituted such a power. I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask the Senator a question. He says without these gentlemen who are men of large interests the Government could not get the supplies. Did it ever occur to the Senator that the Navy Department buys all of its supplies on competitive bidding without the slightest desire to have the aid of the Council of National Defense? They do not have any trouble about getting supplies at reasonable prices. The Council of National Defense really applies only to the War Department of the Government, and it does not apply to the Navy Department, because the officer in charge of the supplies and accounts runs his own department, buys probably $10,000,000 of supplies a day without consultation, let, or hindrance, and the great manufacturers and owners of materials sell to that department with the greatest ability every day. Did that ever occur to the Senator?

Mr. TOWNSEND. No; I do not know all that. But I do know that some of the greatest reported scandals that are extant to-day are connected with the Navy Department, with the purchase and building of ships, and with obtaining supplies that are needed for the Navy. I know that to be true. I do know this also, and I have taken a good deal of consolation out of the fact that some men of business experience and well-established probity of character have contributed in this fateful hour to the success of our country. I have great confidence in many of them. But, as I said on the floor of the Senate not long ago, I realize that this is the opportunity for grafting. The Government must be eternally vigilant or else the greatest scandals ever heard of will occur and will really threaten the success of the war itself. I know that, but it seems to me we ought to be exceedingly careful about saying or doing anything that will reflect upon honest men who are rendering great service to their country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are those of us who oppose the situation as it now exists, not because we assail the individual integrity of these men, but because we do not think it wise to start into this war in violation of the great underlying principle of honesty that a man should not be permitted to contract with himself. It is true, as the Senator says, that technically he does not do that, but substantially he does it. Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that the Government will suffer no actual financial loss; let us accredit these men with honesty and patriotism. Is there not some way to avoid having a lot of men selling millions of dollars of property to the Government upon their own counsel and advice?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Let me ask the Senator, does he advocate now that no member of the advisory council shall be permitted or that no firm or corporation with which any member of the advisory committee is connected shall furnish any supplies to the Government?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not advocate that, but I advocate this proposition, that there must be a tribunal or a body created for the purpose of passing upon these contracts which will have no interest whatever in the making of the contract or in the fruits of the contract, and which will act in a quasi judicial capacity.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that, although that would take the place of the executive department, which has that power now.

Mr. BORAH. It does not take the place of the executive department, because these men are called here and made a part of the executive department. They are advisors of the executive department. They are there from day to day advising and counseling with them, and when the contract is finally consummated it is hard to tell whether it is the award of a contract with the head of the department or the advisory council.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How is that different from your board?

Mr. BORAH. It will differ in this, that these people will not be there as advisors and counselors on this board at all—for instance, the Federal Trade Commission or any other body—and the public will have an opportunity to be heard before that tribunal as well as the men who are making the contract. The men who are here to compete will have an opportunity to know all the facts and will not feel that they are dealing with an interested body.

Now, this matter was brought to me the other day: It was an instance in which the contract was not made public, in which they refused to have it made public, and which it is impossible to get the actual facts about, although it was a contract made with a member of the advisory council. I say that is an intolerable and an indefensible situation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Any safeguard that can be thrown around governmental affairs will, of course, meet with my hearty approval. I know everything ought to be done to guard against corruption of any kind, but nothing has been suggested thus far, to my mind, that would absolutely insure that condition. We have to vest with the President or the Cabinet officers the power to do certain things. They must pass upon these contracts. If it is not advisable to have a council of advice composed of the men who as a rule all must concede are of the highest character and ability, then of course we should undo our action in creating a Council of Defense and advisory board. I repeat, however, that these men have no legal power to contract with themselves or with anyone else.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question? What is the necessity of this advisory council? What function does it perform, or what service does its members discharge? What is it they do?

Mr. McKELLAR. For the Government?

Mr. BORAH. For the Government, exactly. What are they there for?

Mr. TOWNSEND. They are there, as I understand it, because of their superior ability, their better acquaintance with the particular special needs of the Government in this emergency. At this time, for instance, here is a case that came to my attention which impressed me very strongly. We were troubled about getting some coal for a manufacturing concern in the State of Michigan, which is manufacturing goods for the Government and has been for some years. I had worked with the various departments of the Government to get some relief but to no avail. Everything had been done, but no success. The Government was practically commandeering certain roads and certain trains and certain cars. I took the matter up directly with Mr. Willard, the president of the transportation end of the National Defense Council, and he having a familiarity with the conditions pertaining to transportation, which has since been demonstrated on a very large scale throughout the United States as directly traceable to him, succeeded in relieving that situation within 48 hours. Under him and through his advice there has been a mobilization of cars, a distribution of cars where needed, that I do not believe could have been accomplished by anybody not familiar directly with the transportation service.

Mr. BORAH. I am exceedingly glad that the Government should have the advantage of the great ability of such men as Mr. Willard; I suppose everybody wants the Government to have the advantage of that, but the situation of Mr. Willard is a little different from that of a man who has something to sell to the Government, a man at the head of some institution which is engaged solely in the business of manufacturing and supplying goods. What is his business on this advisory council?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I am not just familiar with the details as to what any particular man may do, but I can easily imagine. Take a large shoe manufacturer for instance. The Government is in the market for shoes. It knows nothing about the shoe business nor where they can be obtained on time and in sufficient quantities. This man is familiar with the production of shoes; is familiar with shoe manufacturers throughout the United States; knows how to get supplies, how they can be obtained in the quickest and most efficient manner possible; is the best advisor; and I imagine that is what the President had in mind when he called him to advise about shoes. I happen to know some of these men. I know one from my State who did not want to come down here because he anticipated the criticisms to which he would be subjected. He was unfamiliar with the ways of politics. He had an unblemished character as a citizen and business man. I know he is not a corrupt man, and that he could not be corrupted; and I also know his advice has been of inestimable value to the Government at this time. It would be an irreparable loss to the Government if he and such as he were driven out of the Government service in this hour.

Mr. BORAH. I say again, I think it is very fortunate that we can have that man's counsel and advice, but I have no doubt he would be exceedingly glad himself to be placed in a position where this criticism and this denunciation which he was afraid of could not possibly occur.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How does the Senator from Idaho propose to put him where he would be protected against unjust criticism?

Mr. BORAH. As I said a few moments ago, there ought to be some tribunal created which would pass upon these contracts, which would have no possible interest in the contracts whatever.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course he does not make the contracts.

Mr. BORAH. He does not make the contracts, but the Senator has demonstrated by his own statement that he is there for the purpose of insuring that the contract will be made. It is upon his advice and upon his counsel that they proceed to the consummation of the contract.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of course, if his advice was not good and valuable, it ought not to be followed.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not true that there are thousands of men in the country who are not financially interested in the manufacture of shoes or any of the products the Government would buy who are just as competent, and more so, than those who own these great establishments?

Mr, TOWNSEND. I do not think so. I do not think the Senator will deny that he has contended on the floor many times that there is nobody competent to judge about farming except the farmer.

Mr. GRONNA. But there are people who do not even farm——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Even our Secretaries of Agriculture are denominated theorists—men who do not know. For my part I prefer the advice of a man who knows to any theorist on earth, especially on a technical or specialized question of this kind.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator misunderstood me. I intended to ask the Senator this question: Is it not a fact that there are thousands of men who are working on a salary who know more about business than the men who own the factory?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I presume that is true.

Mr. GRONNA. I know it is true.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not think anybody has been called in to counsel the National Government at this time of that class.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator a question which I think would elucidate the point he is making. For instance, never before in the history of the country did we need so much to know where we can get steel to build our ships and for the thousand purposes in which steel is used, and yet half of the steel is probably manufactured by one single company—the United States Steel Co. How could the Government ascertain where it could get its supplies unless it called in some member of that great company to advise it as to the possibility of supplying the Government demands, and owing to the fact that the Government did call in some one from that company to give it advice, to give it information, does the Senator think that ought to compel the Government to go to the others, who possibly could not supply more than half the quantity the Government would need, in order to make a contract?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I think the advice of the representatives of that concern is absolutely essential at this time, and I think it would be great folly on the part of the Government, after it had called in a representative of these concerns for its advice, if it said under no circumstances will we purchase anything that you or your concern supply. I think that would be an expensive thing for us to do and would not promote the interests of the Government at this time. The Government ought not to draft into its services the great producers of supplies which it needs and must have if by doing so it precludes itself from the power to purchase such supplies.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I realize that we have consumed considerable time in discussing this amendment, but I wish to go squarely upon record in favor of the provisions of this bill which make unlawful and which prohibit any person who is serving in a governmental capacity representing at the same time both the Government and himself, his firm, or his associates. I do not care to discuss this proposition from a standpoint of individuals, from a standpoint of any questionable conduct that may have taken place up to the present time, but purely from a standpoint of governmental policy, from a standpoint of business sagacity, and a standpoint of policy which prevails throughout the commercial affairs of our country. If you should suggest to an individual or firm that some man should serve him or them as an agent at the same time he was representing himself as the seller, you would find nobody would agree that that was good business policy. It would not be considered a proper system of business to have a person acting both as the purchaser and as the seller at the same time. I was astounded, Mr. President, when I read over the list of those who had been selected to act on these advisory councils and these subcommittees to find that a large number of them were men who no doubt either contemplated going out of the business in which they were engaged or of carrying on business transactions with the Government.

I am in favor of the provisions of section 3 as recommended by the committee. I am not in favor of compromising nor in any way trimming the sails to the windward in dealing with this matter. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] as a substitute, because that, in a way, gives a sanction or a license to these people to act upon these committees and to make recommendations in regard to the purchases or contracts with the firms in which they are interested.

It is rather difficult for me to see why anyone should oppose a law which provides that it shall be unlawful for any person who is serving the Government directly or in an advisory capacity to solicit or to recommend or to endeavor to procure a contract from the Government for a firm in which he is interested. I dare say that the laws of the States of this Union—I know it is true of the State from which I come—prohibit absolutely any such dual capacity on the part of any person attempting in anywise to represent the Government.

I have been wondering, as this discussion has proceeded here, as to what was the use of an advisory council, or as to what was the purpose and object of these subcommittees, if it was not that of recommending, after an investigation, as to where purchases should be made, as to what were reasonable prices, and so on; and if they are not serving in that capacity, what service then is there to be rendered on their part to the Government? They are either a fifth wheel in the wagon or else they are investigating market conditions and making recommendations in regard to the different products upon which they pass, and using their position to suggest that purchases shall be made here or yonder and that products shall be bought from certain firms.

Mr. President, I say that a great many of these men may be perfectly patriotic, and I would not charge that they are not; but as a matter of governmental policy I do not think it is proper to have men who are passing directly or indirectly upon the question of whether they shall receive business from the Government having anything whatever to do with the transaction as a representative of the Government. I therefore hope that the amendment suggested by the committee as section 3, which makes such transactions unlawful, will be adopted instead of the amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Ohio.

I believe the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio would accomplish some good; but I do not think the amendment goes to the very bottom of the proposition and eliminates the questionable condition which would prevail if we do not pass a law which absolutely prohibits a person serving two masters—serving in a dual capacity. In analyzing the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio I find it provides that a man serving upon one of these boards or upon a subcommittee shall not attempt to solicit an order or a contract from a person who has the authority to execute the contract or the authority to direct its execution. Therefore I take the position that when we consider the formation of the advisory council and the formation of the subcommittees that provision of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Ohio would not reach or interfere in the least with a man serving one of these subcommittees from using his influence and using his position, if he deemed it proper to do so, to induce a favorable recommendation from that subcommittee of the purchase from a firm or a company in which he was interested.

The proposed amendment then further provides that he shall disclose his interest; but, so far as I am concerned, I am not ready to go upon record in the Senate, as one of the representatives of the American people as saying to those serving upon these committees, "If you will disclose your interest, then we will still retain you in a confidential position or a position of trust with the Government and allow you to go ahead and contract with your firm."

I do not take kindly to the idea, Mr. President, that it is necessary to have men upon these advisory councils and upon these subcommittees who have business which they wish to transact with the Government. I have no sympathy with the idea that if we do not adopt such a policy we should have a chaotic condition in this country and that we would know not where to seek to purchase the supplies or the products which are necessary to carry on the war.

I suppose that every Senator has had more or less the experience which I have had since the war was declared, and I have not found any lack of those seeking to furnish the Government with different supplies; to the contrary, I have had a perfect flood of people coming here and knocking at the door and endeavoring to do business with the Government. That is true of all the large business interests in this country. Do you suppose that the shoe people, who have been mentioned here, would have remained supinely in Massachusetts, or wherever their place of business is situated, and not come to seek any of this business from the Government if they had not had representation upon these committees? The trouble is there are a great many of them that have not representation on committees who want business and who are not getting more or less of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. REED. In line with the statement the Senator has just made, I desire to say that I have in mind the fact that some of the very shoe men who have been mentioned here this morning within the past year have been to Washington very much incensed because they have not secured contracts, demanding investigations, and insisting on being accompanied by their Senators or Representatives to various departments in order to make sure that they might have a fair chance to bid. All this occurred before the war. There is no difficulty getting them here; the difficulty is in getting rid of them after they come.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is very true. I do not think there is any dearth of people who wish to do business with the Government. I have never known of such conditions.

Mr. REED. I ought to say that I do not mean to reflect upon these gentlemen; I make no complaint about their coming, and am very glad to go with them and see that they have fair treatment. Other Senators and Representatives have had the same experience constantly, as we all know.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is very true; that has been my experience. I have not found, as I have stated, any dearth of people who like to do business with the Government and want to get in on the various contracts. I do not desire to discuss individuals, as I have said, or to make any intimations of graft; but I do state, Mr. President, that I consider a policy which permits officers serving in a dual capacity, that of representatives of the Government and also of representatives of their own individual interest, is not a policy which should be, as I see it, authorized on the part of the Congress of the American people. For that reason I desire that it be made unlawful for men to serve in any such dual capacity. I realize that a great many of them, of course, will be perfectly patriotic; that they will be very honorable in dealing with the Government, and I know we have men of that character serving upon these boards; but, Mr. President, because of our appreciation of the patriotism of those who are patriotic, of the honor and the integrity of those who are honorable and straightforward and can be depended upon, I do not believe that that is a sufficient reason for inaugurating a governmental policy which is wrong in principle, because we might as well know—and we had just as well face the matter squarely and be frank about it—there will be men, if the present policy is continued, who will exercise their positions honorably and patriotically, but some others will work not for the interest of the American people, not in the interest of patriotism, but in their own interest. I think we should deal with this situation just as we should with a question of ordinary larceny. We do not make a law against larceny for the honorable man. Take the whole category of crimes, and if all men were honorable, if they were patriotic, if they were good citizens, we might as well not have laws; but human nature is human nature, and while we find honesty and integrity and patriotism predominating in this country, now and then we find some who will take advantage of a position of trust if you allow him to do so.

So far as I am concerned, I do not desire to go on record as authorizing these gentlemen to act in a dual capacity—a capacity of representatives of the Government, either advisory or otherwise, in the purchase of supplies from themselves or firms in which they are interested.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, several days ago I had something to say on the subject of this amendment, commonly known as section 3. I desire to supplement what I said before by going into the facts a little more fully than I did then.

In the past the method of entering into contracts on the part of the Government for the Army and Navy has been that in the Army the Quartermaster's Department and in the Navy the Bureau of Supplies entered into the contracts. That has been the law and the custom from time immemorial until the present war. It is still the custom in the Navy Department, as I will point out more particularly in a little while, but it is not the custom any longer in the Military Department. Substantially the duties of the Quartermaster's Department in the matter of purchasing supplies have been transferred to the advisory committees of the Council of National Defense. These committees have everything to do with contracts. Prospective contractors go to these committees; they deal with these committees only. If they are successful in getting a contract, the contract is O. K'd by these committees, so I am informed, and it is formally signed by the proper officer of the Quartermaster's Department; but the Quartermaster's Department has in practice nothing to do, really, with the contract; it is merely a figurehead. The contract is really entered into by the advisory committees of the Council of National Defense, all of which is shown in the testimony of Mr. Baker, the Secretary of War.

I became interested in the peculiar manner of the Government entering into contracts some time ago. It came up in a perfectly natural way, just as all of us have had it come up in our experience, through the application of men from our own States who seek contracts with the Government. I referred them to the Quartermaster's Department and invariably was told that it was a matter for the Council of National Defense, or the advisory committees of that council, and that these men would have to apply to those committees. There was great confusion about it; there was great difficulty in the beginning to find to which one of the committees a prospective contractor should apply; but, after considerable trouble, and sometimes even more than trouble, the proper committee was found.

I then looked up the law constituting the Council of National Defense and found that determining upon contracts was no part of their duties under the law; that they are acting wholly without the scope of their authority. It was therefore a peculiar situation. I am sure Congress never had any idea of turning over the contracting power of the Government to the advisory committees of the Council of National Defense, none of the members of which are even appointed, as I understand, by the Council of National Defense itself. All are appointed by designated chairmen of committees. The chairmen are appointed, and they put on the committees just whom they please.

I found another remarkable thing when I came to look into this matter. I represent, in part, a State of 2,300,000 people, but it seems that no one on the Council of National Defense or its committees has ever found a Tennesseean whom they thought capable of serving on any committee of that body. That seems rather a remarkable thing to me. In my State we have manufacturers; we have great lumber interests; we have cotton interests; we have cotton mills and great mills of all kinds all over our State, at Nashville, Chattanooga; we have great steel mills in east Tennessee; in Memphis we have one of the largest lumber industries in the world; we also have one of the largest cotton trades in the world; and yet no one from Tennessee has been put on any committee of the Council of National Defense. Examine these committees—they are on record—and you will find that none of the members of any committee are from my State. The result was that it was very hard for any Tennesseean to get in touch with the Council of National Defense. It struck me as being peculiar; but, as time wore on, there were certain facts that developed which I am not going into right now, but which led me to write to the Secretary of War the following letter, which I will read to the Senate. It is dated June 13, 1917, over a month ago:

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Following your suggestion of this morning—

I took the matter up with him personally first—

I write to request that you have me furnished with the following information about the advisory board of the Council of National Defense:

1. The number and names of each and every contract let by the Government since the establishment of the Council of National Defense.
2. The names and post-office addresses of the persons, firms, or corporations to whom or to which contracts were let.
3. The amounts of each contract and the amounts of commission or compensation of each contractor. If it is not possible to give the exact amounts, then the estimated amounts of contracts and commissions.
4. A concise statement of the terms and subject matter of each contract.
5. The names and post-office addresses of each officer, agent, or representative or employee of the advisory board of the Council of National Defense having connection with such persons, firms, or corporations to whom, or to which, such contracts were let, if any.
6. The nature of the interest, direct or indirect, of any officer, or agent, or employee of the Council of National Defense, or its advisory board, in any one of the contracting persons, firms, or corporations.
7. The location of each contracting party, and if he or it has more than one office the location of such offices;
8. The financial standing of each contracting party;
9. Full and concise information as to the methods which are pursued in the letting of contracts.

I thought that was a reasonable request under the circumstances. It seems that no one here even has an accurate knowledge of how this work is carried on; we are guessing at it at best; and it struck me that it was very proper to request full and complete information as to the methods which are being pursued in the letting of contracts.

10. Whether or not any contracts were let on competitive bidding.

I found this remarkable condition, that while all contracts in the Navy Department are let upon competitive bidding, no contracts are now let upon competitive bidding by the Council of National Defense for the military department; in other words, our Government has adopted two separate policies, one of competitive bidding in the Navy Department, and the other of non-competitive contracts under the ruling of the Council of National Defense.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield; certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator mean to be understood as saying that the War Department is not letting contracts by a system of competitive bidding, or does he mean to say that he has no knowledge as to whether or not they are letting out contracts under that system?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will listen a little while, I will produce the facts themselves which will answer the Senator's question. I will give the Senator an illustration of what they are doing right now, and I will go into the matter more fully when I reach it in a few minutes.

Contracts for 16 cantonments have been let, not to the lowest bidder, not upon any competitive bids, but they have been let on substantially a 7 per cent commission, with a provision that the commission shall not run over $250,000. The houses which constitute these cantonments are very simple affairs, made of lumber. Any upright, honest, honorable carpenter could see that they were built properly, probably better built than by some of these contractors which have been employed. Any contractor would be glad to superintend any one of them, I have no doubt, for $25,000; and yet under this remarkable system the Government is milked for $250,000 for cantonments merely for superintending the building, without regard to the price. The cost of the cantonment is completely charged up to the Government; no price is asked. What difference does it make, as the Government is paying the price, and the more the cantonment cost the greater the commission, up to $250,000?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In just what time is the contractor expected to earn that commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. Just as quickly as possible. The Government wants to get the cantonments ready for troops as rapidly as possible. At all events, in not exceeding three months.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it not the expectation that they will be ready about the 1st of September?

Mr. McKELLAR. I so understand. Suppose we placed the work under a tried and experienced officer of the Government like Col. Littell, whose whole life has been devoted to the building of cantonments and camps, and building them on time. I say they would be built very much more quickly and very much cheaper and very much more in compliance with the needs of the Government than if let out to some general contractor, as they have been under this system.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So that the contractor expects to receive compensation of about $250,000 for something in the neighborhood of two months' supervision?

Mr. McKELLAR. Something like that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope Senators will excuse me until I finish the letter I was reading addressed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, before he leaves the question he is now discussing——

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to get the question and the Senator's answer clearly in my own mind. The contractor, I understand, is paid a percentage for the construction?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no accurate knowledge, but I understood at first that it was proposed to pay the contractors 10 per cent, but that was found excessive, and the amount was reduced to 7 per cent, and it was provided also that no commission should exceed the sum of $250,000.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course I agree with the Senator that is a very loose and expensive method of doing Government work, as it strikes me; but what I want brought out in justice to the Government is the fact that the contractor is only paid a percentage and not a fixed sum of $250,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is paid 7 per cent, with a provision that the compensation shall not exceed $250,000. Suppose, for illustration, a cantonment costs $4,000,000. Seven per cent of that would be $280,000. The poor contractor would not be allowed to get $280,000, but would be chiseled down to $250,000!

Mr. VARDAMAN. If a cantonment only costs $100,000, the contractor would only get 7 per cent of that.

Mr. McKELLAR. He would get even less than 7 per cent; that is true; but these cantonments cost between three and four millions each, as I am informed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the point I wanted to have brought out. The contractor would not get $250,000 unless the undertaking involved an expenditure running up into the millions.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now proceed with the letter:

In awarding contract to an individual, firm, or corporation, is any limit fixed upon the price of material or labor in carrying out such contract?

I thought that was a pertinent inquiry.

12. Does the Government simply furnish the money of such contractors to purchase the material or do the work without any supervision over the prices paid for labor or to subcontractors or to material men?

13. The names and number of any contracts that have been let out to subcontractors, and post-office addresses of such subcontractors.

14. Whether or not such contracting parties have paid increased prices in the cost of labor and material in the carrying out of such contracts.

15. The names and post-office addresses of all persons, firms, corporations, or organizations which have any officer, representative, or agent on or connected, directly or indirectly, with the Council of National Defense or any of its advisory boards.

16. A list of names of officers, agents, and employees, together with their post-office addresses and salary paid each, of the Council of National Defense or any of its advisory boards or committees.

17. The amounts paid out by contract for office rentals in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and where such offices are located, and to whom the rentals are paid.

18. The names, numbers, and post-office addresses of persons connected with the Council of National Defense or of any of its advisory boards who are serving without compensation.

19. The names and post-office addresses of any contractor or contractors to whom contracts have been let by the department since the establishment of the Council of National Defense and its advisory boards, and who signed the recommendations of such advisory board or council.

20. Has any contract been let to any contractor not engaged in the specific business which is to be undertaken under the contract? If so, the names and addresses of the contractors and the names of the advisory board or subcommittee that recommended such contract.

21. Have any contracts been let to brokers purely? If so, give their names, the nature of their contracts, the amount of contracts, and all the facts and circumstances connected with the letting thereof.

22. Has any contract been in fact let or recommended by any of the committees or subcommittees to dummy organizations or to organizations having no standing? And if so, kindly state which ones.

23. As I understand it, under the law the proper officer of the War Department signs each contract for work and supplies. On whose O. K. are these several contracts made? Has a subcommittee the right to O. K. a contract, or the chairman of a subcommittee, or just what is the process under which the War Department lets these contracts?

24. A number of rumors have been circulated about the letting of a contract for a cantonment at Fort Oglethorpe or at Fort Myer to some firm or corporation which had a representative on the Council of National Defense or the advisory board or some committee thereof. Will you kindly furnish all the facts about this particular contract, to which corporation it was let, and who are members of that corporation; whether the contract was let upon the recommendation of a committee of the Council of National Defense?

25. Many rumors are likewise going around about some broker of a typewriter company having secured a contract about typewriters. Will you kindly give me specific information as to the typewriter contract?

26. A few days ago Senator NEWLANDS put in the RECORD the names and some of the addresses of subordinate committees of the Council of National Defense. I herewith inclose a copy of these committees, and will appreciate it if you will have them grouped by States. Will you please furnish me with information as to the previous and present employment of the various members of the subcommittees heretofore set out? Kindly give the names of the employers of said subcommittees, together with a statement as to which of them are drawing salaries from their present employers, and the amount of such salaries, and the amount of any salary that may be paid the same persons by the Government.

I have been thinking that perhaps a Senate resolution would be the formal way to get this information, but under the circumstances I feel sure that you will furnish it without any such resolution. I realize that it will require considerable work to give me the foregoing information, but we have made quite a liberal appropriation for the Council of National Defense and I do not believe that a small portion of the money could be better spent than to employ special men, if necessary, to secure and furnish the foregoing information at the earliest possible moment. I am sure from what you stated to me personally that you will agree with me that we should have the information.

I would like also to have the following information:

Are any of the officers, agents, or employees of the Council of National Defense—of course, not speaking of the Cabinet officers—have to take any oath or obligation to well and truly perform their duties as such officers, agents, or employees of the Government, in recommending these contracts before they begin their work, and if so, what is the form of oath or other obligation?

If they recommend contracts to firms in which they are interested—in other words, acting as both buyer and seller—is there any law under which they could be punished for such action?

Why should not the Quartermaster Corps, upon which the Government has spent a great deal of money to officer and train, have simply enlarged their own forces, and all these purchases and contracts be made in the way provided by law?

An early reply will be highly appreciated. I would like to publish both your reply and this letter in the RECORD.

Very truly, yours,

KENNETH D. MCKELLAR.

On the 15th of June I received this letter from Mr. Secretary Baker, who I now take pleasure in saying that I regard as one of the ablest and best men we have in official life, and I have no possible intention of criticizing him:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, June 15, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I have received your letter of June 13 requesting that you be furnished information about the advisory board of the Council of National Defense.

I will take up with the council at once the question of putting as many people as possible to work collecting the information you desire. The enormous volume, however, of the documents requested indicates that this will necessarily be a task of great magnitude, and I can only promise that it will be pushed with all the expedition possible.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

I heard nothing by the 24th of June, and thereupon I sent a copy of this letter to each member of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. I will just read one of them, though I sent a similar letter to each of the seven, and ask that all seven be printed in the RECORD:

JUNE 24, 1917.

Hon. JULIUS ROSENWALD,
Council of National Defense, Washington.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed I hand you a copy of a letter that I recently wrote the Secretary of War, which explains itself.

I will be glad if you will give this your early attention. I am informed that the Secretary has already asked that this information be furnished me.

Very truly, yours,

KENNETH D. MCKELLAR.

As I say, I sent a similar letter to each one. I got replies from some of these gentlemen, which I will read. I ask permission to set out all of the copies in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. MCKELLAR. On June 28 I received this letter:

THE ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of June 4, together with inclosure of a letter to the Secretary of War, which I understand you sent me for my information and an answer to which I understand is now being prepared.

I regret very much that you were unable to see me last week and trust that some future opportunity may present itself.

Yours, very truly,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

I also received this letter on June 28:

THE ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of June 24, with inclosures, came duly to hand, contents of which are carefully noted. Of course it is impossible for me to reply in detail either to the matter of your letter or answer in detail the questions you propound in your letter of June 13, addressed to Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War.

It may not be amiss to call attention to the fact that by direction of the Council of National Defense each of the seven members constituting the advisory commission was authorized to form a committee to deal with the subject with which he is most fitted to consider, and therefore I was selected as the chairman of the committee on labor, including conservation and welfare of workers. I inclose to you herein copy of the pamphlet which shows the personnel of the membership of that committee, together with the various committees functioning for the general committee and in the effort to carry out the purpose for which the committee was constituted.

It may be interesting to state that of the large number of members of my committee and the committees performing their several duties there has not been paid a dollar of expense or salary to any one of them, other than to the assistant to the chairman of the committee on labor, Mr. James W. Sullivan, whom I was authorized to appoint.

Mr. Sullivan was in France at the time. I cabled to him and asked him to come to the United States to aid me in the performance of my work as member of the advisory commission and chairman of the committee on labor.

I may be permitted to say that I am quite confident that my statement is within the limit of truth, that on no committee of public or private work can be found so large a number of men or women of a high order of intelligence, of special skill and ability to work, and who are giving such complete whole-hearted voluntary service, as can be found in the various committees of, and the committee on labor, of the Council of National Defense. We have saved for the Government of the United States millions of dollars in the settlement of disputes and in preventing trade difficulties. In addition we have helped to instill upon the minds of our people cooperation, good will, and patriotic service.

Very truly, yours,

SAM'L GOMPERS,
Chairman Committee on Labor.

I have one here from Dr. Franklin Martin, which merely says that the letter ought to be answered by the director, and leaves it that way. I will publish it in the RECORD. I have another one from Dr. Hollis Godfrey, who is at the head of a noncontracting part of the commission, and I will ask that it go in the RECORD. And I received one from Mr. Daniel Willard.

The letters referred to are as follows:

ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
June 29, 1917.

From: Dr. Franklin Martin.
To: Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.
Subject: Information concerning advisory board of the Council of National Defense.

1. Your letter of June 24, directed to the members of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, is before me.

2. The subject matter pertains almost exclusively to the purchase of material, and therefore has to do with the purchasing departments of the Government rather than the advisory board. I believe the letter should be answered by the director of the council, Mr. W. S. Gifford, and have therefore referred the matter to him with my comment.

With kind regards, I am,
Yours, very truly,

FRANKLIN MARTIN,
Member of the Advisory Commission.

ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
COMMITTEE ON ENGINEERING AND EDUCATION,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCKELLAR: I have been away from Washington for three or four days. I have just received your letter, which I hasten to answer. It seems to refer exclusively to contracts. May I say that no contract has ever been submitted in any way to any member of any committee concerned with me so far as I have any knowledge. Certainly no contract has ever been submitted to me personally for consideration of any character. My committee has to do wholly with engineering and educational factors, and has from the beginning expressly kept itself to a purely advisory capacity, having nothing to do with prices or profits.

Will you please let me know if there is any other information which you would like to have in this matter? I shall be quite unable to answer most of these questions, as I have never seen any contracts or know anything about any contracts let by the Government since my appointment to the commission.

Yours, very sincerely,

HOLLIS GODFREY.

ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, July 7, 1917.

HON. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
Chairman Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of June 24, with attached thereto copy of one addressed by you to Hon. Newton D. Baker, is received, and I note the information which you desire. It so happens, however, that I have no personal knowledge whatever concerning any of the matters referred to in the several questions contained in your letter to the Secretary of War. I am not a member of any committee which has had anything whatever to do with any contract. The director of the Council of National Defense, Mr. W. S. Gifford, will, I assume, prepare the information called for in your letter above referred to.

Very truly, yours,

D. WILLARD,
Chairman Advisory Commission.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It will be noted that I have not received a reply from the contracting part of the advisory commission. From one of those, Mr. Coffin, I have received no answer at all. From the other, Mr. Rosenwald, I received a personal visit, in which he did not answer the questions that I asked. Thereupon I wrote him a letter asking him to give me specific information as to whether or not he had sold anything to the Government, and I received this letter from him yesterday:

MY DEAR SENATOR: You are mistaken in my having made any positive statement to the effect that Sears, Roebuck & Co. had done business with the Government since I have been a member of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense—

I thought he had, but he says he did not make a positive statement to that effect—

What I did state was that when I was home recently some one had mentioned to me that some department of the Government had requested our company to furnish some portable houses, but I was not sure whether the company accepted the order or not; but I shall be glad to get the information for you, and have telegraphed to-day to have them furnish me the information.

Very respectfully, yours, JULIUS ROSENWALD.

I have just received the following letter from Mr. Rosenwald this afternoon, and I here ask that it be inserted in the RECORD:

ADVISORY COMMISSION OF THE
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., July 17, 1917.

Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to my telegram to Sears, Roebuck & Co. at Chicago, requesting that they send me a statement of the approximate amount of business received by that company since January 1, I have received the following information:

Since January 1 they have received about 200 orders, principally for Indian reservations through the Department of the Interior, a few small orders from the Department of Agriculture for various Government barracks, and three orders from Great Lakes Naval Station, mostly for blankets. The total value of these orders is approximately $11,000.

You will, of course, understand that these orders were unsolicited, received like millions of other orders by Sears, Roebuck & Co. during that same period, and at prices listed in their catalogue.

Any further information which you might desire in connection with this matter will be furnished as promptly as possible upon request.

Very respectfully, yours,

JULIUS ROSENWALD.

I have never heard from Mr. Coffin at all, and I believe one other, nor from Mr. Baruch, other than the communication to which I have already referred. In other words, I have received no information, no answers to these very pertinent questions, if we are to legislate on this subject. So that having made an investigation of this sort, having asked for the information, and having waited a reasonable time and more than a reasonable time to receive the information, and not having received it, I think the Senate ought to know just what information was asked and just what information has been received.

There is no reason why an industrious man could not get together all the information that is necessary in a couple of days at the outside. If these gentlemen are the great business men they are said to be, capable of dealing with large questions, there is no reason in the world why they should not have had their business in such excellent order that they could have furnished that information on a day's notice to anyone who was interested and who had a right to have it.

So much for that. If the Senate is satisfied to let this work be done by that method, without getting any information, that is all right. All I can say is that I am going to vote to prohibit any member of these committees or advisory commissions from dealing with himself, as I believe that is the safest and best thing to do, and I want to say this right here before I forget it: I do not believe there is any man in this country that wants to win this war any more sincerely than I do, and that is why I am taking this course. Surely if there ever was a time when men should be patriotic, when they should serve their Government unselfishly, now is the time. In the words of our splendid President, there never was a better time for this Congress to divorce profits from patriotism, and that is why I am giving this information. For the most part, I think these men are patriotic men, but some of them have forgotten their Government and we should legislate to keep their memories good.

I next come to the proposition of cantonments. As I understand, 16 cantonments have been authorized or contracted to be built. They were authorized by the Council of National Defense on this scheme of construction: Certain contracting gentlemen in various parts of the country were employed on a general commission of 7 per cent on the cost of the cantonments, and I understand that the estimated cost of these cantonments is from three and a half to four million dollars each.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. Just one moment, and I shall be glad to yield to the Senator. The estimated cost of these cantonments is about three and a half to four million dollars. The contractor is authorized under the contracts to proceed to build them at the expense of the Government. The contractor does not have to spend the money. The Government is spending the money, and he receives 7 per cent; but a saving clause is put in that he is not to receive over $250,000 on any one of the contracts.

I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Just at that point I wish to call the Senator's attention to the schedule of fees for the building of these cantonments found in the Official Bulletin of June 16. On the 15th of June I introduced a resolution in the Senate, which was printed, and also printed in the RECORD, for an investigation of the letting of the contracts for these cantonments. On the following day, June 16, this statement appeared in the Bulletin, and I was reminded of it when the Senator was having a colloquy a little while ago with the Senator from Mississippi.

The commission or fee paid is not 7 per cent in all instances. The schedule of fees is as follows:

If the cost of the work is under $100,000, a fee of 10 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $100,000 and under $125,000, a fee of $10,000.

If the cost of the work is over $125,000 and under $250,000, a fee of 8 per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $250,000 and under $266,666.67, a fee of $20,000.

If the cost of the work is over $266,666.67 and under $500,000, a fee of 7½ per cent of such cost.

If the cost of the work is over $500,000 and under $535,714.29, a fee of $37,500.

If the cost of the work is over $533,714.29 and under $3,000,000, a fee of 7 per cent of such cost.

There is where the 7 per cent applies.

If the cost of the work is over $3,000,000 and under $3,500,000, a fee of $210,000.

If the cost of the work is over $3,500,000, a fee of 6 per cent of such cost.

As stated by the Senator a while ago, $250,000 is the most that can be allowed in any case.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I thank the Senator for the correction. It is substantially the same. I was speaking, of course, not with the figures before me, but in a general way, and they are practically the same. These cantonments are each to cost, so I am informed, between three and four million dollars.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator if he is informed as to what assistants or inspectors the contractor has to pay out of that compensation?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do not know.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course, if there is a very large cantonment being built, he necessarily can not do all of the superintending and inspecting himself. He must have a very large corps of assistants.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes; perhaps. But all of that is paid for by the Government, as I understand. If it is not so, why have we not the facts before us? I asked for them over a month ago, and this bill was either introduced or being considered at the time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I submit to the Senator that he will not claim that it is dealing fairly with the Government to construe everything against the Government because he has not had an answer to a letter to one of the departments.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I am not construing it, but I am offering it for what it is worth. Now I come to certain facts about some of the contracts.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say so right there, the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio reminds me of this: The contractor may have some one to supervise the work of building the cantonments, a chief supervisor, but is there anything in the knowledge of the Senator to show but that the salary paid the supervisor is part of the cost of construction on which 7 per cent, or 10 per cent, or whatever it is, is charged?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt in my own mind that even if every particle of the superintendence is paid for the contractor he can get the most experienced and expert contractors in this country to supervise the work without his ever getting on the ground at all, for a fee of about one-tenth of what is provided in this schedule.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit, under the statements made by the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from South Dakota that neither one of them seems to be very certain about his facts, and yet they are drawing very drastic conclusions from these statements. If I have misunderstood I shall be very glad to be corrected, but no statement has been made thus far to the effect that out of this fee which is to be paid the contractor may not have to pay large sums to assistants. Certainly there is some arrangement on the subject made by the War Department or by the Council of National Defense, and it does seem to me that the Senate ought to have specific information on that subject.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I interrupt just a moment?

Why have we not the facts? You can see for yourself that I have tried to get them.

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me just a minute, please. If the Senator has not been able to get the information he desires—and he is entitled to that information—in answer to a letter which he has written, he should take some other means of getting it. It does not appear, however, that the letter came to the personal attention of the Secretary of War. It does not appear that if it had come to his attention he has had an opportunity to answer it. I do not know as to that. I do know, however, that there is no man in the Government service who is more alert in looking after the interests of the Government than Newton D. Baker, whom I have known for many years.

Mr. McKELLAR. I take great pleasure in indorsing just what the Senator has said about Secretary Baker. I believe that of him to the very absolute limit; but the Secretary of War has an immense number of duties imposed upon him at this time, and he ought to have the assistance of men who can furnish the information desired. The Secretary has turned this letter over primarily to the advisory board of the Council of National Defense with the request that that information be furnished. The members of the advisory board have wholly disregarded what the Secretary of War asked them to do about this matter.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I simply want to say, in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, that I have not stated anything as a fact except what I find here in the Official Bulletin of June 16 in regard to the fees paid upon these several contracts according to the cost of the cantonments; but I said that so far as I knew—and I asked the Senator from Tennessee if it was not true, so far as he knew—the cost of supervising the work was included in the cost on which the contractor was paid his commission; that is all.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, well, that may be so. I have no knowledge on that subject; but it still does not answer my question as to whether or not the contractor is obliged to pay his own assistants in superintending the construction of this work.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me ask the Senator a question. He seems to be taking the side of these gentlemen.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not taking sides. I am simply insisting upon a square deal in this debate.

Mr. McKELLAR. All right. Now, does not the Senator think that in order that a square deal may be had it is absolutely fair to these gentlemen and absolutely fair to me that these respectful questions should have been answered and the information given?

Mr. POMERENE. Why, Mr. President, I think our colloquy thus far has indicated that I thought the Senator ought to have an answer to these questions and that if he did not get it by a letter written directly to these gentlemen there was a way to get it by offering a resolution.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is exactly what I propose to do later on.

Now I come to the cantonments. There are 16 of them, as I understand. I have not accurate information on the subject, because it seems we can not get it. I have investigated four of them, and I find a very peculiar state of affairs in reference to these four contracts that I think the Senate ought to know about.

The Council of National Defense is down here to advise as to the best means of carrying on this war, not as to contracts, and yet I want to call the attention of the Senate to the case of F. B. Ley & Co., of Springfield, Mass.

I do not know anything at all about these gentlemen; I never heard of them before; but I understand they are contractors, and they have had in their employ a man by the name of Mr. Mears. Mr. Mears, while still in the employ of F. B. Ley & Co., and who is now in the employ of F. B. Ley & Co., came down here and offered patriotically to give his services to the cause of his country. He wanted to help his country in this hour of its extremity and peril, and he got on the committee or became connected with the committee of emergency construction, of which Mr. W. H. Starrett is the chairman. I happen to know about this matter personally, because I called on Mr. Starrett in company with Mayor Littleton, of Chattanooga, and I met Mr. Mears there for the first time. If any of you have ever been in secret societies, you will know how this description fits a man. He seems to be the warder of the outer door or the inner door, or both. In other words, he received the visitors who came to see Mr. Starrett, and he was on the committee there, acting for him and with him, and also in the employ of Ley & Co., voluntarily and patriotically representing the Government, and of course not representing Ley & Co.; and a contract was awarded by the Government to F. B. Ley & Co., of Springfield, to build the cantonment at Ayer, Mass. I do not know, but it looks very peculiar that Mr. Mears should come to Washington to serve the Government patriotically, and incidentally, just by accident, the firm with which he happens to be connected, and which happened to be paying him a salary at that time, received a contract out of which it is possible that the firm may make $250,000.

That is one contract. I do not make any assertions about it; I just give you the facts. I know my statements about those contracts are true because of the following letter and the following answer, which I shall now read, and I will then take up the other contracts mentioned in the letter. This is a letter written to Hon. W. S. Gifford, Council of National Defense, Washington, D. C., on July 11, 1917:

JULY 11, 1917.

Hon. W. S. GIFFORD,
Council of National Defense, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Will you kindly advise me—

1. Whether or not Maj. M. J. Whitson, of the Quartermaster Corps, was formerly an employee in charge of the building department of Grant Smith & Co., and whether or not Mr. Grant Smith, of Grant Smith & Co., is the head of Smith-Houser & Melsaac, of New York, to whom the contract for a cantonment at Annapolis Junction was let?

2. Will you also advise me if Mr. W. A. Starrett, chairman of the emergency construction commission, is a brother of Mr. Paul Starrett, the president of George A. Fuller Co., to which company a contract was let for the building of an encampment at Fort Reilly, Kans.?

3. Whether Mr. James A. Flynn, who is on one of your committees, is a large stockholder of the Thompson-Starrett Co.?

4. Whether Mr. Mears, who is one of your subcommittees, is a present or former employee of F. T. Ley & Co., of Springfield, Mass., to which company the contract for a cantonment at Ayer, Mass., was let?

5. Will you kindly advise me whether or not Maj. R. E. Hamilton, of the Quartermaster Department, was lately a purchasing agent for Stone & Webster, of Boston, Mass., to which company the contract for the cantonment at Fort Sam Houston, Tex., was let?

6. Will you kindly advise me what military experience Maj. M. J. Whitson had prior to his coming into the Quartermaster Corps, and give me the date of his appointment therein, and when he was assigned to work with the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense?

7. Will you kindly advise me what Maj. R. E. Hamilton's military experience was prior to his coming into the Quartermaster Corps, and give me the date of his appointment therein, and when he was assigned to work with the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense?

I will greatly appreciate it if you will give me this information by return mail, as I suppose that it will only take a few moments to get the accurate information about the several questions above asked you.

With much respect, I am

Very sincerely, yours, KENNETH D. MCKELLAR.

I made this short because one or two of the members who failed to give me any information as to my other letter said it took a good deal of time. I asked whether they had utilized that time in getting the information, and they did not know that any steps had been taken to secure the information I had asked for June 13. Thereupon I called Mr. Gifford over the telephone and he was said not to be there, but I was told incidentally that he could not give the information. I said that I insisted upon information, and the next morning I got this letter dated July 14, and I will put in the RECORD the full letter.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
OFFICE OF DIRECTOR,
Washington, July 14, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of July 11:

Regarding your querry No. 2, Mr. W. A. Starrett is a brother of Mr. Paul Starrett, president of the George A. Fuller Co.

As to query No. 3, we have no record of Mr. James A. Flynn being connected directly or indirectly with any of our committees—

I want to say now, and I take the greatest pleasure in saying it, and it is regrettable of course, Mr. Flynn's name has been drawn into this, and he is entirely without any shadow of suspicion attached to him in any manner, shape, or form. This letter shows he was not connected with the firm, as I had been informed, and am sorry that his name was mistakenly brought into this matter—

As to query No. 4, Mr. Mears is an employee of the F. T. Ley Co., of Springfield, Mass.

The War Department has been applied to for information in regard to Maj. Whitson and Maj. Hamilton.

Very truly, yours,

R. H. WILLIAMS,
Assistant to the Director.

Now, I want to say this, as to the seven questions that were asked there, it was done upon information that I believe to be accurate, which information was furnished to me by Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN, of Texas, a Member of the House from that State, and Hon. CHAS. POPE CALDWELL, of New York City, both of whom stated that they knew what the facts were, and so far as I have gotten an answer it is shown that the facts are very accurate, and I believe the facts are as stated by them as to all four of these contracts.

Now, take the case of Maj. Whitson, an employee of Grant Smith & Co., of which Mr. Grant Smith is the president, and he is also president of another firm, the Smith-Houser & McIsaac, of New York. I have not been able to find where he has had military training, but it appears somehow it works in that an employee of a contracting firm goes into the Officers' Reserve Corps and is put on active duty at once, and is transferred to this particular department. Is it not remarkable? It is more remarkable yet that shortly after he is transferred to this particular duty on the Council of National Defense Smith-Houser & McIsaac turn up with one of these very valuable cantonment contracts, which may pay them as much as a quarter of a million dollars, as the Senator from Washington suggests, for two or three months in supervising it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I feel, and I know what I feel, that it is time right now in the beginning of this war to see to it that the money which we are spending and for which we are trustees should not be spent along lines that will give credence or rise to the inferences that must come to us from seeing these facts. I now yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wish to ask the Senator regarding Mr. Mears. I understood the Senator to say that Mr. Mears was on some of these subcommittees. I do not find him in the list. I have here the subcommittee on emergency, construction, and contract; W. A. Starrett, chairman.

Mr. McKELLAR. I only know this. On one occasion I went to Mr. Starrett's office to take Mr. Jesse Littleton, the mayor of Chattanooga, there, and was introduced to Mr. Mears, or he introduced himself. He was in charge of the outer office of this emergency construction work, which office was presided over by Mr. Starrett. That is all I know. Whether he is actually on the committee or not I do not know, but I do know that he seemed to be very potential, if he was not actually engaged.

Mr. FLETCHER. I just wanted to get clear what the facts are about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have never seen his name, then, if it was on the list. I do not know anything in the world about Mr. Whitson; I do not mean to make any charges, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a very strange feature connected with the employee of this company who gets a commission in the Officers' Reserve Corps and is put on active duty and assigned to this department and a very valuable contract goes to his firm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Has the Senator established any connection between the commissioning of this officer, whose name I did not catch, and the letting of the contract?

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever. I simply asked the question in a letter of July 11, now six days ago, and it seems to me it could have been answered the next morning without the slightest difficulty by anyone who knew the facts. I am not in receipt of the answer yet.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The reason for my inquiry is this: Does the Senator think it was very strange that after a certain person was commissioned in the Quartermaster Corps or the Reserve Officers' Corps some corporation got a contract?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the corporation of which he was an employee got the contract. Not a corporation got a contract but his corporation got the contract.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is strange about that?

Mr. McKELLAR. This is strange.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Unless the officer had something to do with it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator says he does not know that the officer had anything to do with it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the inference is perfectly plain. That is my judgment about it. If the Senator disagrees with me, I am sorry.

I now come to Mr. W. A. Starrett. He is the chairman of the emergency construction committee and used to be a member of the Starrett-Thompson Co., which got one of these contracts, by the way, and I want to put his statement in the RECORD. I want to be absolutely fair. He says that he sold his interest about four years ago, and is not connected with that company, but he never said anything at all about having a brother who is president of the George A. Fuller Co., to which another contract was let.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. I wish to say to the Senator, I know of my own personal knowledge that Mr. Starrett, the chairman of this subcommittee is not connected directly or indirectly with the Thompson-Starrett Co.

Mr. McKELLAR. He says that, and I take his word for it.

Mr. CALDER. I think it is true that no person named Starrett or no person named Thompson is connected to-day with the Thompson-Starrett Co. The corporation named was bought over by others some years ago and with the right to use the name.

Mr. McKELLAR. Four years ago. I will say to the Senator that that is not what this applies to. This applies to the contract with the George A. Fuller Construction Co., which is a contract for the building of a cantonment at Fort Riley, Kans., and of which Mr. Paul Starrett is the head.

I next come to the question of Maj. Hamilton. Maj. Hamilton was purchasing agent of the Stone-Webster Co., a corporation of Boston, Mass. He was appointed on the Reserve Corps and was assigned to active duty at once in the emergency construction work, and in a short time the Stone-Webster Co. was given a contract for the building of a camp away out in Texas. It may be a mere accident; I do not know. But I think all these facts are worthy of the consideration of the Senate, and I am giving them for this reason. I think we ought to have a very stringent statute prohibiting this kind of business, prohibiting these kinds of accidents to turn up in the letting of these contracts. We owe it to ourselves; we owe it to this administration; we owe it to common honesty in this time of our country's great peril, that these men who are in an advisory capacity should not let contracts to their own firms or corporations or to themselves.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] says that is a mistake; that these gentlemen on these committees of the Council of National Defense are in no sense agents of the Government. Is it possible that we are spending $500,000 a year to bring together the sellers of the country and pay their expenses here and pay their office rent in Washington so that they can make contracts in the remarkable way which has been described here? If we are doing that, we are doing a very peculiar thing.

I want to call the attention of the Senate right here now to the remarkable difference between the way in which these purchases are made and the way purchases are made in the Navy. I wish to invite every Senator, at any time before this vote is taken, to go down to the Council of National Defense in the Munsey Building and see how the business is conducted there and then to walk into the office of Admiral McGowan and see how the business of purchasing for the Government is conducted there. In the one place there is favoritism and accidents, a peculiar combination of facts, suspicion, failure to give facts, confusion, lack of knowledge, inefficiency, and impoliteness. Of course, I understand that some members of the Council of National Defense think that Senators are men of such inferior quality and standing that they are not entitled to know what the facts are nor to polite treatment.

I believe one of them has published some such statement, but go there and look for yourselves on that situation, and then go over to the Navy Department and see the wonderful arrangement of this very remarkable man, this patriotic and splendid man in charge of the Government supplies and accounts there. I refer to Admiral McGowan. See how he manages contracts for the Government. Has he any council mobilizing sellers to sell to him? Oh, no; he invites them all to come up, all on absolutely equal terms, no side-door communication, no inside unpaid employees working for the Government and the seller, and they put in their sealed bids; they are put in a locked box and are opened on a stated day in their presence, and the contract is awarded to the lowest and best bidder, then and there, to the absolute satisfaction of buyer and seller. Every right of the Government is protected under the splendid scheme and system of this very remarkable and efficient servant of the Government in the Navy Department. I wish we had more like him. I commend him in the highest degree; I commend his effective and efficient business methods in dealing for the Navy Department, and he buys eight or ten million dollars worth of supplies a day down there. I do not know how much is bought by the advisory board of the Council of National Defense, but it could not be so much more in the very nature of things. Yet in one department the business is run smoothly and in the other department it is run open to suspicion. It is the difference between efficiency and inefficiency, between patriotism straight and patriotism tinctured with a desire for profits.

Why should we not undertake to remedy that here now? Senators, if you want to remedy it vote for the measure that has been reported out here by a committee of the Senate. As I understand the amendment, that part of the committee amendment on this bill was unanimously adopted by the vote of every Senator on the committee, and nobody ever heard of it being changed until some of the gentlemen interested in the Council of National Defense got busy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield until I correct his statement?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from New York objected to the amendment in the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I beg the Senator's pardon; the statement was made here on the floor several days ago that it was the unanimous report of the committee. I cheerfully accept the Senator's statement that he objected to it.

My own idea is that we ought to have as the purchasing agent of the Government in the War Department a man who owes no duty to anyone except the Government itself. Take the president of a corporation who deals with the Government. What is his attitude? If he represents a corporation, it is his duty to get the highest price possible for what he is selling. If he represents the Government, it is to get the supplies at the lowest price possible. He is obliged to violate his duty whichever way he acts. If he acts in favor of the Government, he is untrue to the corporation that he represents and to the stockholders of the corporation. If he acts for his corporation, then he is obliged to be untrue to the Government he is supposed to represent. Take either horn of the dilemma. What his duty is we all know. It is in every State constitution in the country. It is the law of every State in the Union. It is the present law of the United States, that a man can not be buyer and seller. Yet here is what we are trying to do. If we adopt the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, we are legalizing this kind of conduct that has been shown here for the last two or three days. It is nothing more nor less than saying these men have a legal right to buy from themselves. So every Senator who wants to legalize the buyer and seller being the same person ought to vote for the Pomerene amendment; but if he is opposed to a man serving two masters at the same time he should vote for the committee amendment, because that is the one that does the work.

Now, Mr. President, I want to add one other thing. We can not be mistaken about this matter. I am going to quote from the New York World of date June 19, under the headline of "Army camp snarl likely to hold up draft for weeks." It does not say by whom the article is written, but I read the part of it that is pertinent:

HARD TO FIX THE BLAME.

As to who is responsible for the many changes and delays it is difficult to say. General Staff officers weeks ago contended that the only way to get the cantonment camps ready was to designate some competent officer or other individual to supervise the work, give him a free hand, and hold him strictly responsible. The criticism most frequently heard is that there have been entirely too many fingers in the pie.

That is prophetic, as it seems to me, under the conditions named. I read further from the article:

Nominally, Col. Isaac W. Littel, of the Quartermaster Corps, who has been building Army barracks and quarters for many years, is in charge of the work. Col. Littel, however, falls far short of having a free hand. A committee of experts, known as the committee on emergency construction and engineering works, of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense, was appointed to assist in the work. This committee in turn has called in numerous architects, engineers, water-supply specialists, city planners, and others.

William A. Starrett, of the architectural firm of Starrett & Van Vleck, is chairman of this committee. The corps of advisers called in by Chairman Starrett includes some of the best known men in the engineering and construction world.

SOME OF THE EXPERTS.

H. B. Eaton, described as "an engineer with a broad experience in estimating and planning," was "borrowed" from the du Pont Powder Co. to prepare an organization chart and advise on quantities and costs of materials. His diagram left Col. Littel at the head of the organization, with the committee on emergency construction and engineering works acting in an advisory capacity.

Next the committee furnished Col. Littel an advisory organization—a new one—

Listen to this—a new one—headed by Maj. M. J. Whitson, drawn from the Grant-Smith Co., of St. Paul, "a man with a broad experience as an executive of construction companies"—

That is put in quotation marks—

Maj. Whitson holds the position of construction manager. Until this announcement was made the general understanding was that Col. Littel was to be the active director of the big job.

Maj. R. E. Hamilton—

By the way, these were the same men referred to in that letter—

Maj. R. E. Hamilton, purchasing agent of the Stone & Webster Corporation, of Boston, was brought to Washington to look after matters of material and transportation.

How was he brought? Voluntarily? Oh, no; through the channels of the Army Officers' Reserve Corps.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator in just one minute.

Maj. R. E. Hamilton, purchasing agent of the Stone & Webster Corporation, of Boston, was brought to Washington to look after matters of material and transportation.

I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator intimates that a gentleman by the name of Hamilton, whom I never heard of before, did not come here in a voluntary capacity because he entered into the Army. Surely the Senator knows that a gentleman who is commissioned in the Reserve Officers' Corps does it voluntarily.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am reading from this newspaper of June 19, from the New York World, in which it says:

Maj. R. E. Hamilton, purchasing agent of the Stone & Webster Corporation, of Boston, was brought to Washington to look after matters of material and transportation.

I am assuming that that statement is correct. I do not know whether it is or not. I do not know Maj. Hamilton myself.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator says he did not come here voluntarily.

Mr. McKELLAR. This article says he did not come here voluntarily. A man who is "brought" does not come voluntarily, as I understand. The Senator may be entirely right about his criticism; I can not say. My construction of the language "being brought" is that there is something involuntary about it; and I imagine—the inference to my mind is, at any rate, that he was brought by his employers down here, and evidently for a purpose; and, inasmuch as they got a very fat contract out of it, they were probably right in having him brought down here.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know anything personally about this contract, or about the man of whom the Senator is speaking. I think I should say, however, of Stone & Webster that at the beginning of the war they were asked to make an estimate for constructing a large building at the Rock Island Arsenal, and they very foolishly, I think, undertook the construction of that building for the Government without any profit whatever. Certainly men who are doing that are not scheming to get an employee in a position of responsibility in order to get a contract out of which they can make a good deal of money.

Mr. McKELLAR. The contract as read from the record a few moments ago shows that they will make a good deal of money out of the present contract. They may be able to recoup on what they lost on the first.

Mr. WEEKS. It is possible that they may make money out of the contract, but they took a large contract on a basis that they should be paid no profit whatever.

Mr. McKELLAR. My proposition is this, that because a firm acted in a patriotic way on one occasison there is no reason why the Government should pay extortionate prices to that firm under the peculiar conditions here when they had a different contract the second time.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator charge that in the instance he is now citing the Government paid an extortionate price on this contract?

Mr. McKELLAR. My idea about it is that on the figures for superintending the contract the scale of prices permits, in the event of an expenditure of $3,000,000 or a little over, that the contractors shall receive a commission for superintending the work of a quarter of a million dollars. In my judgment that is extortionate for work covering a period of less than 90 days.

Mr. WATSON. Is that the price understood to be paid regularly to all contractors under similar conditions?

Mr. McKELLAR. All who are fortunate enough to get these contracts. There are very few of them who will get them.

Mr. WATSON. In other words, this was not an exception, but the contracts were given out at a regular rate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; there were 15 others who got them. Four of them at least had men on the inside when they got them.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the Senator a question, if I am not interrupting him. The Senator says that this man Hamilton was brought here.

Mr. McKELLAR. I read it from the newspaper.

Mr. WATSON. But aside from that, after reading the article the Senator said in answer to an inquiry by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that this man Hamilton had been brought here by his firm. Is it not a fact that he was not brought here until after he had been commissioned in the Officers' Reserve Corps, and he was brought here by the Government and placed in the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know; but on July 11 I wrote a letter, in answer to which he could have stated exactly what the facts are. He still has that right, and no man will be quicker to publish any reply that he may have to make about the fact than I will, and I will see that it goes in the RECORD promptly whenever it comes. That is true of every other person who has been named I do not know any of them, except as I have stated. I just know what the facts are as they have been given to me. I for one do not believe that contracts should be awarded in that way, and I shall never vote for any measure that will permit it if I know it. I now further read from the article:

Maj. F. M. Gunby, of Boston, "a skilled industrial engineer," was appointed to "handle matters of design."

Maj. F. B. Wheaton, United States Army, designing architect of the Quartermaster Corps, who is said to know as much about cantonments as any man in America, was on the job long before Maj. Gunby was brought here by the civilian committee.

I am reading this article to show that the civilian committee, not appointed by the President, not appointed by the Council of National Defense, but appointed by the various chairmen having no obligation to the Government, have superseded the Regular Army officers whose duty it is to attend to this business, the Army officers whose whole lives have been spent in serving the Government in building cantonments or other work such as is now being performed without legal authority by these committees.

Right here may I say this: Take one man who probably we all know, Gen. J. B. Aleshire, one of the ablest men who was ever in our Army, a man in good health at the present time, I am glad to say, a man who knows more about building contracts than probably any other man in this country, a man who could do it more cheaply, whose services could be obtained for just exactly what he is being paid now. He is not even called in or considered in a matter of this kind, but his work is turned over to somebody else at the maximum compensation of $250,000 for each cantonment. I say that if the War Department had turned the building of these cantonments over to such officers as Gen. Aleshire, Maj. Canby, or Col. Littell they would have been built infinitely cheaper and there would be no controversy of this kind arising. Why should these Army officers, on whom we have spent thousands of dollars to train and educate—nay, millions of dollars in training all these years—be ignored and their places taken by civilians?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator, Can he figure out any need for commissions and subcommittees for this and that and the other dealing with cantonments?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely none whatever. Instead of there being 16 firms in this great country of ours who could be inveigled into taking these contracts, I imagine there must be 10,000 capable firms who would be delighted to get them. The contracts were not let on competitive bids. The contractors themselves let the subcontracts somewhat along the lines of competitive bidding to subcontractors, but no competitive bids were asked by the Government. I imagine that there are not less than 10,000 men who would have been delighted to have taken these contracts and who could have built the cantonments better than the favored contractors if they had only been given the opportunity.

Think of it! It is probably 2,000 miles from Boston, Mass., to San Antonio, Tex., and yet a firm away up in New England was given the contract to construct a cantonment away down in Texas.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Tennessee refer to Stone & Webster?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am referring to Stone & Webster.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the Senator know that for at least 10 or 12 years Stone & Webster have done a tremendous construction business in Texas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have heard that they have done some construction business there, and that may be, but, for all that, it does seem to me that local contractors should have been given a chance; and if they could not have done it better, or if they could not have done it cheaper, they ought not to have had the contract. In that case, I would have been for giving it to Stone & Webster; but there should be common fairness and common honesty about this matter. This is not a favored-class war; all the people have to bear the burdens of taxation and duties, and they should all be given a fair chance at the benefits that are to be derived. They ought not to be concentrated in the hands of a favored committee or a number of committees and the work let out at their pleasure. I read on from the article:

There is no question whatever as to the capacity and wide experience of the specialists called to Washington to assist in this work. Neither is there any doubt but the task of constructing 16 cities of 40,000 population each is a tremendous one. The conviction appears to be growing, nevertheless, that the experts are entirely too numerous. For example, a committee on lumber was organized by Bernard M. Baruch, chairman of the committee on raw materials of the national council, to advise on lumber supply and other technical questions. Various organizations of lumbermen sent to Washington numbers of experts to assist in working out the details of specifications for wooden ships and cantonments.

Mr. President, from the investigations that I have made, I am absolutely confident that action ought to be taken in this bill to prevent men from dealing with themselves on these committees. It ought not to be any half-hearted kind of probation, but it should be direct and to the point, and we ought not to make any mistake about it. I hope the Pomerene amendment will be defeated and the committee amendment agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of California obtained the floor.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator has stated that a commission is paid to the inspectors who supervise the work on these cantonments. I should like him to tell us, if he can, just how the contracts are let to the men who are building the cantonments. Do they work on a commission? The Senator from Tennessee says there is no competitive bidding. Just how is it determined what shall be paid to these men to whom the contracts for the cantonments are given?

Mr. McKELLAR. I presume the Senator from Louisiana was not present when the Senator from South Dakota read the schedule of prices. The commission is based on a percentage. For instance, if the Senator were a contractor and desired to build the cantonment at Alexandria, where, I think, the one in the Senator's State is located——

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. And it costs $3,000,000——

Mr. RANSDELL. But who will determine that it is going to cost $3,000,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I have no accurate information except what is general, for, in spite of the fact that I have asked these questions of these committees, I have not been able to get the information, though I made the request over a month ago; but, as I understand, the contractors are given carte blanche to go ahead and build these cantonments and build them within a certain time. They can pay any price they want for labor and for materials. They have full authority to go ahead, spend the money, and build the cantonments.

Mr. RANSDELL. And the only interest——

Mr. McKELLAR. The only interest they have in them is that when they get through they figure up what the entire cost is and what their commission is, and, to show how enormous the commissions are, if at the end of two months they have a camp built and have succeeded in spending as much as $3,000,000 they would be entitled to $210,000—7 per cent.

Mr. RANSDELL. Then under that system there is absolutely no competitive bidding?

Mr. McKELLAR. None whatever. I have affidavits—I am not going to read them now—showing that there is absolutely no competitive bidding. By the way, I think we ought to provide in this bill that there should be——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels that this has gone far enough. The Senator from Tennessee yielded the floor, and the Chair recognized the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and yet this discussion has been going on for five minutes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I asked permission of the Chair to address the Senator from Tennessee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana did not address his inquiry to the Chair; the Senator from Tennessee had yielded the floor, and the Chair recognized the Senator from California.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well, if that is the ruling of the Chair, but I did address the Chair, and the Chair was talking to somebody and did not hear me, and I carried on my colloquy with the Senator from Tennessee. Those are the facts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will proceed.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the interesting and novel thing in the discussion of this particular amendment is that there should be any diversity of opinion upon the very fundamental principle of fiduciary relationship, a principle as old as civilization itself. It was the old Mosaic law which first taught that no man could serve two masters, and that law has been crystallized into the statutes of every State in this Union. To-day in some of the jurisdictions the rule is so strict that a contract entered into by one who occupies a fiduciary relation, wherein profit results to him from the subject matter of his trust, is wholly void, and in other jurisdictions such a contract is voidable; but whether it be void or voidable, any dealing with a trust fund by a trustee who profits in that dealing, any such dealing by a trustee who may profit in that dealing, any such dealing by a trustee who is under the suspicion of profiting by that dealing, no law that yet has been written in any civilized country will ever tolerate or ever permit.

It is a persuasive defense, it is true, and it is a defense indeed that has with it a certain plausibility to say when one who occupies a fiduciary relation and has for himself dealt either with the subject matter of his trust or with his beneficiary that the result is advantageous to the beneficiary. It is, I say, a persuasive but none the less a specious defense, and it is the defense that ever has been made to a transaction by which a trustee from the subject matter of his trust has made a profit or obtained a benefit. The recalcitrant trustee ever asserts that the subject matter of his trust has gained or that he has conferred some particular advantage upon his beneficiary.

Robin Hood's justification and defense years and years ago in a certain sort of economic philosophy was that he took from the rich to give to the poor—a certain sort of political economy that exists doubtless in some quarters and with some people in our own Nation to-day. We had a most striking instance only a few years ago in the city from which I come, where certain supervisors receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars of bribes from public-service corporations for the giving of franchises, said in part justification and defense—a defense as novel as some arguments we have heard here—that the giving of those franchises had conferred a benefit upon the city of San Francisco; that the money they had accepted as bribes for the giving of the franchises had come from rich corporations amply able to pay and not from the city; and they weighed the advantages to the city, and, disclosing that the advantages had been tremendous to the city, they thought they should go scot free despite the manner in which they had dealt in their fiduciary relations as public officials.

I speak not in criticism or in accusation or, indeed, in reflection at all upon any coordinate branch of the Government or any voluntary association that is assisting the Government to-day. I yield to none of the Senators who have spoken against this particular sort of amendment in giving unto the men who have come here at the behest of our President all respect and honor and glory and fame that should be theirs for rendering a patriotic service to-day; but neither they nor we should wish to eliminate a most salutary rule, not a rule of law alone but a rule of morals and of ethics, that would prevent them or anyone in their behalf profiting in bargaining or dealing or having aught to do with anything that they sell to the Government or anything that they give to the Government or anything that the Government in any fashion or any manner purchases from them.

If it be said, as I have heard it said here in the last few days, that there is no necessity for this kind of enactment at this time and that the men who serve at present in the voluntary positions which have been created are far above suspicion, I answer by citing to you the proclamation issued by the President of the United States himself but three or four days ago, wherein, in his peculiarly forceful fashion, he referred to the manner in which a certain few business men of the Nation had been dealing with the Government and had been doing things reprehensible so far as the Government was concerned. If any spur were needed for us to enact in this proposed law the salutary rule that is the rule of every State in this Union and every people on earth where there is any system of judicature, it is afforded to us—aye, the necessity is furnished us—by the words of the President of the United States in the proclamation that he recently issued to this Nation.

I repeat, I honor the men who have come here to do their duty by their Government; I glory in their patriotism, just as all of the Senators who have spoken upon this floor; I yield them every meed of praise that should be accorded to men who answer their country's call; but they, no more than we, no more than any part of our people, should wish them or their agents or their employees or those connected with them in any fashion to deal for pecuniary profit with the Government which now they represent. I trust that some character of amendment will be passed which will write into the law of the Congress of the United States the rule that came to us from Moses and has been the law of every civilization and the very basis of morals and ethics ever since there were any rules or any laws upon this earth.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I can add nothing to what has been so well said by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I simply wish to state that I agree with and indorse everything he has said. I think that the President of the United States in his splendid and forceful letter to the people of this country settled the question whether or not section 3 ought to be adopted, when in a very striking manner he called the attention of the people to the fact that patriotism and profits should not go hand in hand.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise for the purpose of speaking to this provision alone. I want very briefly to call the attention of the Senate to some of the practical provisions of this bill. I have been loath to take much time and to speak in favor of the farmer, as one of whom I class myself; but I know, Mr. President, that the country holds every Senator responsible for his action, and that responsibility, whether he be a farmer or one who is engaged in any other industry.

In this bill there are provisions which authorize the fixing of a price to the farmer. I myself am a grower of grain. Perhaps it might be said that I should not advocate anything that would be in the interest of the producers of grain; but it is hardly necessary to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the farmer has never had an opportunity to fix nor has he been able to have anything to say as to the price of his products. I think there is a distinction between an industry in which thousands, yea, millions, of people are engaged and an industry which is controlled by a very few.

Now, as to the price of grain to the farmer I am of the opinion that if a price shall be fixed the Congress of the United States should assume the responsibility of fixing a minimum price, rather than confer that authority or responsibility upon some individual or upon some board. I am of the opinion that the people of this country would approve of any action that we might take fixing a reasonable price for the farmer's products. I say "fixing it in the law," rather than to leave it to some person, regardless of how able or responsible that person may be.

I need not say, Mr. President, that I believe the farmers of the United States are loyal to the Government; I need not say that I believe they are obedient to the law. I know the farmers of my State are obedient to law and loyal to the Government, and want to do their share during this war. They want to continue in the future, as they have in the past, to do their bit.

Mr. President, as I have indicated, if a price shall be fixed on grain, I believe it ought to be fixed by Congress. The price to-day based upon the law of supply and demand is in the neighborhood of from $2.75 to $2.80 a bushel at the terminal markets. It has been suggested to me that the minimum price should be fixed at $1.75; but, Mr. President, I believe that that is altogether too low. I do not believe that we should agree to a minimum price of less than $2 per bushel at the primary markets. I believe, if we are going to encourage the producers of this country to produce more wheat, that we must be willing to accord them a reasonable price. Every other industry has had an opportunity—and that opportunity will continue, at least while we are at war—to increase the price of its products.

The farmer is a consumer as well as a producer; the farmer consumes as much as the man who lives in the city; he buys more than the man who lives in the city. Everything the farmer produces is sold, and goes to purchase not only materials and food but machinery to carry on his farming operations.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate to call attention to the advance in the price of farm implements and of other articles the farmer buys, but I desire to say that for everything the farmer buys he pays a higher price to-day than he did a year ago, and he paid a higher price a year ago than he did the year before. Now, would it be right to fix a price by law that would not compensate the farmer for the expense involved in growing wheat? We might just as well be frank. Foreign countries want American wheat; and if it were not for the purpose of getting American wheat at a low price this proposed legislation would not be here. I do not believe that, in comparison with the price which we pay for other products, the present price of wheat to-day is unduly high, and yet it is a dollar more than the minimum price proposed to be fixed by the sponsors of this proposed amendment.

In the spring-wheat belt, which includes the two Dakotas, Minnesota, and Montana, and especially my State, the crop is not going to be a large one. Last year we had a failure in the production of spring wheat. We raised only about 40,000,000 bushels, whereas in 1915 we raised 155,000,000 bushels. It has been estimated that this year we will produce possibly 75,000,000 bushels of spring wheat, but I am informed by several persons from my State that the production will be much less than that.

Now, no man will deny that under present conditions, if it were left to the law of supply and demand, the farmer would get at least from $2.50 to $3 a bushel for his wheat this year. I ask you would it be right for the Congress of the United States to say that the farmer shall buy in the open market while his product shall be controlled by the Government? I understand it is the purpose of some of the Members of this body to eliminate all other products except foods, feeds, and fuels.

Why should we ask the farmer to sell in a controlled market and buy in an uncontrolled market? Why should we eliminate cotton from this bill? The grain farmer buys cotton; the grain farmer buys steel; the grain farmer buys oil and coal. The price of steel and its products, implements which are necessarily used on the farm, has a marked effect on the cost of production of grain. I understand that it is proposed to eliminate all other commodities so that no industry shall be hampered except the industry of farming, and that the control in that direction shall be limited to those who produce grain.

Now, let us see what has been done with reference to cotton. Cotton has advanced 100 per cent or more as compared to its price a year or two ago. I do not say that the price of cotton is too high; I do not believe it is; I believe the cotton farmers of the South are entitled to every penny they get for their cotton; but I do say that we have no more right to eliminate cotton from this bill than we have to eliminate wheat. Speaking of the price of cotton, let me call attention to the fact that the price of manufactured cotton has in many instances advanced more than 100 per cent. I know that the ordinary fabrics of cotton have advanced more than 100 per cent.

But you say, "We must control wheat, because it is a food product." Mr. President, you have no right to say to the man who produces wheat, "Your product shall be controlled, but the products that you buy shall not be controlled."

Already there has been great injury done to the farming industry of this country, and I want to call your attention to some facts which exist not only in my State but in other States. I want to read a quotation from a paper published at Devils Lake, N. Dak., which gives the price of wheat at the terminal markets and also gives the price of wheat and other grain in the local market.

On July 14, 1917, No. 1 hard wheat was worth at Minneapolis $2.70 a bushel. The same grade of wheat, No. 1 hard, was bought at $2.12 a bushel, making a difference of 58 cents per bushel. Now, I want to ask you, how have you helped the consumer of grain by forcing down the price of wheat to the farmer at the primary markets when the same quality of grain is being sold at the terminal markets at 60 and 70 cents per bushel more? I do not believe that you are helping the consumer. I have not noticed that there has been a decline in the secondary products. I do not believe that the people in the city of Washington have observed any decline in the price of food products, and yet there has been a decline in the price of wheat in the primary markets of from 40 to 50 per cent because wheat sold at one time as high as $3 a bushel. I do not know what it is at the present day, but on July 13 it sold at $2.10 at this same place, Devils Lake, N. Dak., and in the city of Minneapolis it sold at $2.70 per bushel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose that Senators are not aware of the fact that the difference on freight would be only about 10 cents a bushel. Now, has my colleague investigated the subject so that he can inform the Senate why there is a difference of 60 cents a bushel between the primary and the terminal markets, when the freight amounts to only about 10 cents a bushel? Something is decidedly wrong there. There must be some underlying principle governing that that ought to be rectified.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, my colleague is right. I want to say to the Senate that the freight charges upon this particular point are 13 cents a hundred, or 7.8 cents per bushel. The commission charges would be 1 cent per bushel. There are some charges made for switching, but in all the charges would not exceed 11¼ cents per bushel, and the spread between the terminal markets and the primary markets is usually 15 or 16 cents, whereas to-day it is 60 cents and more per bushel.

Now, as to the cause, Mr. President. Of course I do not know that I can give a satisfactory answer to the question of my colleague, but I can state my opinion. I believe that the price of grain to the farmers at all the terminal markets has been ruined by these very men, who are, if reports are correct, to assume the responsibility of fixing the prices of grain to the farmers in the future. I believe that the price of grain at the markets has been destroyed, because no man dares to invest his money; no man, I say, dares to buy grain for future shipment; no miller dares to buy any more than from hand to mouth, because he does not know what he may be able to get for that grain or for that product when it is sold. That is the only explanation that I can give of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if my colleague will allow me again, certainly there are a vast number of independent elevator buyers throughout the State, buyers who have been in the habit of buying on a 2½ to 3 cents per bushel margin of safety; and if grain is quoted in Minneapolis at $2.60, in view of the fact that it only takes two or three days to get the grain from North Dakota to this great terminal market, I can not, for the life of me, understand why they should be so fearful that they would not dare take a chance where there is a spread of practically 60 cents a bushel. I confess that I can not understand it. It does not seem to me possible that the wheat is being sold at all in the State and shipped unless it can be sold for something nearer the cost price than the price for which it is sold at the great terminals.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to my colleague that these are bona fide transactions, and I shall quote prices from the different parts of our State. I know that grain has been bought at these prices and has been shipped to the terminals, and of course the terminal prices can easily be verified.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say that I do not doubt at all the correctness of the figures; but I am a seeker after information, as I know my colleague is, as to the cause of this immense spread between the primary market and the terminal market.

Mr. GRONNA. I can only say, Mr. President, that with this statement which was made—and I dislike very much to mention anybody's name—but with this statement which was made by Mr. Hoover that the public ought to pay only a certain price for flour, which, of course, would not warrant the miller in buying grain, even at $1.90 a bushel, and a price which would not warrant the miller in selling his product at $9 a barrel, which was named by him, I can readily see that these people feel that they are not warranted in laying in a supply, that they are not willing to take a chance and pay what the wheat is actually worth, and they are therefore buying it at an abnormally low price.

Mr. McCUMBER. But let me call my colleague's attention to the fact that Minneapolis is one of the greatest milling centers in the United States, and the millers there seem to have no fear in paying 60 cents a bushel more than is being paid out in our own State, and have the courage to purchase wheat at those prices and to convert it into flour.

Mr. GRONNA. Well, my colleague knows that a great many elevators are owned by the milling concerns in Minneapolis. That is true with regard to all those large milling concerns. They have hundreds of elevators scattered all over our State, and all over the Western States, and, of course, when they buy at this low price at the primary market it is really the mills that are getting the wheat at this low price; I do not say all of it, but a large share of it.

Mr. President, I have here a number of clippings which I shall not take the time of the Senate to read, but I want to ask permission to have them inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. GRONNA. I want to quote from one of the papers published at Grand Forks, N. Dak.

On July 13 No. 1 northern wheat was sold at Grand Forks, N. Dak., for $1.92 per bushel, and on that very same day wheat was worth in the terminal markets $2.70. Now, by this legislation and by the discussion that has been going on here and by the newspaper articles we have succeeded in robbing the farmers of the country—I say robbing them—of a price to which they are entitled. We have taken at least 25 to 50 cents a bushel away from them, and we are not helping the consumers, because the price of bread and the price of flour is not controlled by the farmers. In fact, there is not anything controlled by the farmers.

I know, Mr. President, that farmers' organizations all over the country have been dissatisfied with the conditions of the past. They have felt that the chambers of commerce and the boards of trade have manipulated prices to the loss and disadvantage of the farmers; but I must admit that never in the history of the country have the farmers been robbed to the extent that they are being robbed to-day in the prices of their grain. I do not believe that it is fair for those who are so willing to administer this law to criticize the Members of Congress because they want to do their full duty.

I want to call the attention of the country to the fact that the only men from the grain district who have been here, to my knowledge, are the very men whom we have termed the grain gamblers of the country. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry know that the only gentleman who appeared before us was Mr. Barnes, of Duluth. I am not an enemy of Mr. Barnes, I am his friend; but Mr. Barnes is one of the large dealers in grain on the boards of trade not only in Duluth but in other cities of the West. He is among those very men whom the farmers' organizations have termed gamblers in wheat. I want to read an amendment suggested to the Senate not only by Mr. Barnes but by Mr. Hoover and by Hoover's attorney. There is not a Senator on this floor who will dare to defend it.

Mr. President, section 6 of the bill is the section which provides against hoarding and makes it unlawful. The section is very short. I think I had better read it. I read from the bill:

That necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (b) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price: Provided, however, That any accumulating or withholding by any farmer or gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or any other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of this act.

Now, let me read the amendment proposed by those who are going to stop the gambling in food products. I read from the amendment reported by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]:

Provided, That such operations, practices, and transactions at, on, or in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or other similar institution or place of business, as are not prohibited by the regulations made by the President, pursuant to the provisions of this section, shall not be deemed to be within the intent and meaning of section 6 of this act.

What does that mean? That means that the practice of gambling in food is legalized, but if a producer of grain or a miller or anybody else outside of a chamber of commerce or board of trade should deal in grain, he would be liable to suffer the penalties as prescribed under section 6. I say that these recommendations of Mr. Hoover and his attorney, Mr. Lindsey, are indefensible, because they legalize the practice of gambling in food products, and penalize honest business. Yet we are told that unless we pass this bill speedily we are going to be reported to our constituents. Well, Mr. President, there will be something said to our constituents about this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a few questions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have understood during these debates that the Senator just addressing the Senate was one of the most earnest in advocating a food-control bill. Was my information correct?

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator is right in understanding that I am not opposed to a food bill providing you will treat those engaged in that industry fairly, so that they will be enabled to conduct their business and produce food; but I am opposed to the proposition of singling out the producer of food as the only man who shall suffer, and for whose benefit, I ask the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KING. If the Senator is addressing his interrogatory to me, I will say that I do not agree that the farmer is suffering to the extent the Senator would imply. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; certainly.

Mr. KING. Did not the Senator upon a number of occasions insist that some measure should be passed to prevent gambling in food products?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; and I still think so.

Mr. KING. And has not the Senator repeatedly inveighed very strongly upon the floor of the Senate against the food gamblers and insisted that something should be done by the Government to control food speculation?

Mr. GRONNA. I have insisted upon it, and I still insist upon it, but I want to say to the Senator from Utah, with due respect to him as a learned lawyer, that there is no such provision in this bill, and I challenge the Senator from Utah to show it.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator from Utah might, if afforded the opportunity, point out some features of the bill that meet the suggestion just made, but that was not the point to which I was about to address myself.

The Senator complained a moment ago that the farmer was being robbed. As I understand, the farmer is getting to-day for his wheat more than 100 per cent above that which he obtained before the war. Is that correct?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, it is pretty hard to tell what the farmer is getting in my section of the country, because we have not harvested this year's crop.

Mr. KING. Is not wheat now selling upon the market for a price considerably above $2?

Mr. GRONNA. It is away above $2 in the terminal markets, but it is below $2 in the primary markets.

Mr. KING. Are not the farmers of the country to-day demanding and obtaining in excess of $2 per bushel for their wheat?

Mr. GRONNA. No; they are not obtaining as much as $2. In many instances they are receiving a great deal less than $2 in the primary markets.

Mr. KING. Prior to the war the farmers were receiving less than $1, as a rule, for their wheat, were they not?

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, I will say to the Senator that prior to the war they sold wheat as low as 40 cents a bushel. Of course that condition existed some 20 years ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to say that in my county—I have just returned from home—they are now selling new wheat, just gathered, for $2.40 a bushel.

Mr. KING. My information is that farmers are receiving for their wheat from $2 per bushel to $2.50 per bushel. I understand from the attitude of the Senator heretofore that he has insisted upon the Government controlling coal because the coal operators were charging substantially 100 per cent more than they did before the war.

Mr. GRONNA. I have not said anything about coal.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that the Government ought to control coal because the coal operators are charging 100 per cent or more above the prices they obtained in prewar times?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. I will yield to my colleague in one minute. I desire to make the analysis with reference to the coal question in my own time and in my own way.

Mr. KING. Yes; I do not want——

Mr. GRONNA. I have not had an opportunity to discuss the question of coal. I believe that the Government should have something to say about the price of coal if the coal operators are getting abnormally high prices, but I am not in a position to know what the price of coal should be.

Mr. KING. I am trespassing upon the generosity of the Senator, of course, and I will only propound, with his indulgence, one further question.

Does the Senator think that the farmer ought to be less patriotic than manufacturers and other producers of necessaries, and that because we are at war he ought to ask and demand an unreasonable and an abnormal price for the products of the farm, when at the same time he is insisting that the producer of coal and steel and other products and the manufacturers from whom he buys shall be controlled so that their profits shall be substantially those that they had before the war?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think the Senator is seriously asking that question. If the Senator knows anything about prices, he must admit that steel is 300 per cent higher to-day than it was before the war.

If the Senator knows anything about farming, he must admit that there is no product that is more important to the industry of farming than steel. I may say to the Senator from Utah that the price to the farmer has not advanced in proportion to the prices of the factory.

I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah seems to have an entire misapprehension of what the farmers received for the crop that has been raised and sold, and he seems to see no difference between a high price for a quarter of a crop and a doubling of the price of coal where the quantity available is just as great as it ever was.

Let me call his attention to the fact that the people of the State of North Dakota sold 95 per cent of their grain for less than a dollar a bushel, and that they raised only a quarter of a crop of wheat, and the reason why the price of grain was so high was because they did not have it to sell. They are not receiving two and three dollars a bushel for an average and full crop of wheat, while coal, as the Senator knows, is in the ground to-day, almost as much of it as there was a year ago or two years ago or three years ago. If the statisticians are correct, we are not taking a thousandth part of 1 per cent of our coal out of the earth yearly. If that is correct, then there is little excuse, other than the high price of wages, and so forth, for the rise in the price of coal, while in the case of wheat there is an excuse, that we did not raise the wheat. We only had a quarter of a crop in our own State, and the entire spring crop, I believe, was only about one-third of what it was the year before. Therefore there is a legitimate reason for the rise in the value of wheat, and, as my colleague has said, everything that the farmer purchases has increased far more than the price of this grain, with the exception of a little spurt in the price of grain during a few days in the month of May.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. My colleague is absolutely right in what he has said. The farmer who raises grain depends not only upon the treatment he is going to get from those who fix prices, but, of course, he must look to the future and to the elements of nature as well.

I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I just wanted to say that I am familiar with the prices to which the Senator refers, and I did not mean to intimate by any of the questions I propounded any lack of sympathy with the farmers of our country. I was only interested in elucidating, so far as a few questions would permit, the psychology of the discussion of a measure which in any way fixes prices or seeks to subject business to governmental control. I noticed, and I say this with all due respect to the distinguished Senator who now has the floor, that he was very earnest for a bill to control foods, fuels, and other products, and yet when he thinks that the prices to be paid the farmer may be affected by this bill, I fancy I see somewhat of a diminution in the enthusiasm of the Senator, and other Senators from agricultural districts, in the support given by him and them to this measure.

The situation only illustrates the fact that in war times human nature is very much the same as it is in peace times, and that the farmer is not much different from the coal man or the steel man or the manufacturer. If there is a chance to get increased prices, the farmer is likely to ask the opportunity to get advanced prices upon his products. This human trait—call it selfishness or any other name—which now strikingly appears when our country is battling for the preservation of liberty and the rights of American citizens, will strengthen the position of those who believe that in the interest of the Nation while at war as well as the great mass of our people who are not producers or manufacturers, there ought to be some legislation that will afford them protection. There is a feeling that the millions who work for wages, who are not engaged in big business, in manufacturing, and in producing, though their labors are productive and absolutely essential to the maintenance of society and our Government, should be protected from the rapacity of those who are willing to use the war as an excuse for extortionate prices. It seems to me that the voice of this important class of people in the United States should not be ignored and that there should be some legislation that will protect, as far as legislation can protect, their interests. Of course the interests of the agricultural classes are important and there should be no legislation that would discriminate against them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will my colleague just let me answer that proposition on the day-laborer idea?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have an amendment to this bill now, if I ever get an opportunity to present it after the debate upon section 3, and that amendment disposes entirely of fixing any minimum price whatever for grain. If you will vote into this bill a proposition that the American farmer shall receive for his grain a price that will pay for the labor employed in producing the grain upon the farm an equivalent of what is paid for other like labor elsewhere in the United States and a reasonable return upon the investment, my colleague and I will be mighty grateful to you and we shall not ask that you grant to the farmer anything greater than that. We know, as you ought to know if you have studied the situation, that the lowest paid labor in the city of Washington or New York or elsewhere will earn more bread in a given hour three times over than the farmer will receive for the wheat that went into that flour for a given amount of wages. Now, if you are willing to put them upon an equality, so that the farmer will receive just as much in wage as this other labor, we will be eminently satisfied. If, for instance, it requires no more labor to produce a Stetson hat and put it upon the market than it takes to produce a bushel of wheat and put it on the market, then a bushel of wheat ought to trade for a Stetson hat, ought it not? That would be fair. Are you willing to put the farmer upon that basis? If you are, we will be satisfied, and there will be no quarrel about high prices.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me; I understand, then, as a deduction from the very learned statement just made by the Senator, he would like the farmer to get from three to five dollars a bushel for his wheat.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; I would like to have him get from three to five dollars a bushel if the other labor is at the equivalent rate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. We have no labor.

Mr. McCUMBER. No labor in the United States to-day! Mr. President, if we had double the population, the people are here to do the work to-day. No one need say to-day that he can not get work.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I agree with what my colleague has said. If the farmer takes a bushel of wheat to market, he will simply take in exchange for that wheat a pair of brogans, as suggested to me the other day by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. In the matter of exchange we know the farmer will not gain any great benefit under the present-day arrangement. If the Senator from Utah has studied the market reports, and I presume he has, he will agree with me that everything which the farmer purchases has advanced to the farmer as well as it has advanced to the people in the cities. Copper, zinc, lead, the products of the mine, the products of the factory, have all advanced more, I will say to the Senator, than has the price of grain based upon to-day's prices.

The Senator from Utah also knows that there is no guaranty to the farmer in this bill. There is only a provision which says that somebody, somewhere, shall have the authority to fix the price. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah if he believes that with the uncertain conditions the farmers of the country would plant the grain necessary, and which will be needed not only for ourselves but for the allies, unless they are sure they are at least going to get cost for it?

Mr. KING. I would not be able categorically to answer the question of the Senator, but, briefly, I will say yes. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the domestic demands and the foreign demands for wheat and for all nonperishable farm produce will be so great during the next one or two years, at least during the progress of the war, that the farmers of the United States will get very much more, whether there is a minimum price fixed in this bill or otherwise, for their farm products than they have obtained at any time since the period of the Civil War; that they will obtain for their products, whether there is a minimum price fixed or not, higher prices relatively than many of the manufacturers will receive for their products, and very much more relatively than the laborers of the United States will receive. In other words, the per cent advances in prices over those prevailing before the war will be less upon the part of many articles of manufacture than upon farm products, and the increase in wages will not correspond with the advance in the products of the farm.

I do not think that the farmers of the United States are going to let their farms lie idle; I do not think they are going to be unpatriotic because there may be no high minimum price fixed for their products; but, on the contrary, they are going to sow and reap and plant and sell and greatly increase the quantity of farm products, and as a result of the domestic and foreign demand which will be increasingly greater they will enjoy prosperity greater than ever before.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with a part of the statement of the Senator from Utah. I agree with the Senator that they will sow and that they will reap, but with the price of corn at nearly $2 a bushel, and in New York above $2 a bushel, and with the price of wheat at $1.75, when as the Senator knows we have produced in the United States ever since 1860, 100 per cent more corn to the acre than wheat, does the Senator think that the farmer is such a stupid fool that he would plant wheat when he could plant corn and grow twice as much and get the same price for it? Does the Senator think that would be possible?

Mr. KING. If the Senator propounds that as a question to me, I will say that, having had some little experience on a farm and having associated with farmers all my life, I have reached the conclusion that the farmer is not stupid by any means, but he is about as wise and about as shrewd, and certainly as patriotic, as any of the people you can find in the United States.

But, I repeat, that with the demand of the domestic market plus the demand of the allies, and the neutrals with whom we may have dealings, the price of wheat will be so great that the farmers will raise more next year than they raised this year and they will derive a greater profit next year than that obtained this year. I am assuming, of course, that this war will not be ended within that period.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it the Senator's opinion that we shall fix no price at all, but let him go on and transact business undisturbed in the same manner as people engaged in other industries?

Mr. KING. I will say to the Senator that I have a bill here which I think is better than the bill reported by the committee of which the Senator is a member, and that did not propose to fix prices at all. I do not quite approve the theory upon which this bill is drawn, nor will it, in my opinion, accomplish what many of its advocates claim for it. Yet I shall support it, because I think there should be some legislation to meet the conditions confronting us and to prepare for evil days, should the war continue for two or more years. What I would prefer is not to fix a minimum price, but leave that, if any prices are to be fixed, to Mr. Hoover or the commission or board, if one shall be created. That can be more intelligently done by Mr. Hoover or a commission than by Congress. It is manifest that such a commission would have more information than we possess; besides, circumstances and conditions are constantly changing, and a legislative price to-day might prove wholly improper for six months hence.

For instance, the crop of the present year has been raised, and the fixing of a minimum price now would be of no advantage whatever as an inducement to farmers to plant for the current year. If it shall be determined by the board that shall be created or by the food controller that conditions are such that there should be encouragement offered to the farmer to plant extensively for the year 1918, if the submarine menace shall continue to work its devastations as it has in the past and the wheat that we ship abroad shall largely be lost from submarine attacks, if it shall appear that the needs of the people are so great that every possible encouragement must be offered the farmer to produce wheat, then a minimum price might be required, and I would give in the bill authority to such commission or such food controller to fix a minimum price.

But still I come back to the proposition that I am not much of a believer in the efficacy of price fixing. In some instances it will disturb business, demoralize commerce, and prove futile to accomplish the end in view. The measure I have introduced will, in my opinion, prove far more efficacious in working out the problem that confronts the American people than the bill now submitted by the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I will yield in a moment. I do not think the Senator from Utah and I disagree as to the patriotism of the farmer. It is my impression that the farmers of the United States have not asked for this bill. So far as I know, the farmers of the country are not asking for this legislation at all. We are simply forcing it upon them. Of course, if we are going to force it upon the farmers, those of us who represent the grain-growing sections of the country must insist that the minimum price must be at least a reasonable price, a price at which they will be able to produce it. I yield to the Senator from Missouri if he wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. REED. I simply wish to suggest a little out of time to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the farmer would ask, if he were left alone to Congress, that his market be not taken away from him—the market for his surplus crop. We are now considering a bill that at least provides the means by which his domestic market can be largely controlled.

Mr. KING. As I understand the Senator, I agree with him.

Mr. REED. That being the case, it follows, does it not, that unless some sort of protection is afforded him he is liable to be ruined or driven out of the business of raising wheat? That is the reason why something must be done in this bill. If we do discourage the wheat farmer, if we drive him out of the wheat business, then we will cut off the supply of the very thing which is the world's greatest need to-day.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Dakota pardon me for a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think the Chair should have something to say about it. I will be glad to yield, however.

Mr. KING. The Senator has been very courteous, and I shall not further trespass upon his time.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I agree with what the President said the other day in his message to the people of the United States, that we ought to separate the question of making profits and the question of patriotism. I believe the farmers of the United States will be perfectly satisfied if that is done.

Personally, Mr. President, I do not think that the farmers are entitled to any better treatment than people engaged in any other industry, but we know that ever since the industry of farming was known the producer of farm products has never been able to fix the price. During this war period naturally prices are high, and the question is, Is it fair to one industry which never from the very nature of things has been able to control the products of its industry, but which very often has been compelled to sell in the markets of the world at prices below cost?

I ask the Members of this body is it fair to the men engaged in the industry that now while we are at war and the European countries need our products for food, is it right for the Government of the United States to fix the price for what they produce way below that which they would get fixed by the law of supply and demand? It can not be denied by any Senator that we are taking that much out of the pockets of the farmers of the country. If we include all the industries in this bill, and the bill shall be passed as it has been amended upon the floor, then the farmer has no right to complain; he must take his chances with the rest of the people; but you single out only the farmers of the country, the particular farmers engaged in raising the cereals or grains, and say to them that while for centuries you have sold your products fixed by somebody else in the markets of the world, based as you say, upon the law of supply and demand, and you have had to sell at a loss, yet now when you have an opportunity, when production is below that of consumption, you shall not have the opportunity to get the benefit of the law of supply and demand, but we shall limit your profits by law.

When the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was up the other day providing that the Government shall purchase whisky every constitutional lawyer on the floor soon discovered that we were taking private property without due process of law. How much better is this whisky which is made out of grain? Why not apply the same Constitution to the farmer that you applied to the Whisky Trust? Is there anything divine about whisky? Because grain has been transformed into whisky is there any reason why the farmer should not have as much right to say "You have taken my wheat without due process of law" as it is for the distiller to say, those who own the distilleries and who own the whisky, "You can not take my property because I am going to fix my own price; at least I am going to get my cost and a profit."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the Senator's argument. I have great respect for his opinion and for his knowledge of wheat and prices and conditions under which wheat is produced. I should like to ask him if in his opinion there is any place in the bill where it is sought to limit the price of wheat to the farmer?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; there is. I will say to the Senator that is my understanding that what we call the minimum price will be an absolute price, and I will tell the Senator why.

Mr. HOLLIS. I shall be very glad to hear it.

Mr. GRONNA. There will be but one purchaser of wheat, as the Senator knows. At least Mr. Hoover so stated before the committee. There will be of the surplus only one purchaser; that purchaser fixes the price, and when you name a minimum price, call it what you please, it is an absolute price.

Mr. HOLLIS. Does the Senator understand that that is under this bill? My understanding is that there is not anything of that sort in this bill. There may be elsewhere, but I do not find anything of that sort in the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator the bill reported from the committee only provides that somebody shall have the authority to fix the minimum price.

Mr. HOLLIS. But there is nothing in the bill, as I see it, that will prevent the farmer from getting as much more than the minimum price as the market affords.

Mr. GRONNA. No; there is not.

Mr. HOLLIS. If there is outside of the bill some way by which they could combine and beat the price down, that is not in this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. No; it is not in the bill; but the Senator knows that already there is an embargo placed upon wheat. That has taken our market, and shutting off our foreign market leaves the only consumers of wheat to the American mills.

Mr. HOLLIS. There is nothing of that kind in this bill, so far as I have understood it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from North Dakota permit an interruption at that point?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to section 5 of the bill, which might be termed the licensing section, under which the Government is authorized to establish a licensing system to apply to any person, firm, or corporation engaged in the manufacture, production, or distribution or marketing of any of the necessaries, of which wheat is one. Under the licensing system the Government is authorized to establish rules and regulations governing methods, practices, profits, and commissions. If that is not a price-fixing section, I do not know what one is.

Mr. HOLLIS. But it expressly exempts the fixing of prices on products in the hands of the producer.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But if you fix the price of flour made by the miller and the margin to be allowed the miller between the cost of his wheat and the purchase price of his flour to the consumer, you fix the price of wheat.

Mr. HOLLIS. But there is nothing in the bill which permits the fixing of the price of flour or fixing the price of wheat in anybody's hands. It merely provides that the profits to be charged by the middle man may be regulated.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that originally there was nothing in the bill which provided for the fixing of any price—that is, directly—but, as the Senator from New York has stated, by the provisions of section 5, which is the licensing section, there is no question of doubt in my mind that the price not only of wheat but of flour can be controlled in that way. So indirectly we are giving authority to somebody to make the price.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, Mr. Hoover has announced that that is what he will do under that section.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true. I think that the farmers of the country, when they know the true situation, will feel that they have reason to complain. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr.

REED] has so ably said in discussing this question, Mr. Hoover—and I have the highest respect for Mr. Hoover; I think he is a very able and conscientious citizen—has said, and he has been unfortunate in making the statement, that the price of wheat might be forced down to 75 cents. I want to say to the Members of this body that if the price of wheat is forced down to 75 cents no one in this country will be able to produce wheat. It is not a question of whether or not they are willing to do so—the question is, Are they able to do it? It is not a question of patriotism, as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] suggests.

Speaking about the price of wheat before the war and now, the price of wheat the day the war was declared, I am informed by the Senator from Oklahoma, was $2.02 a bushel. I admit that the farmer is getting more for his grain to-day than he was receiving before the war; no sensible man will deny that. I am not opposed to, and I shall not oppose, any bill which provides that all the industries of the country shall be controlled. I am willing to trust the President of the United States; I am willing to let him regulate all industries, if necessary, during the war; but I am unwilling to single out one industry, an industry which has always suffered at the hands of the men who handle the secondary products. The people who are engaged in this industry never have an opportunity to fix the price, are never able to say what the price shall be, and have always purchased in an uncontrolled market and sold in a controlled market. It is to that I am objecting, Mr. President.

I can see no reason why the grain farmers of the country should be singled out in this way. If you are going to put the grain farmers under this ban, then, I say, put the cotton farmers in the same position. I know of no reason why cotton and the products of the factory as well as wheat should not be controlled by the Government. I am finding no fault with the prices received by the cotton grower of the South; I do not think he is getting too much even to-day. I know that the cotton farmer, as well as all the farmers in this broad land, have been underpaid in the past; I know that that condition will prevail in the future; and I ask you, in all fairness, at this time, when the farmer—I care nothing about what he may produce—has an opportunity of getting a fair price for his product, why limit that price by law? Why single him out? Millions of people are engaged in agriculture, as you know. Other great industries of this country are controlled by comparatively few men. Why not limit the profits of those who have always been able to name the price of their product and to name a price that has been highly profitable to them?

If you will pass this bill as it was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and amended on this floor, and direct the President of the United States to control the other industries now included, I shall vote for it, and I shall not ask for any price to be fixed for the product of the grain growers. I do not want to give them any special advantage; and the farmers then will be content to take their chances. I am in favor of giving to the President the right to take anything he may need to carry on this war. He has the right now under the Constitution to commandeer anything that he may want to use for the Army and the Navy.

While we have been talking about the high price of wheat and the high price of flour, let me ask how much flour is consumed per capita in the United States? From 180 pounds to 196 pounds of flour is all that a person needs in a whole year. We consume less than 600,000,000 bushels of wheat in the United States annually, and it requires about 60,000,000 of that for seed. Four bushels and a half of wheat, which would be 270 pounds, will make 196 pounds of the best patent flour, and that would leave 74 pounds of by-products—bran and middlings, as we call them. If flour is to be sold at $9 per barrel, it is very easy to figure out what the price of wheat will be; it does not take a very smart man to figure that out. We know that the miller must be paid something for manufacturing the wheat into flour; but I have always understood that it is perfectly safe to figure that 4½ bushels of wheat will make a barrel of flour, and that the miller will make ample profit out of the 74 pounds of by-products derived from the manufacture of wheat into flour.

Now, we are talking about $2 wheat, but there are many grades and varieties of wheat. We forget that $2 a bushel for the highest grade of wheat would not mean $2 a bushel to the farmer. Let me call your attention again to this clipping from which I quoted a moment ago, which sets forth that while at Minneapolis on the 12th day of July No. 1 hard wheat was worth $2.60 a bushel only $2 a bushel was paid for durum wheat. Less than a year ago durum or macaroni wheat was sold at a premium of 10 cents per bushel.

So it can be seen what treatment the farmer is getting. We are willing to take the treatment in the future during this war that we have in the past; but for one I am unwilling, Mr. President, to leave the whole matter to an individual who does not understand this great industry or to some man who is not familiar with the conditions in this country. The President of the United States can not attend to these matters in detail.

Let me say that when the Agricultural Committee was called by the President to the White House he made it very plain, I thought, to the committee that the farmer should be paid a fair price. Every member who was present there that night heard the President say that he believed the producer of wheat should be paid a price that would pay him a profit. That is what President Wilson said to the committee. I do not wish to be understood in anything that I may say as criticizing the President, because I am not. I am here to help the President. I am here to perform my duty according to the light that I have, and I believe that it would be detrimental to fix a price—call it a minimum price, if you please, but it will mean an absolute price—so low that the farmer would not be induced to plant as much or more wheat next year than he planted this year. No man can criticize the farmers. They planted millions of acres more this year than they did last year. They did not know what the price was going to be, but they were willing to take their chances. However, it is a different proposition when the Congress of the United States undertakes to provide by law that an individual who has stated to the committee and to the country that this product shall bring only so much shall be made the director of this great industry, an industry which involves billions of dollars of production. It is no small matter.

I am unwilling, I repeat, to leave the provision in the bill as it is now and to grant this unlimited authority to one man, who has already stated that flour shall not be sold for more than $9 and who before the Committee on Agriculture said that flour should be sold at $6.50 a barrel, which means $1.20 wheat, and yet it is proposed to give him that authority.

Mr. President, I should like very much to have an opportunity to vote for a bill that would give the President absolute authority over all industries during this war. If such a bill as that is presented, I shall vote for it. I do not ask that any special privilege be given to the farmers, but I do object, as I have said, to singling him out and making a martyr of him, as I understand is going to be proposed.

Now, we know that the allies want our wheat. They want to get it as cheaply as possible, and I do not blame them for that, but let us see as to the patriotism of the people over there and how they are treating their own people and us. I read from a statement made by Mr. Bonar Law, whom I presume it is safe to quote as an authority:

BONAR LAW TELLS BIG SHIP PROFITS—ANSWERS CRITICS OF SPECIAL TAXES ON VESSEL OWNERS.

[Special cable from the London Times to the Washington Post, copyright, 1917, by Public Ledger Co.]

LONDON, July 4.

The Times parliamentary correspondent says:

"In the House of Commons to-day there was a striking debate on the finance bill increasing the excess-profits duty by an 8 per cent differential against shipowners. Several members warmly protested against singling out one class for exceptional treatment. Bonar Law met them by narrating his own experience with shipping shares. He had invested £8,110 in 15 different shipping companies under the management of 7 owners. He would have been glad to get 5 per cent interest, £405, a year in ordinary times. As an actual fact he received £3,624 in 1915 and £3,847 in 1916.

"'Good Lord!' exclaimed Mr. Duncan, the labor member. 'Was that after paying the excess-profits duty?'

"'Yes,' Bonar Law replied. Besides that, one of these steamers had been sold or sunk. He had £200 in that ship, and on top of his handsome dividend had received a check for £1,000 on the liquidation.

"'That is the trade we are ruining,' was Mr. Law's parting comment. He declared it wrong that the Government should have allowed such profits to have been made, but made it clear that he attributed no blame to the shipowners. As to the general case of the excess-profits duty, he did not know how the Government could have financed the war without it. The only alternative would have been a large increase in the income tax."

You are going to take the wheat from the American farmer at a low price. Then we are going to let the allies charge us the high ocean rates—the robber prices which the President of the United States called attention to in his letter the other day. We are going to permit that thing to go on.

How about our boys in the trenches? They need bread. How about the Government of the United States buying back this grain or paying these enormous freight rates admitted by Bonar Law? I do not hear any complaints about that here. It seems to be perfectly satisfactory to let the allies charge the American people and rob the American farmer by imposing these enormous freight rates.

Mr. President, we must not forget that the men who control absolutely the ocean-carrying business and are able to name their price should not be allowed to name the price of wheat to the American farmer.

Mr. President, we have in my State an organization of farmers. They are not opposed to this bill. They are not opposed to any fair measure, to any bill, that will do justice to all people alike. In fact, this organization has asked that a food bill be passed. I admit that it is difficult to draw the lines and to find out who the speculators are, but certainly the farmer is not a speculator. He has never been a speculator. This farm organization calls attention to the fact, however, that if we pass legislation we must not forget that the people do not eat whole wheat. It must be manufactured into flour, and the men who control the product after it leaves the farm must be regulated just as well as the farmer.

I talked the other day with a farmer from the South. I can not give his name, but I think he is an authority on cotton. He said to me that every farmer in the South was opposed to the provision putting cotton into the bill. I have not heard any explanation which satisfies me that there is any reason why the cotton farmer should be placed in a different position than the farmer who grows other products. If the United States wants the farmers' wheat, let Congress make a price that will establish confidence among the American farmers.

Mr. President, I have detained the Senate much longer than I intended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether we could not meet a little earlier to-morrow, after a recess, and, if possible, get through with these longer addresses to-morrow, which will be Wednesday? I call attention to the fact that when we entered into the unanimous-consent agreement it was generally understood that we would be able to get through with these general arguments and vote upon the pending amendment, which is section 3. We have spent all the time in discussing half a hundred different matters upon the bill. I can not offer an amendment to perfect the bill until the pending amendment has been disposed of. I can argue an amendment, of course, prior to that time; but inasmuch as I should like to offer an amendment in explanation of which I wish to speak for half an hour or possibly three-quarters of an hour, I should like to have an opportunity to present it before day after to-morrow, when we shall be limited to 10-minute speeches.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a number of Senators have some matters they desire to bring up in the morning hour, and I thought that, at the request of quite a number of them, I would move an adjournment until 11 o'clock to-morrow and then proceed with the discussion. If the Senator from North Dakota thinks that will not be sufficient time, so far as I am personally concerned I am willing to hold night sessions.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it would be far better, if we are to have a morning hour, if the Senator would move an adjournment until 10 o'clock. Then we can dispose of these matters to-morrow and get a vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am perfectly satisfied with that.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oregon if it would not be possible to have unanimous consent to vote on this amendment, say, at 12 o'clock and dispose of it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish we might be able to do so.

Mr. KENYON. That would not require any roll call, as I understand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator to prefer that request. I shall be very glad to do it, if it does not interfere with the present unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KENYON. If it is in order, I ask unanimous consent that we may vote on this amendment, section 3, at 12 o'clock to-morrow. I do not know whether it is in order to have two unanimous-consent agreements or not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest that that request be made to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, Mr. President, we will just spend all the day then discussing this amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, you might get things tied up, just like you did on that amendment the other day.

Mr. KENYON. There can not be any tie-up in just voting on an amendment at a particular hour. It has been before the Senate now for a week.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that instead of voting on the amendment we will simply have a lot of speeches on it?

Mr. McCUMBER. We have had the speeches, but we do not seem to be able to get a vote.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not on section 3, though.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then, at the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota, I think it might be well to adjourn until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, there are a few nominations that will have to be confirmed and also reported this afternoon. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that motion a moment——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I withhold it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask the Senator from Oregon whether it is his intention to ask that the consideration of the bill be continued to-day or to-morrow?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. To-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. Was my request for unanimous consent ruled out of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, fortifying himself against future trouble, and expressing no opinion upon the legality of it, puts the question, Is there any objection to voting upon the amendment to section 3 at 12 o'clock to-morrow? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That agreement is made, but the Chair does not know how much trouble it may make.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think there were Senators who would have objected, but who did not hear the request back here. I heard them express a purpose to object.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia makes that statement, I will not insist on it at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object. I simply doubt the wisdom of it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I do not want the Senate to do any imprudent thing. I object.

Mr. KENYON. I am going to withdraw the request, then, at the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The doubt of the Chair arises as to the power to change the present unanimous-consent agreement without the notice given under the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say that personally I would be gratified to see the vote on this section taken to-morrow at 12 o'clock, and my suggestion was not in any sense intended to delay it or to encourage further discussion.

REGULATIONS FOR EXPLOSIVES.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I desire to submit a report from the Committee on Mines and Mining. It is a very urgent matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is exceedingly regretful, but he has announced a dozen times during this session that there is a rule which requires the Chair to prevent reports from being made while a Senator has the floor.

Mr. WALSH. I have that rule in mind, but I was going to ask unanimous consent to submit the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the rule can be unanimously set aside so that the Chair is not to blame for it——

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear what is being said.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana is desirous of submitting a report. There is an annoying rule of the Senate to which the Chair has called the attention of the Senate a number of times, and has asked that it be repealed, declaring that the Chair must prevent a report from being made while a Senator has the floor. It is very embarrassing to the Chair. The Senator from Montana is now asking unanimous consent to submit the report. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the report will be received.

Mr. WALSH. From the Committee on Mines and Mining I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 3932) to prohibit the manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession in time of war of explosives, providing regulations for the safe manufacture, distribution, storage, use, and possession of the same, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 85) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with an amendment Senate resolution 91, and I call the attention of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the report.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution just reported.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall have to object. The Chair has just made a ruling on this subject.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator from Oregon misunderstood the Chair's ruling. That related to the interruption of a Senator while he was addressing the Senate. It did not relate to the interval between speeches.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I shall object for the present.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no objection to making the report, I understand, and having it go to the calendar.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not wish, of course, to discuss a resolution that is not pending; but I wish to say that the resolution to which reference has just been made is designed to revive the so-called Lobby Committee, which was created by the Sixty-third Congress. I offered this resolution several weeks ago, of course not with reference to the statement by Mr. Hoover contained in the morning paper, but with reference to this general situation.

Mr. Hoover complains in the morning paper and manifests a good deal of impatience at the conduct of the Senate. He exclaims that the food bill is still delayed. Mr. Hoover ought to be advised that the Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement, which provides for a vote on the pending bill on Saturday next. Any speeches or debate that occur during the interval constitute no hindrance whatever and no delay in the enactment of this law. I really hope that the Secretary of the Senate will take occasion to send Mr. Hoover a certified copy of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Possibly Mr. Hoover has been too busy revising upward the dining-car menus to have his attention called to this order of the Senate. He intimates that there is a lobby about Washington delaying the enactment of this law. I do not know just how much importance to attach to a statement of that sort. It ought to be made advisedly. It ought not to be made flippantly, although such charges are often made without very much responsibility or consideration. But I do know this, Mr. President, if there is a lobby in the city of Washington exerting or attempting to exert improper or undue influence with reference to the pending legislation, either against its passage or in favor of its passage, that lobby ought to be scourged out of this Capitol with a whip of scorpions and of fire.

I regret that the Senator in charge of this legislation has seen fit to delay the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, for the patriotic purpose that the Senator has in view of investigating this particular lobby, I will withdraw my objection if the Senate will give unanimous consent to its consideration, because I agree with the Senator that if there is a lobby of any kind here it ought to be driven from the Capitol. But, Mr. President, in reference to the statement published in the Post this morning, on the front page, as having been made by Mr. Hoover, while I am not an apologist for Mr. Hoover and do not hold any brief for his defense, I was rather amazed at the statement, and called him up over the telephone to ascertain whether that statement was made by him, because it disgusted me, as it must have disgusted everybody, if it were authentic. Mr. Hoover assured me that he said nothing of the kind and nothing that could be construed into such a statement as was there given. The most of his offending, he said, was to say that he had no control of Congress; he hoped that the food-control bill would be speedily passed, but what it would contain he could not say; but he only had the power of declining to act if it was a bill that in his opinion, when passed, he felt he could not conscientiously carry out. He said that was the most that he said.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am very glad to hear this statement on the part of the Senator from Oregon. As suggested, the resolution was not offered, of course, with reference to this particular statement, because it was offered several weeks ago as a sort of shield upon the operations of the Senate against just such contingencies as this. I trust that the resolution will pass, as it vests in the committee the power to proceed whenever the public interests require it.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may the resolution be read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution No. 91, as follows:

Resolved, That the committee appointed in pursuance of Senate resolution 92, Sixty-third Congress, first session, be, and is hereby, extended, with authority to make, from time to time, such investigations as were authorized therein and other investigations affecting the public interest or the rights of citizens, and the provisions of said Senate resolution in relation to expenses, the subpœnaing of witnesses, the production of books and papers, and other powers are hereby extended and made a part of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before I answer the question of the Vice President I want to say that I am very much opposed to laying out a whole line of work, whether in this direction or any other, that may keep the Senate here all the summer. I see no necessity of this. If we are to have an investigation every time a newspaper says something or every time somebody else is reported to have said something, keeping our committees everlastingly in session with hearings, delaying us when we ought to be doing things instead of talking so much and investigating so much, there is no telling how long we will be here. I therefore object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go to the calendar, under the objection.

MRS. NANCY E. MULLINS.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the permission of the chairman of the committee and the permission of the Senate for unanimous consent to consider a bill for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins. Capt. W. S. Mullins, of the Mississippi National Guard, died on the 5th of last July a year ago, and this bill is for the purpose of permitting his mother to receive the six months' pay that his heirs are entitled to under the law. The bill has passed the House unanimously and has the unanimous report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. This good woman needs the money which this bill will permit her to collect, and I should take it as a kindness if the Senate would permit the bill to be passed. It should have been passed during the last session of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 646), which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins, mother of W. S. Mullins, late captain Company I, First Regiment Mississippi National Guard, shall be regarded as the duly designated beneficiary of the late Capt. W. S. Mullins under the act approved May 11, 1908, as amended by the act approved March 3, 1909.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thank the Senate.

PETITIONS.

Mr. POMERENE presented petitions of the First Methodist Episcopal Sunday School of Canton and of sundry citizens of Swanton, Mansfield, Youngstown, Delaware, New Vienna, Van Wert, Oak Harbor, Twinsburg, Maud, West Chester, Port Union, Hilliards, Germantown, Palmyer, Edinburg, and Lima, all in the State of Ohio, praying for national prohibition as a measure of food conservation, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I present resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Spokane, Wash., favoring the adoption of universal military training, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions prepared by military affairs committee at its meeting June 15 and recommended to the Chamber of Commerce for adoption and forwarding to Senators and Congressmen.

Resolved, That while the Chamber of Commerce of Spokane, Wash., declare themselves in hearty accord with the conscription plan of the administration, we realize this is but a temporary expedient, and that universal military training for the youth of our Nation is the only proper safeguard of the Nation's honor; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon our Senators and Congressmen the importance of recognizing the principle of universal military training and obligation to service, and that the same be enacted into a law as soon as it is expedient.

APPROPRIATION FOR AVIATION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. TILLMAN:

A bill (S. 2652) to provide for the reimbursement of officers, enlisted men, and others in the naval service of the United States for property lost or destroyed in such service; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 2653) to revive, with amendments, an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Medical Society of the District of Columbia"; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. WATSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 4285), which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PROHIBITION IN PORTO RICO.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD a cablegram showing the vote of prohibition in Porto Rico. I will say that the result was brought about by the good work of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and other temperance organizations.

There being no objection, the cablegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., July 17, 1917.

Senator GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington:
Prohibition triumphs; over 36,000 majority.

MANUEL AND-UJAR.

HERBERT C. HOOVER.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there is contained in the Washington Evening Star of this afternoon an editorial which so clearly expresses my view concerning Mr. Hoover that I think at this stage of the discussion upon the bill it ought to be inserted in the RECORD. For that reason I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

HOOVER.

Whatever else may come in the course of this great war in which America is now enlisted the people of this country will always feel profoundly grateful for the fact that they were able through their means and through the agency of their fellow countrymen to relieve the sufferings of the Belgian people when the Germans had swarmed over their country and held them virtually as prisoners of war. It was months after this work was started before the country became aware of the fact that a remarkable genius for organization had been developed by the emergency. The name of Herbert C. Hoover gradually became known here. Mr. Hoover, American born and American educated, had spent the greater part of his life in foreign fields in pursuit of his profession and had made his headquarters in London in recent years. It was a happy chance that led to his selection as the head of the American Belgian relief commission, for in that capacity he demonstrated an executive ability that overcame the most stubborn obstacles and afforded relief to the Belgian multitude. Of that record of achievement scored by Mr. Hoover and his associates in Belgium, America is proud to-day, and it was with general satisfaction, when war was declared by the United States, that the country received the announcement that the President had asked Mr. Hoover to take charge of the vitally important work of food conservation.

In the exigency of war it became necessary to start this food conservation work in advance of the actual legislation. Had the President waited on Congress for enactments at the very season of planting and through the season of harvesting the country would have suffered irretrievably. With tremendous energy Mr. Hoover has applied himself to the task of organizing his work, and he has aroused the country to a keen appreciation of the need of care and economy in food handling as a means of winning the war.

Yesterday in the Senate Mr. Hoover was assailed as a food gambler, a speculator, a manipulator of markets. The only basis for this astounding charge is the assertion that while head of the Belgian relief commission he sought to affect the prices of foodstuffs in order to obtain for Belgian relief the utmost possible for the money at his disposal. In other words, he sought to bring down the price—though his critic, by an amazing twist of imagination, says he sent it up—so that he could get the maximum of food for the starving Belgians for each million of American money placed in his hands.

If that is the sole offense that can be alleged against the man whom the President has selected for this great work, and who is giving his energies unstintedly and unselfishly, it stands as a compliment and a tribute rather than a blot upon his record. It is the idlest of criticisms, and astonishment must prevail that it should be uttered in the high place where the legislation necessary to save this country from great suffering and perhaps to make it successful in the war is now under protracted debate. If Mr. Hoover gambled in the food markets to get the lowest prices possible for the Belgian people, he did that for which he should be praised and not condemned. If he accomplished his purpose, he proved that he possessed an ability that at this time will be of value to the people of America.

ORDER IN COUNCIL OF CANADA.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD an order in council of Canada of June 16, 1917, providing for a food controller.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE.

CANADA.

ORDER IN COUNCIL OF JUNE 16, 1917, PROVIDING FOR A FOOD CONTROLLER.

His Excellency the Governor General in council, under and in virtue of the provisions of the war-measures act, 1914, is pleased to make the following orders, and the same are hereby made and enacted as follows:

1. The Governor General in council may appoint an officer to be known as food controller for Canada, who shall hold the office during His Majesty's pleasure.

2. It shall be within the power of and it shall be the duty of the food controller—

(a) To make such inquiry and investigation as he deems necessary for the purposes hereinafter set forth into the quantities, location, and ownership, and into the sources of supply of any article of food used by the people of Canada and into the prices at which same is sold or held for sale and the causes of such prices.

(b) To ascertain the food requirements of Canada and to facilitate the export of the surplus to Great Britain and her allies.

(c) To make regulations where he deems it in the public interest and subject to the approval of the Governor in council.

(1) Governing the prices of any article of food and the storage, distribution, sale, and delivery thereof.

(2) Providing for the conservation of food and the prevention of waste thereof and governing the consumption of food in hotels, restaurants, cafés, private houses, clubs, and other places.

(3) Respecting the manufacture, preparation, storage, and transport of food.

(4) Authorizing the food controller to purchase, requisition, store, sell, and deliver food.

3. For all the purposes of these orders the food controller shall have the powers of a commissioner appointed under the provisions of part I of the inquiries act.

4. All powers conferred and all duties imposed on the food controller by these orders or any subsequent order of the Governor in council may be exercised and performed by him either independently or in cooperation with any department of the Government of Canada, or any provincial government, or with any department or officer of the Government of Great Britain, or of any allied country vested with similar powers.

5. The salary of the food controller shall be such as may from time to time be prescribed by the Governor in council.

6. (a) The Governor in council may, upon the recommendation of the food controller, appoint such officers, clerks, and other persons as may be deemed necessary to assist the food controller in the performance of his duties, who shall receive such remuneration as may be approved by the Governor in council upon the recommendation of the food controller.

(b) All expenses lawfully incurred under these orders shall be payable out of the moneys provided by the war appropriation act, 1917, and any subsequent war appropriation voted by Parliament.

7. The powers and duties hereby conferred and imposed upon the food controller shall not include or interfere with the powers and duties vested in the board of grain supervisors for Canada established by order in council approved on the 11th day of June, 1917.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 18, 1917.

The Senate met at 10 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou art the source of all our blessings. Thou art the source of the inspirations of life. That which is noblest and best within us and which finds expression in our life comes from the Divine touch and is kindled into activity by Thy presence with us. We look to Thee for guidance not only in the great affairs of life but in those more important things that pertain to our own personal and spiritual interests. We pray Thee to make us so responsive to the Divine will that our acts may only be carrying out God's purpose in us as men and as a Nation. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Monday, July 16, 1917, when, on request of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Martin	Sherman
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Smoot
Curtis	Kenyon	Overman	Sterling
Dillingham	Knox	Page	Stone
Gore	Lodge	Pomerene	Underwood
Husting	McCumber	Saulsbury

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on important business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is absent on important business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twenty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HALE, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. NELSON, Mr. NEW, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. TILLMAN, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] on important business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. REED, and Mr. COLT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. HARDING, and Mr. BANKHEAD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

CENSUS FOR MILITARY DRAFT.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there was some little discussion the other day on the subject of the regulations with reference to the draft as it would work out in Ohio and Connecticut. I send to the desk a telegram from Hon. E. H. Moore, of Youngstown, Ohio, who was formerly our State insurance commissioner and is one of the leading lawyers in Ohio. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, July 18, 1917.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

Youngstown yields in patriotism to no city in America, but we think it grossly unfair that we should be called upon for 1,739 conscripts, more than some States and two and one-half times as many as Dayton, which has 50 per cent more population. Conscription estimates are based on population of treble any estimate the wildest local enthusiast would claim for our city. Forty per cent of our registration were aliens not subject to conscription, leaving 11,000 eligibles, including first declarants, of which we have already furnished 1,536 volunteers, nearly a full regiment. We ask no favors, but simply fair play. Since both my two boys have volunteered I can not be accused of selfishness, but plead for other fathers and mothers and for preservation of our industries, so vital to successful prosecution of this war, which, in view of our large number of volunteers, will be seriously crippled.

E. H. MOORE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a dispatch from the governor of Massachusetts, which is in the same line as those presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and which I desire to read:

BOSTON, MASS., July 17, 1917.

Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

In line with your speech of yesterday Federal estimate of population of Massachusetts, on which our quota for draft is based, is 3,939,561; actual population by 1915 State census was 3,693,310, assuming average increase in two years has been same as during five-year period between 1910 and 1915, although it is probably less, as immigration has been greatly reduced, State population would now be approximately 3,824,068, or 115,493 less than Federal estimate. Unless latter can be reduced to more equitable figure I must accept same as basis for distributing quotas for local board districts. Massachusetts, of course, stands ready to furnish her full quota, but that quota should not be placed too high by reason of faulty methods in estimating population. Federal estimate of present population of Chicopee, for instance, is 80,000, although two years ago it had only 30,000. Other places show discrepancies both too high and too low. Although I can correct this inequality as between cities and towns of the State, I can not change the quota of whole State. Doubtless Federal authorities desired a just basis, but this basis of estimate upon registration for draft seems to me unsound, as it penalizes States where registration was complete and thorough in comparison with States where registration was incomplete.

SAMUEL W. MCCALL.

Mr. President, the other day when I spoke on this subject I did not mention any cases in my own State, for none had been sent me, and I attributed that to the fact that we had a complete State census in 1915, and it was a little more difficult, with so recent a census, to apply the same method of estimating which has been applied by the Census Bureau here. But it is evident that they have done the same thing in Massachusetts that they have in other Northern States. The case of Chicopee, which the Governor mentions, is perfectly preposterous. I know the city well. It had 30,000 people two years ago by the State census, which is a very accurate and careful census. Now, two years later, with the immigration cut off, it is put down at 80,000, an increase in two years of more than 150 per cent. There can be no justice in such estimates as that on which to base a draft.

Every State is desirous of giving its full quota, I have no question. I know the State of Massachusetts is, but we do not want to leave in the minds of the people of any State the feeling that they have been called upon for more than a proper basis of estimate would give. It makes them feel that the rolls are padded with a view of putting more burdens on some States than others, and it is not well to have that sense of injustice rankling anywhere.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, in deference to the conscription act, I think it ought to be stated on the record now that one great benefit has resulted, namely, that ambitious towns, which claimed such exorbitant population, have been at last compelled to tell the truth.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think it is necessary to make any reply to statements of that kind. We are not denying our population and we are not unwilling to do our duty, but in this matter I think the Census Bureau has adopted a rule which operates to the very great disadvantage of industrial States and communities. If they are to take the alien as well as the naturalized citizen and the native-born citizen, then we shall have no cause for complaint. But when we attempt to estimate the population based on the total number of young men of conscript age—native, naturalized, and alien—and then attempt to take our entire quota from the native and naturalized alone, it is quite apparent that an injustice is brought about.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What is before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. Under the order for the presentation of petitions, I ventured to present a communication from the governor of Massachusetts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was not questioning the right of the Senator to do so, Mr. President, but I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, no discussion is in order if the regular order is insisted upon.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply wanted to present a few figures, but if there is objection I will desist.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They can come in later. Are there further petitions and memorials?

MOBILIZATION OF STATE TROOPS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in regard to the location of camps in the South, I have an article from the Boston Transcript which I ask may be read by the Secretary. It is headed "The spirit of New England."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Boston Transcript, Friday, July 13, 1917.]

THE SPIRIT OF NEW ENGLAND.

A sorry service for this corner of the country is the action of eight United States Senators in protesting to the Secretary of War against his order transferring the New England division of the National Guard to North Carolina for training. The Solid South will not, we hope, mistake the ire of the Senators for a manifestation of the spirit of New England. In justice to Senator LODGE and Senator WEEKS it should be said that they were urged to this unwise step by an appeal from Beacon Hill. Could they have conversed with the recruits at Framingham or with the rank and file of the guardsmen from this Commonwealth, we are very confident that the names of the Massachusetts Senators would not be among the eight protestants. The truth is that the New England guardsmen, with few exceptions, are solely concerned with getting as much training as possible as soon as possible. To them the waste of the month of June and most of July is inexplicable. When the War Department refused to mobilize them they hoped their governors would have the spunk to do it and thereby give them the benefit of two months' additional training, so as to multiply the chances of their safe return from France. But the guardsmen were helpless in the premises, and now that their orders are on the way they are eager to obey them without dickering or delay. An opinion very generally held in the guard of this and other New England States is that training in another section of the country will have several advantages, for the New England division is not an "apron-string" unit and does not wish to become one by the playing of pork-barrel politics.

The change from Fayetteville to Charlotte, N. C., for the training site of the New England division is said to be due to the fact that the former lacked a sufficient water supply to accommodate so many troops. The additional supply necessary could not be developed by September 1, and the site a few miles southwest of Charlotte has been chosen, where abundant water is available. Soil conditions at Fayetteville are superior to those at Charlotte, but the analysis at the latter city convinced the Army officers who made the examination that Charlotte soil contains enough sand to make the ground thereabouts suitable for troop training. Here is Gen. Wood's opinion of the Charlotte site:

"I am most agreeably surprised to find the nature of the soil here to be so well suited to the use of the camp. I find also that the railroad facilities are excellent, the water supply abundant, and a fine spirit among the people. We are trying to get the very best places for the soldiers to be trained. If it had been left entirely to me, I think I should have put all the camps in the best localities, even if that had been in one county. As it is, we are trying to make a reasonably fair distribution of them with the view of giving the soldiers good soil, good water, and good transportation facilities, for we should have a short haul to the embarkation port. The welfare of the men is the main thing to be considered in the placing of the camp sites."

Charlotte is the metropolis of the "Old North State." Situated on Sugar Creek, some 125 miles west by south of Raleigh, the city is well served by the Seaboard and Southern Railroads, being on the main line of the latter between Washington and New Orleans. At the last census its population was 34,000. It has more than 40,000 to-day. It is noted for its good climate, its educational facilities, its industries, and for its progressive public spirit. Historically, its chief claim to fame is the so-called Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, which was adopted there on May 31, 1775. The city was occupied for several days by Lord Cornwallis in 1780 and later became the headquarters of Gen. Greene.

When the first President of the United States assumed command of the American Army under the Washington Elm in Cambridge, 142 years ago this month, New England troops hailed him heartily as their commander in chief and did not hold back because he came from Virginia. When President Lincoln called for troops to defend the National Capital at the beginning of the Civil War, a Massachusetts regiment rushed forward in response without regard to distance or danger. That was the spirit of New England in the past, and that is the spirit of New England in the present. When Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood was summarily removed from the command of the Department of the East several months ago, because he dared to tell Congress and the country the truth about the Army, there was a countrywide public protest, but the only comment of that New Englander was: "I am a soldier and go where I am sent." So say the New England guardsmen to-day, for in their hearts lives the spirit of New England.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not wish to take time; but as that article reflects on the action taken by my colleague [Mr. WEEKS] and myself I think, in justice to my colleague and to myself, I ought to say a single word.

The editor of the Transcript and the writer of that article is a valued friend of mine of many years, and I have no sort of objection to his disagreeing with me about the action I have taken here or elsewhere, because I know that it implies nothing but friendship, just as much as praise would. He is a native of North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad to hear that, as he is so liberal in spirit, and he edits one of the most liberal and one of the broadest and best papers in New England.

Mr. LODGE. I quite agree with the Senator. He can not praise the paper more highly than I should. The writer of this article is a native of North Carolina, and I think it is a credit to his head and heart that he still appreciates the beauties of that State and sets forth what an admirable place it will be to which to send Massachusetts troops; but when it comes to lecturing us about what New England should do and what New England should feel I venture to think that two natives of New England are at least as likely to be sensitive about the honor of New England as even the best of men who are born outside her confines.

Mr. President, the point was simply this: All the northern National Guard, some 300,000 in number, are to be ordered to southern points for drill and training. They are to be ordered there in the midst of summer. Talking of my own State, as to camp grounds, we have great State camp grounds at Framingham. They are within half an hour of a seaport if it is desired to send troops to France. The National Guard will be the first to go for the reason that they are now very largely trained, for they have had experience on the Mexican border. As they stand to-day they are good troops. They will probably go very early in the winter, if not before the snow flies. It did not seem to my colleague and myself that to take those men and put them in a warm climate in the middle of summer was the best preparation for sending them to the sharp climate of northern France, which much resembles that of New England and our other Northern States.

Mr. President, the argument of the War Department appears to be that if you send troops to Southern States you will have good weather there in the winter in order to drill and to train them. Granted. You will have good weather and many of the camps no doubt are in beautiful sites, although some are not; but how do they reconcile this argument with the other proposition that the conscripts, the men who are to be drafted, will be the last to go necessarily, because they are entirely raw recruits. They have not even been organized into companies and regiments; they will have to be drilled through the winter. Where have they put those camps?

They have put one of them, not all, of course; but they have put one in the center of Massachusetts. If that is a good place to drill recruits through the winter, why is it a bad place to drill pretty well trained National Guard troops through the summer? That is precisely what has been done. I think it would be infinitely better to send the raw recruits of the draft into the southern camps, because they will have to be drilled through the winter, and to keep the National Guard in the northern camps in the summer. The camps are ready. All the States have their camps; there is no trouble about doing it; and some 300,000 men now have to be carried many hundreds of miles to these camps.

Take the case of Massachusetts alone. The troops can be put in the camp at Framingham, a State camp, where, as I have said, they will be within half an hour of a seaport; but, if they are sent away, they will have to be brought back to the coast ports after they are trained, and all that transportation will have to be duplicated.

As for the feeling of the National Guard, I know they wanted to be mobilized; and they ought to have been mobilized long ago, but if, as the article points out, the National Guard in my State is opposed to the protest made by my colleague and myself, they have remained very silent about it, for the only communications we have received have been telegrams and letters expressing entire approval of our cause—not that the National Guard should not be mobilized, but that they should be mobilized at once, drilled, trained, and made ready for France in the North, in a cold climate, where they would be made fitter for going to France in the autumn than they would be if trained elsewhere. I think the protest was reasonable and had good grounds. The other argument may be more prevailing, although it is not so to me, and I find no fault with those who make it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Masachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to say, Mr. President, in confirmation of the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, that some days ago the governor of Wisconsin wired me a very strong protest against the Wisconsin Guard being transferred to Waco, Tex., for training. I wired the governor for information with regard to our own training camp. He wired me that there were some 1,800 acres, one of the best training camps in the country, with a three-mile police zone created by law, within which the sale of liquor is forbidden and all forms of vice and temptations that break men physically excluded and where the State is responsible for good order. I am preparing at this time as strong a letter as I can of appeal to the War Department that the Wisconsin Guard may be permitted to remain in Wisconsin, at least until October or November, and that they be not transferred to a climate which at this season of the year would be a very great strain upon their physical endurance.

I know that this is the feeling generally of the governors, of the adjutants general, and of the guard in the several Northern States, for I have had some talk with Senators on the floor here about it; and I know that there are other Senators who are in possession of like communications protesting against this thing being done at this time. The Senator from North Dakota has in his hands now a telegram from the governor of his State in commendation of the very principle for which the Senator from Massachusetts is contending.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The same situation obtains with reference to the Indiana National Guard, and if those now in training in the Officers' Reserve Corps at Fort Benjamin Harrison shall also be sent South, the same situation will obtain as to them. They have been there three months, and if present information be correct they are shortly to be transported to some place in the South for final training, while the understanding is that the Indiana National Guard will be sent to some place in Mississippi.

The further information is that all of these troops are to be sent abroad some time this year.

There have been protests filed not only by the soldiers themselves, so far as they could file protests without violating the rules of military discipline, but if newspaper reports are correct, the brigadier general in command of the troops at Fort Harrison, who is himself a Southerner, having been raised in North Carolina, has said that, in his judgment, it would be a mistake to transfer these troops from Indiana to any Southern State and then afterwards take them from there to France, when the climate of Indiana and France is very similar. I do not know that these reports are true, but I have seen such statements accredited to him in the public press. I know, however, that protests have been filed by the adjutant general of Indiana against the transfer of the Indiana National Guard to any Southern State.

This situation would be all the more aggravated if these troops after several months' training were to be sent South and raw troops hereafter to be drafted into the service should be trained in Indiana during the winter season. Those who are now being trained and disciplined there might endure the rigors of any climate, while the raw troops hereafter to be taken into the service would not be seasoned to that degree, so that it seems to me that there is something back of the military idea in connection with all these transactions; what it is I do not say.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not care to occupy further time, but as the Senator from North Carolina has had that article from the Transcript read, I thought I owed it to myself and to my colleague, at least to give our reasons, which I think are sound ones.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I received the other day—I am sorry I do not have it with me—a letter from a very brilliant person who has been inspecting the military camps throughout the United States, and who, indeed, performed a similar service not long ago through the camps of Europe, especially the training camps. I was informed by that letter—and I presume the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] can confirm whether the information is correct or not—that the training camp at Plattsburg has been broken up, or is being broken up, to be removed to Atlanta, Ga.; taken from a place which the writer describes as being one of the most excellent locations for a training camp, and to be transferred to a place which the writer describes—of course, I know nothing about it, except the information I receive from him—as not adequate in size and in other respects not a suitable place for a training camp.

I have not thought of making a particular point about this matter, but it seems to be the thing that is going around, and I should like to know from the Senator from New York if it is correct that Plattsburg, which has been a type, a household word now among the young men of the country, the place where training began, is now to be a thing of the past and the entire camp rooted out and translated to some other point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely correct. As is probably well known by Senators, there has been conducted at Plattsburg, on Lake Champlain, a training camp for candidates for commissions in the Army from the New England States and from a portion of the State of New York, including the city of New York. When the camp was opened there were present 5,000 candidates for commissions. It is what might be termed a double-size camp, twice the size of the camp at Fort Myer. The Government built barracks and furnished all the facilities for the use of 5,000 men and their training, and invested, I am given to understand, in the neighborhood of $500,000 in putting up those buildings and establishing those facilities.

The training at that camp will come to a conclusion in the middle of August, and it is announced as the determination of the War Department to send to Fort McPherson, Ga., and Fort Oglethorpe, Ga., all of the candidates for commissions from the New England States and the State of New York who have applied for admission to the second series of officers' training camps.

It is to be remembered that in this second series of camps there are to be, instead of 40,000 prospective officers in training, only 16,000. Instead of the camps having an average attendance of 2,500, as at Fort Myer, they will have an attendance of 1,000. So we find that half a million dollars' worth of buildings at Plattsburg, and I assume a quarter of a million dollars' worth of buildings at Madison Barracks, and another quarter of a million dollars' worth of buildings at Fort Niagara, all of which are now occupied by officers' training camps, will be abandoned and men sent for the second series of camps into the South; and, mind you, their training will come to a conclusion before the 1st of December. They will not be expected to be trained in those camps in the winter at all; and I know from living in the region myself, having lived there all my life, that the climate, we will say, at Fort Niagara, at the mouth of the Niagara River on Lake Ontario, during the autumn months is one of the most delightful in America. For one, I have been unable to understand why the War Department is fearful of that climate through the months of September, October, and the first half or two-thirds of November.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Can not the Senator see the great advantage this is to the railroad companies of the country, to carry these troops from one end of the country to the other?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, of course the men who are to go to the second officers' training camps do not go in a body. They go by themselves from their various homes. Of course, the railways will have that extra number of passengers to carry, but I really can not believe that that is the motive back of the change. Apparently it is part of the broad and settled policy on the part of the War Department to move all training camps and troops out of the North and East and to the South, with the exception of the selective-draft camps.

As the Senator from Massachusetts has said, at Ayer, Mass., a camp site has already been chosen, and I assume work is now in progress building the barracks for a selective-draft division. They are to spend the winter there. One just like it is being built at Yaphank, on Long Island, where selective-draft soldiers from the city of New York are to spend the winter in training. So when we compare the policy of the War Department in the training of the selective-draft soldiers and its policy with respect to the training of the National Guard soldiers and the second series of officers' training camps, we find it absolutely inconsistent. The Senator from Pennsylvania is entirely correct.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York permit me to ask him a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. In that same connection, perhaps the Senator from New York may be able to answer this question; I think perhaps he can: Has not the War Department, speaking of its policies in connection with the officers' camp at Plattsburg, made some order refusing commissions to the young men who are——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania speak a little louder? There is a good deal of talking going on in the Chamber and it is almost impossible to hear him.

Mr. KNOX. I was about to ask the Senator from New York, in speaking of the policy of the War Department in this connection, what he knows about the refusal of the department to grant commissions to the young men who were trained under the French officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no definite knowledge as to an order having been issued refusing to grant commissions to men who have been trained by a group of French officers who were sent here by the French Government on the invitation of some of our universities. Undoubtedly the Senator from Pennsylvania refers to a group of very distinguished French officers who, on the invitation of Harvard University, and with the consent of their Government and the knowledge and certainly the approval of the War Department, came over here and took charge of the training of a regiment at Harvard, a complete infantry regiment. The reports from that training are rather remarkable. They are to the effect that the French officers have enabled those young men to progress in their training for preparation for the most modern warfare to an extent that none other of our training camps has yet approached. The Harvard regiment, like the Yale battalion of artillery, was organized under the provision of law which created what is known as the R. O. T. C.—the Reserve Officers' Training Corps—units of which have been established in the different universities and colleges of the country. The R. O. T. C. preceded the present officers' training camps, and officers of the Regular Army have been detailed by the War Department, when they could be spared, to help these college boys get their instruction. In this particular case, however, the French Government sent over Gen. Azan and four other most distinguished French officers, fresh from the fighting in France, and all the information that comes to us is that they have trained the boys that have been under them in the most modern and efficient way.

Recently when the War Department found itself short of Regular officers it had to withdraw from the Harvard training regiment the officers assigned to it, and it has left these four or five French officers, as it were, in the air; and the word has gone out that the men who have gone through that training under them, and who, I am informed, are somewhat in advance of the men in our own officers' training camps, can not receive commissions. They must go to the officers' training camps.

If an amateur may be permitted a suggestion, Mr. President, it would be that instead of placing any obstacle and discouragement in the path of these French officers who have come here and devoted their services to this training—and to-day they feel, I am given to understand, that their usefulness is at an end—we should invite two or three hundred French officers to this country and have them go to our officers' training camps and our mobilization camps and teach our officers and men the very latest tactics in this war, for at best our own officers, trained and intelligent and energetic as they are, derive their knowledge of modern tactics very largely from newspaper accounts and reports and books. These Frenchmen, however, come direct from the trenches, and these five men, I venture to say, have done more good in the restricted field in which they have been working up there at Cambridge than any 10 or 20 of our own officers could possibly do.

For one, I have regretted that any discouragement should have been thrown in the path of that kind of progress. I wish that we had two or three hundred of them here, under the auspices of the Federal Government, to be assigned to the camps to help our own Regular officers teach our men.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York if he desires to have it understood that the War Department is not giving recognition to equivalent training under these French officers? If the young men under their instruction have taken the same kind of training, does the Senator mean that they are not getting the same recognition that they are to get under the training of our own officers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is my understanding. In other words, the training under these French officers, instead of operating toward enabling the young men who have been trained to get commissions in the United States Army, counts for next to nothing.

Mr. KNOX. And, as I understand the Senator from New York to say, it is, in his judgment, a superior training?

Mr. WADSWORTH. My judgment is an amateur's judgment, but I believe it is a superior training.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, under the order of petitions I desire to call attention to the fact that I have received several letters from prominent military and State officials of Michigan protesting against the transfer of the Michigan National Guard to Camp Waco, in Texas. The fact is, and can not be denied, that Michigan has ample facilities provided at great expense for the training of all of our State troops, who, however, according to latest reports, are to be intensively trained during the month of August in a hot climate to which they are not accustomed prior to their embarkation for France.

The statement that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has put in the RECORD, showing the ancient historic value of the camp in North Carolina as a reason for locating a training camp there now, and also mentioning the further fact that it is close by the coast where the troops can be quickly mobilized for transportation abroad, does not quite apply to Waco, Tex., which is in the interior of Texas and hence farther away from the coast than is Michigan, where these troops have been organized and are now located. We can not understand why this order has been made.

As I stated the other day, if our soldiers are to be best prepared for service in France, that preparation can be secured in the State where they live and which has a temperature and climate similar to that of France. It is unfortunate at this time that the people, for lack of good reasons, are forced to speculate as to the object of this recent military order. The only facts known give natural rise to ugly suspicions. The people should know, and they must know, the truth. No reason has been given which could stand up under analysis for this sudden order changing troops from the extreme North into the extreme South. If our northern troops are the ones that are to be sent to France as soon as transportation can be provided for them, I insist that intensive training should be in a climate calculated to preserve their health and comfort, and especially when governmental economy supports that course. I have protested as best I could against this, to me, remarkable order, and have consented to join with other Senators from the North in an effort to determine the real reasons which have prompted it; and unless they are sufficient, then to secure a reversal, if possible.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I regret that I was not in the Chamber when this matter came up, and did not hear the statement made by my colleague [Mr. LODGE], with whom I am in accord on this subject. I would not now take the time of the Senate, because I do not wish to repeat, if there were not one or two points in connection with the editorial which has been read as to which, perhaps, he was not informed.

Mr. President, I have no criticism of the climate of North Carolina at Charlotte. I have no doubt that it is salubrious and healthy; and the protest which I joined in making with the New England Senators—all of whom who were in Washington, I think, with one exception, participated in it—was not based on that particular objection; certainly not from the standpoint of the New England troops. My colleague and I were not "dictated to by Beacon Hill," as the editorial intimates, if Beacon Hill means the statehouse in Boston, though I am very glad to know that the governor and the State administration are in accord with the protest which I made. We made the protest because these men are going to be among the first to go to France—the War Department so states—they being among the most nearly fitted for that purpose. Now, the War Department has contracted to erect a camp for the drafted troops in Massachusetts, and it is understood that those men are probably going to remain in this country throughout the winter. If there is a reason for taking that action, there certainly can be no reason for taking the portion of the New England troops represented by the National Guard from Massachusetts, for they are probably going abroad before cold weather, certainly if transportation can be provided for that purpose.

I think the editorial which has been read and ordered to be printed states that this action has been taken at the suggestion or on the recommendation of Gen. Wood. I happen to know, Mr. President, that Gen. Wood's opinion was not asked, and that he has made no recommendation about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, the article did not say that. The article only stated what Gen. Wood said about this site.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, Gen. Wood undoubtedly would say that it is a good site.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, that is all I put it in for—to show that he said it is a fine place for soldiers to go.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly the location is satisfactory from a health standpoint; but the impression was given, and has been given in New England by this editorial, that Gen. Wood had recommended that these New England troops be sent south. His opinion was not asked, and he made no recommendation whatever about it.

Furthermore, Mr. President, day before yesterday, when it was given out to the press where these troops were to go, the statement was commenced by referring to the Surgeon General of the Army, and the impression was given in that article that the Surgeon General had passed on this question and had recommended, from the health standpoint, that these troops be sent South. I believe that the opinion of the Surgeon General of the Army was not asked on that question; and while undoubtedly he would say that locations in the South, under ordinary conditions, for troops who were born and bred and raised in that section could be found which are salubrious and satisfactory from the health standpoint, I am sure if the opinion of the Surgeon General of the Army were asked he would say that it would be unwise to send troops from a northern climate into the South to be trained during the summer months—the very troops who are to be among the first sent to Europe.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, they will not be trained there during the summer. The Charlotte site that has just been selected will not be ready until the 1st of September, so the boys will go there in September.

Mr. WEEKS. That adds to the folly of the whole thing. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts owns sufficient camp grounds for all its National Guard. Next week, when these troops are called out, they can go to a camp ground where tentage is sufficient, where every facility has been provided by the Commonwealth, and they can commence at once the intensive training which they are to take before they go abroad.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. If it is true that a camp has to be prepared at Charlotte, and that six weeks or two months are to be lost in the preparation of that camp, it adds another item to the folly of the whole proceeding.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I object to this action not because they are going to any other section, and that as a result somebody may lose something in the way of trade in New England, but because I believe it is an unfortunate and an unwise step to take from every military standpoint.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WEEKS (continuing). And when the people of New England appreciate what is being done and the reasons for it, there is going to be a protest made which will be distinctly heard in Washington.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon will state it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to know what is before the Senate at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I was about to take my seat, but I want to say to the Senator from Oregon that what is before the Senate now is a public question of importance which relates to the health of our troops and the conduct of our military affairs, and that no question which has any more pertinency can be brought before the Senate.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senator from Oregon insisting on the regular order?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I insist on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the whole discussion is out of order.

CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent to call up House bill 5326.

Mr. SMOOT. Will not the Senator allow us to transact morning business and then call up the bill? We adjourned for morning business and have not had time to get through with it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I asked for the regular order two or three times, but Senators branched off into a general discussion. I make the request anyhow for unanimous consent to call up during the morning hour House bill 5326.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to withhold the request until I offer a Senate resolution and ask for its consideration. Will the Senator withhold it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 106) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate such information as may be in the hands of the Shipping Board to show what contracts have been let or are pending for the construction of ships under the authority of that board, the names of the contractors, the location and capacity of their yards, the price per ton to be paid to them, the nature and amount of any advances to be made to them from Government funds, together with any other information which will indicate the disposition of appropriations already made for the uses of the Shipping Board or which will assist the Senate in the consideration of requests from the said board for further appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not take the time of the Senate now, but simply ask for the present consideration of the resolution. At some future time I wish to make a short statement to the Senate as to the reasons why I have submitted the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That means the disposition of it at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that it may go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over.

INVESTIGATION OF ATTEMPTS TO INFLUENCE LEGISLATION.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely wish to say I had intended to call up the resolution which I offered yesterday in relation to the appointment of a committee for certain purposes, but I appreciate the paramount importance of the bill to which the request of the Senator from Oregon is addressed. I shall therefore interpose no objection at this time.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR AVIATION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for and during the existing emergency the President be, and is hereby, authorized to increase the present authorized commissioned and enlisted strength of the Signal Corps of the Army, including the Aviation Section thereof.

SEC. 2. That to provide the additional commissioned personnel required by this act the President is authorized to promote, appoint, detail, or attach as temporary officers in the Signal Corps, including the Aviation Section thereof, officers of the Regular Army, National Army, or National Guard, or the Officers' Reserve Corps, or to appoint temporarily enlisted men of the Regular Army, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, or persons from civil life: Provided, That no person shall be so promoted, appointed, detailed, or attached until he shall have been found physically, mentally, and morally qualified under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided further, That officers with rank not above colonel shall be appointed and commissioned by the President alone, irrespective of the rank or grade held by them on the date of the passage of this act, and that officers above the grade of colonel shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, irrespective of the rank or grade held by them on the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That to provide the additional enlisted men required by this act the President is authorized to raise and maintain, by voluntary enlistment or by draft, such number of enlisted men as he may deem necessary and to embody them into organizations hereinafter provided for in section 4: Provided, That the draft herein provided for shall not apply to any person under the age of 21 years or to any person above the age of 31 years: Provided further, That the grades of chauffeur, first class, and chauffeur are hereby created in the Signal Corps. The pay and allowances of a chauffeur, first class, shall be the same as a sergeant, first class, in the Signal Corps. Pay and allowances of a chauffeur shall be the same as a sergeant in the Signal Corps. All chauffeurs while serving as such shall rank with corporals of the Signal Corps and shall be subject to promotion and reduction to any other grade now authorized in the Signal Corps.

SEC. 4. That the President is hereby authorized to appropriately officer and organize the personnel of the Signal Corps into such number of divisions, brigades, regiments, wings, squadrons, battalions, companies, and flights as may be necessary, and to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the divisions, brigades, regiments, wings, squadrons, battalions, companies, and flights, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for divisions, brigades, regiments, wings, squadrons, battalions, companies, and flights as the efficiency of the service may require.

The President is further authorized to organize such headquarters and headquarters detachments for divisions, brigades, regiments, wings, squadrons, battalions, companies, and flights as may be necessary, and to prescribe new and different organizations for such headquarters and headquarters detachments whenever the efficiency of the service may require.

SEC. 5. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for staff duty and for duty with such brigades and divisions of the troops of the Signal Corps, including the Aviation Section thereof, as may be organized by the President.

Vacancies in all grades of the Regular Army, National Army, or National Guard resulting from the temporary appointment of officers thereof to higher grades shall be filled or vacated as provided for in sections 8 and 9 of the act authorizing the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States and approved May 18, 1917.

SEC. 6. That officers detailed in or attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps may, when qualified therefor, be rated as junior military aviators, military aviators, junior military aeronauts, and military aeronauts, but no person shall be so rated until there shall have been issued to him a certificate to the effect that he is qualified for the rating, and no certificate shall be issued to any person until an examining board, which shall be composed of two officers of experience of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and one medical officer, shall have examined him under general regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War and published to the Army by the War Department, and shall have reported him to be qualified for the rating. No person shall receive the rating of military aviator or military aeronaut until he shall have served creditably for three years as an aviation officer with the rating of a junior military aviator or the rating of a junior military aeronaut, except that in time of war any officer or enlisted man who specially distinguishes himself in active service may, upon recommendation of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, be rated as a junior military aviator, military aviator, junior military aeronaut, or military aeronaut without regard to examination or to length of service: Provided, That junior military aeronauts and military aeronauts shall be entitled to the same increase in rank and pay as are now authorized by law for junior military aviators and military aviators, respectively: Provided further, That any officer attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps for any military duty requiring him to make regular and frequent flights shall receive an increase of 25 per cent of the pay of his grade and length of service under his commission.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of War is authorized from time to time to cause such number of the enlisted men of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps above the grade of corporal as he may deem necessary to be rated as aviation mechanicians or as balloon mechanicians in the manner now prescribed by law: Provided, That balloon mechanicians shall receive the same increase of pay as now prescribed by law for aviation mechanicians.

SEC. 8. That all officers and enlisted men of the temporary forces of the Signal Corps, including the Aviation Section thereof provided for herein, shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as permanent officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army.

Provided, That nothing in this act shall operate to decrease the present authorized strength of the Regular Army or National Army heretofore authorized by law.

SEC. 9. That during the existing emergency authority is hereby given to the President, through the War Department, for the purchase, manufacture, maintenance, repair, and operation of airships and other aerial machines, including instruments and appliances of every sort and description necessary for the operation, construction, or equipment of all types of aircraft, including guns, armament, ammunition, and all necessary spare parts and equipment connected therewith; and all necessary buildings for equipment and personnel in the Aviation Section and for the purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation, through the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, of all motor-propelled passenger and equipment carrying vehicles which may be necessary for the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps.

And during the existing emergency authority is hereby further given for the establishment, equipment, maintenance, and operation of aviation stations, including (a) the acquisition of land, or any interest in land, with any buildings and improvements thereon, by purchase, lease, donation, condemnation, or otherwise: Provided, That by order of the President any unappropriated or reserved public lands may be reserved from entry, designated, and used for such aviation stations; (b) the improvement of such land by clearing, grading, draining, seeding, and otherwise making the same suitable for the purpose intended; (c) the construction, maintenance, and repair of permanent or temporary barracks, quarters, hospitals, mess houses, administration, instructional and recreational buildings, hangars, magazines, storehouses, sheds, shops, garages, boathouses, docks, radio stations, laboratories, observation stations, and all other buildings and structures necessary or advisable; (d) procuring and introducing water, electric light and power, telephones, telegraph, and sewerage to aviation stations and buildings and structures thereon by the extension of existing systems or the creation of new systems and their maintenance, operation and repair, installation of plumbing, electric fixtures and telephones, fire apparatus and fire alarm systems and the maintenance, operation, and repair of all such systems, fixtures, and apparatus; (e) construction and repair of roads, walks, sea walls, breakwaters, bridges and wharves, dredging, filling, and otherwise improving land and water sites; (f) purchase of stoves and other cooking and heating apparatus, kitchen and tableware, and furniture and equipment for kitchens, mess halls, offices, quarters, barracks, hospitals, and other buildings, screens lockers, refrigerators, and all other necessary equipment; (g) purchase of gasoline, oil, fuel, and all supplies of every kind and character necessary or advisable for maintenance and operation of aviation stations, including electric light and power, telephones, water supply, and sewerage service; (h) purchase and manufacture and installation of all kinds of machinery, tools, material, supplies, and equipment for construction, maintenance, and repair of aircraft, buildings, and improvements at aviation stations, or property or appliances used in connection with aviation.

And also for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes.

And also for the actual and necessary expenses of officers, enlisted men, and civilian employees of the Army and authorized agents sent on special duty at home and abroad for aviation purposes, including observation and investigation of foreign military operations and organization, manufacture of aircraft and engines; also special courses in foreign aviation schools and manufacturing establishments, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War certifying that the expenditures were necessary for military purposes.

And also for vocational training, including employment of necessary civilian instructors in important trades related to aviation, purchase of tools, equipment, materials, and machines required for such training; purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, periodicals and magazines, and instruments and material for theoretical and practical instruction at aviation schools and stations, and all other means to carry out the provisions of section 27 of the act approved June 3, 1916, authorizing, in addition to the military training of soldiers while in active service, means for securing educational and vocational training of a character to increase their military efficiency and enable them to return to civil life better equipped for industrial, commercial, and general business occupations.

And also to pay and otherwise provide for such officers of the Officers' Reserve Corps of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and such enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps as may be called into active service and such enlisted men as may be enlisted in the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps under the provisions of section 2 of the act to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, approved May 18, 1917, or any subsequent act temporarily increasing the commissioned or enlisted personnel of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps and such civilian employees as may be necessary, for the payment of their traveling and other necessary expenses when not traveling with troops: Provided, That hereafter all reserve officers and enlisted men of the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps shall be paid by Quartermaster Corps disbursing officers from funds transferred to their credit from Signal Corps appropriations.

And also for the payment of all expenses in connection with the development of suitable types of aviation engines, airplanes, and other aircraft appurtenances, including the cost of sample engines, airplanes, and appurtenances, cost of any patents and other rights therein, and costs of investigation, experimentation, and research in respect thereto.

And also for the payment of all expenses in connection with the creation, expansion, acquisition, and development of plants, factories, and establishments for the manufacture of airplanes, aircraft, engines, and appurtenances, including provision for the purchase or lease of land with the buildings thereon, construction of permanent or temporary buildings for all purposes, purchase of machinery, tools, and employment of operatives, together with all administrative expenses necessary, the purchase and supply of raw and semifinished materials and of fuel and all other things necessary for creating and extending the production of airplanes, aircraft, engines, and all appurtenances.

And also for creating, maintaining, and operating at technical schools and colleges courses of instruction for aviation students, including cost of instruction, equipment, and supplies necessary for instruction and subsistence of students while receiving such instruction.

Provided, That, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, motor-propelled vehicles, airplanes, engines, parts thereof, and appurtenances may be exchanged in part payment for new equipment of the same or similar character to be used for the same purpose as those proposed to be exchanged.

Provided further, That during the present emergency, officers and enlisted men of foreign armies attached to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps as instructors or inspectors when traveling in the United States on official business pertaining to the Aviation Section of the Signal Corps shall be authorized, from funds appropriated by this act, the same mileage and transportation allowances as are authorized for officers or enlisted men of the Regular Army.

SEC. 10. That for the purpose of carrying this act into effect the sum of $640,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1918.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the bill is so plain in its terms that it does not seem to me to be necessary or advisable in the crisis which confronts our country to undertake to analyze the several sections of it nor to discuss the bill at any length. It speaks for itself. The House Committee on Military Affairs entered into extensive hearings with reference to the bill, and after the hearings it was carefully revised, reported to the House, and passed, without a dissenting vote and with very little discussion. When it came to the Senate it was at once referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and after some discussion the committee felt that while there was much in the measure that might just as well have been left out, yet in view of the urgency of the situation, concluded to report it to the Senate without any amendment whatsoever.

The purpose of the bill is stated on the face of it, to increase the Signal Corps of the Army and the Aviation Section and to provide for the expenditure of money in order to accomplish this purpose. I shall be glad to undertake to answer questions that Senators may ask me with reference to the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the Senator in reference to the three words "or by draft," on page 2, line 17. There are but few men between the ages of 21 and 31 qualified for this kind of service. It seems to me that if the words "or by draft" are to remain in the bill persons who are not qualified for aviation service should be exempted from the draft.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In my opinion, the use of the word "draft" in this act does not enlarge the power under the act of May 18, 1917, which provides for increasing the Military Establishment. The draft provision might just as well have been left out, for it adds nothing to the powers conferred upon the President under the act referred to. But, Mr. President, let me call the Senator's attention to this fact, and it was testified to before the House committee: The Chief Signal Officer of the Army, when he appeared before the House committee, made the statement, and it has been subsequently corroborated by other members of the Aviation Section, that it was not and would not be the policy of the department to put fliers in the service except by voluntary enlistment. But it must not be forgotten that in the Aviation Section there are 10 men on the ground to every flier, and under the law as it stands to-day, without the draft provision to which the Senator from Kansas refers, the President would have the power to detail drafted men for the service covered by the bill under the power which is conferred upon him to raise technical troops.

Mr. CURTIS. I had not read the hearings before the committee and of course I had reference only to those men used for the purpose of flying. If it is not the intention to draft men for that purpose, but only to use those who volunteer, I have no objection.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Chief of the Signal Corps has stated that to be the present and future policy of the Government. There is another thing, Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. Just on that line, I do think, however, that such a provision ought to be put in the bill, because the proviso says:

Provided, That the draft herein provided for shall not apply to any person under the age of 21 years or to any person above the age of 31 years.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The purpose of that is——

Mr. CURTIS. I know what the purpose of it is, but I say because of that limitation I think men who are not qualified for flying should be exempted.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Of course the Senate has the power to amend the bill in any way it sees fit. The question is as to whether it ought to be done in this particular emergency.

Now, let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that there were hearings in the House which were printed and published and all of which are accessible to the Senate but not to the public. There have been extensive hearings before a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee of this Senate on aeronautics generally, but not on this particular bill, some of which have been printed and some have been treated as confidential, and asked to be so treated by the Secretary of War particularly. All, however, are accessible to Senators. All of these very questions which the Senator is discussing are covered by those hearings.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the word of the chairman of the committee is satisfactory to me.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, is the bill still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and now open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 17, it is proposed to strike out the words "or by draft."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, with what the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has said I am in partial agreement only. Undoubtedly under the law already passed the President could detail, or the military authorities could detail, for the service of the Signal Corps or any branch of it, including the Aviation Service, any of the men who were conscripted for military service; but if this bill should pass as it passed the House of Representatives he would also be authorized to draft as many additional men into the military service of the United States as would be required to carry out the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, to that I am opposed for several reasons, which I think it my duty to the Senate and to the country to state. In the first place, I am fundamentally opposed, on principle, to the drafting of anyone for military service outside of this country. I stated my position as plainly as I could to the Senate when the law which we passed on the subject was under consideration. For the defense of this country, if it is conceivable that such a thing were necessary, I would draft American manhood from the cradle to the grave; but, Mr. President, my own fixed and unalterable conviction is that to draft a freeman for military service on a foreign soil is utterly incompatible with freedom. I can not now, as I could not then, support any measure which proposes such a thing.

The conscription act is the law of the land. So long as it remains such, although it became such against my will and without my vote, I yield to its provisions that implicit obedience which every good citizen owes to every law of the land, whether he approved its enactment or not, so long as it does remain the law of the land; but I find it utterly impossible to vote now, as I found it utterly impossible to vote then, to apply the conscription principle to the people of this country. I regarded it then, as I regard it now, as wholly unnecessary and wholly unwise, as well as wholly un-American. I therefore can not vote for this bill if this provision remains in it. I say that with a great deal of reluctance, because, with the exception of the three words which I have moved to strike out, namely, "and by draft," and of the proviso on the same subject that follows it a line or two down in the same section, I am heartily for this bill, and would support it with more pleasure than any proposal that has yet been submitted to the Congress of the United States in connection with the prosecution of this war.

I think an examination of the public records of this country will disclose that some 8 or 10 years ago I offered in the House of Representatives the first bill to provide for any considerable aviation service in connection with our Military and Naval Establishments that was ever suggested in either House of the American Congress. I have long realized that this country had made very inadequate preparation and provision along those lines; and I have long thought that we ought to provide adequately for just this service, not only in connection with the Army, as is proposed in this bill, but in connection also with the Navy of the United States. I would with great pleasure, in spite of the very large amount of money involved, support this bill if it could be disentangled from this fundamental objection which I have to the conscription system.

Mr. President, as pointed out by the Senator from Oregon, it is unnecessary that that question should be injected into this bill. I think we have about enough conscription already. I do not see any need of unnecessarily going any further along that line. Any one of the men who may be conscripted under the existing law can, as I have already stated, be assigned to this service, anyway.

I also have noticed, as suggested by the Senator from Oregon in the report made by the House committee this statement with reference to the point I am raising:

> Section 3 authorizes the President to raise and maintain an additional enlisted force in this particular service, either by voluntary enlistment or by draft.

Have we abandoned the principle of selective conscription? Has it come to pass that in proposing this bill the War Department is willing that men shall volunteer, when it contended not very long ago that it was the most stupendous folly to permit it? I have always been in favor of permitting the American people to volunteer to fight this war or any other war in which this country may be engaged. Senators may rest assured that they will fight it, if we ought to have a war at all.

I thought, when the question was before the Senate, that we would be absolutely forced to declare war on Germany; I saw no escape from it. No matter what might have been done to avert it at some time prior to the time when this war issue was forced upon us, at that time we had drifted into a position where Germany had fired upon our flag and murdered our peaceful and inoffensive citizens upon the high seas, and we could not, unless we were willing to surrender nationality itself, according to my judgment, fail to protect our citizens or fail to declare the war that we did declare. Having declared it, I am willing to go as far as any man in this Republic will go in order to wage it adequately, but I am not willing to take any man's dictum that we must do certain things that violate every American principle in order to wage it adequately.

Starting out to destroy Prussianism, it is asserted that we must Prussianize this country in order to accomplish it. I dispute that. The American people have grown to their present greatness, to their present power by the application of American ideas and American ideals to lives and conduct. Personal liberty, individual freedom, competition, are among the forces that have made this Nation among the greatest and most powerful factors in all this world's affairs; and, for one, I am utterly unable to see how Senators can hope—and I say this with all deference to their opinions, for I know that many of them honestly entertain the other opinion—how Senators can hope that in a moment we can reverse the processes of American thought, the habits of American life, abandon the traditions of the American people, and fight a war more successfully, more gloriously, more effectively, than we could if we fought it naturally, and as free men, who are willing, yea, anxious, to give their blood to its last drop to uphold the national honor and to provide for the national safety.

For one I can not, and do not, take the slightest stock in the assertion that we hear so often made, in the doctrine that we hear so often proclaimed, that it is necessary to do all these things—to have conscription, food control, food dictatorships, and every other sort of dictatorship in order to drag the American people into a war or to force them into its prosecution. For one I deny and dispute that proposition. For one I believe with all my heart and with all my soul that this war will be a great deal more popular among our people, will be prosecuted with a great deal more success, with a great deal more celerity, and with a great deal more spirit, if we let our people go along naturally, as they have been accustomed to do, in matters of this kind and do not abridge or destroy their fundamental rights and liberties.

There is another thing. It may be psychological only, it may be sentimental only, but I believe it is far more than that. I believe the American people will fight this war more enthusiastically, more expeditiously, and more successfully, if we will get right square down to bedrock with them, and tell them that we are waging this war because Germany fired upon our flag and murdered our peaceful citizens upon the high seas, and for no other reason on this earth whatever except that.

There are many people in this country who would spend the last drop of blood their bodies contain—and they are just as loyal Americans, Senators, as anybody who holds a contrary opinion; do not deceive yourselves about that—who would spend the last drop of blood their bodies contain to wage a war to establish American rights and to vindicate American honor, and would go to whatever extent is necessary in order to accomplish either result, who hesitate—and I think rightfully—over the proposition that we ought to wage a war to change the boundary lines of a single country in Europe or to determine what form of government any foreign nation on this earth shall have.

Let us get this question disentangled from this bill. We do not need any conscription for this service. The War Department itself says it does not propose to conscript or draft men to be fliers, to go up in the air, and to fight these machines in the air. Well, if they do not want to do that, why do they ask us to give them power to do it, and why should we trust to the mere word of our agents and servants that they will not do it? If they do not want to exercise that power and we do not wish to confer it, let us strike these words "or by draft" out of this bill. If they need men on the ground to assist the fliers, they have already ample authority of law, as the Senator from Oregon has said, for that purpose, and if they do not want to draft these fliers and do not want to raise them by conscription there is no need for us to give them the power to do so, and we ought not to do it in any event.

I earnestly hope, therefore, that we may strike those three words from the bill, so that Senators who are conscientiously opposed, fundamentally opposed, to this proposition may not have to vote against a bill which they favor because of the unwise and unnecessary intrusion of this question into this measure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to delay the Senate in the final disposition of this bill by anything that I may do or say, but I will not vote for any measure which provides for compulsory military service. I think we have had enough conscription in this country for the time.

The men of America have suffered the treatment usually accorded subjects rather than citizens quite enough; really, they have had a little more, I think, than they relish. I still have faith in the patriotism of the American people. I believe that there are enough patriots left who will readily volunteer to render any service necessary to the triumphant success of the Nation's cause.

All the patriotism of the country, thank God, is not possessed by the men who hold Federal offices in Washington, clip coupons in Wall Street, or who hold commissions in the Regular Standing Army of the United States. I am not afraid to trust the people to attend to their own public business; and if the cause is a righteous cause they will shed their blood in defense of that cause, and if it is not a righteous cause they have got a right to demand that the cause for which they are asked to fight and die shall be a righteous cause. With this conscript provision eliminated, I shall vote for the bill, notwithstanding the fact that I think the amount carried is ridiculously large; but that is in keeping with the prodigality with which public moneys are being expended by the Congress. Of course, if these airships are needed in the war, we have got to have them; but it looks like a pretty heavy burden upon the toiler when you realize that for this purpose, and this alone, a tax of about $30 for the head of every family in the United States is levied. Just think of it, Mr. President, $30 per family when there are thousands of families in the United States the squalor of whose home is made more horrible and the suffering intensified by the wail of little children weeping for bread.

But I would not oppose the bill or vote against it on account of the amount of money it carries. I would rather that our people be hungry than that their patriotism and their honor should be questioned. I am going to insist in this instance, as I have done in the past, that the patriotic Americans be given the opportunity to volunteer their services in this particular line of work without compulsion. It may be that the patriotism which glorified the hearts of the fathers of the Republic is no longer in the heart of the present generation, but I shall not believe it until it is proven by their own recreancy.

Now, Mr. President, with this statement I am ready to vote. I hope the measure may be disposed of at the earliest possible moment. Delay is inexcusable from any viewpoint.

There is no excuse for the waste or prodigality of time of which the Senate is so often guilty. This waste of time under the circumstances is almost as great a crime as our extravagance in the use of public funds. The Senators are informed on the question at issue, the American public have made up their minds about it, and I think final and definite action ought to be taken.

I am sorry to say, however, that the conclusions reached by the American people have not exercised very much influence upon the Congress in the settlement of some matters in the recent past, but the wishes of the people may have some influence upon the Congressmen of the future. There is one thing certain: If the people are true to themselves and their own interests, they will see to it that their servants, the Congressmen, give heed to their wishes.

Mr. President, this is a Government which ought to derive all of its just powers from the consent of the governed, and it should also be a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people. I believe that is the best law; most responsive to the public needs, which is public sentiment crystalized. The public servant, from the President of the United States down to the most insignificant officer in the State, will make a great mistake, even during the stress of war, to refuse to listen to the voices of the men and the women whose toil produces the wealth of the country, maintains its commerce in time of peace, and fights its battles in time of war. It is their inalienable right to know what their public servants are doing and to express their opinion, either in praise or in condemnation of the work of the public officer. It was very gratifying to me to see from the newspapers a day or two ago the manifestations of independence and patriotic courage on the part of our brethren across the border in Canada. They are protesting against certain acts of injustice—of petty tyranny—on the part of the government, and they have a right to do it. It is their government; and I want to say, Mr. President, that it will be an unhappy day for America when her citizens are denied the right to express their sincere and honest thoughts about public questions.

The excluding from the mails of certain newspapers that are guilty of no offense except the exercise of the blood-bought privilege of an honest patriotic citizen to express his convictions on governmental and social questions! I do not agree with much that some of these papers say, but I deny the right of any officer, from President down to constable, to proscribe, limit, or abridge the right of free speech. It is not treachery in a newspaper editor to express his disapproval of anything that the Congress or the President has done since the beginning of this war. He has got a right to do it, and to deny his paper the privileges of the mail for publishing his thoughts violates the spirit and letter of the Constitution and the very genius of our Government. There is no danger, no harm is to come, from the free and full discussion of all public questions, and I think the closing of the mails against such publications is unwarranted, and the further effort to put a padlock on the mouths of the free men of this country at this time is unfortunate in the extreme, and it will recoil upon those who do it.

The tyranny of the Prussian despot is out of place in this Republic, and the methods of the despot can not last long among free people, and he who undertakes to transplant that noxious social weed upon American soil will find that it will grow up to clog his pathway and lacerate his feet.

Mr. President, I am ready to vote on the pending measure, and I trust that it will be expeditiously disposed of.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, a feature of this bill which I think ought not to be overlooked is the failure to provide in it any adequate method in which to protect the interests of the United States in the making of these contracts involving $640,000,000.

I wish to present, to lie upon the table, the following proposed amendment: On page 12, line 3, after the words "Section 10," insert:

The President of the United States shall appoint a committee on aviation contracts of three officials, who shall thoroughly examine and approve all contracts relating to aviation and fix a maximum price for materials, supplies, labor, services, and other factors entering into such Government contracts. Such committee shall be responsible for safeguarding the interests of the United States in such contracts, under penalty of immediate dismissal. No contract shall permit any profit in excess of actual cost plus 20 per cent, nor in any contingency a profit which would be unjust under fair competitive bidding; nor shall the maximum herein declared be held to be authorized as a rule, but only as a maximum in cases which justify it.

Mr. President, here is a proposed appropriation of $640,000,000—a gigantic sum, enough to stagger the imagination of any human being. There is no limitation upon what may be paid for aeroplanes under this bill. We have seen aeroplanes selling in this country for $5,000, $6,000, and $7,000, jumping up now to ten, twelve, fourteen, twenty thousand dollars, and I have seen in the public press a statement that this sum—$640,000,000—will buy some 22,000 aeroplanes, when, in point of fact, on any reasonable basis it ought to buy many times that number. I am not willing to sit here and impose taxes upon the people of the United States without any limitation whatever and leave no adequate safeguard to protect the people of this country against departmental or indirect graft of any kind.

We have in the history of past wars every reason to know that human nature is open to temptation under extraordinary opportunity for making gains, and while I have every reasonable respect for our present organization of the National Council of Defense and its advisory committees, confide in them and believe in them, at the same time I do not feel willing to leave the doors wide open to have our officers, overtaxed as they will be, subjected to the hypnotic influence or the argumentation or the statement of alleged facts which may persuade them to enter into contracts that may be grievously unjust to the taxpayers of the United States.

Why, Mr. President, if we allow 200, 300, 400, or 500 per cent profit in the construction of these aeroplanes this $640,000,000 will soon be gone and we will be called on to appropriate more money and impose more taxes on the people of this country. There is a limit even to the possibility of response of the people of the United States if we do not adequately safeguard these expenditures.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In connection with what the Senator is saying, I want to ask the Senator whether he thinks it is necessary to provide for an organization that will call for the appointment of brigadier generals and major generals almost without number?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the point to which I desire to address myself in the very few moments which will be at my disposal is this question of safeguarding these expenditures, not only in this bill but in other bills, notably the food-control bill. We must safeguard these expenditures, and I hope the Senator will pardon me if I do not go off into the digression to which he invites me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought that was right squarely on the point, because, as I look at it, I am afraid that a great part of this $640,000,000 is going to go into an organization of officers, and so on. I will say that an Army officer called my attention the other night to the fact that this bill provides for a large corps of major generals—that is, that will be the result—and brigadier generals, and officials of that sort. I have not had time to examine the bill very carefully, but I notice that in section 4 it provides for an organization of divisions and brigades and regiments, and all that sort of thing, of these flying machines. It seems to me that that is not necessary. It may be; but there is where a great part of this $640,000,000 is going to go.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I think not, Mr. President. I do not approve of appointing officers unnecessarily; but the expenditure of money to pay for the personal services of officers is negligible by the side of paying $25,000 apiece for aeroplanes that cost $5,000. Make no mistake about that. These aeroplanes are destroyed every day—10, 15, 20 of them at a time in a battle. I am not willing to have the United States pay any more for these aeroplanes than they cost. Perhaps we will have to stimulate the activities of individuals and allow them some special commercial profit in order to permit and invite their activities.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator indicate how that is to be done? The interest of the Government is safeguarded in this bill just about as much as it is in other bills.

Mr. OWEN. It is not safeguarded at all, in my opinion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am in perfect sympathy with the Senator in his desire to prevent the robbery and the plundering of the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. OWEN. You are not going to do it unless you have a specific method for doing it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The point I wanted the Senator to expatiate upon is, how are you going to do it?

Mr. OWEN. I have proposed a plan here by which a particular committee will be chargeable with the duty, and then I have limited them. As it is, we will have advice given upon the question of these contracts by gentlemen on our advisory committees who are experts in aviation. I do not know who they are; I am not acquainted with them at all; I do not know a single individual on the committee so far as I am at the moment advised; but they are the experts, and they will be charged with giving expert advice. While they may not enter into any contracts themselves with regard to the particular advice they give, they can create an atmosphere of cost which will be tolerated and which ought not to be endured by the head of the department who orders the contract to be made, and who perhaps signs the contract when it is made. He signs it to the best of his knowledge and belief upon expert advice. Now, I am not willing to leave the Secretary exposed to the danger of being advised unwisely in regard to this matter. I want some committee chargeable with the knowledge of cost, a committee which is not interested in any way in the world, a disinterested committee which has taken an oath of office to serve the United States, and a committee whose members will be subject to instant dismissal if they fail to discharge their function properly. I want a committee charged with the duty of knowing what these values are.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator, I presume, will not be willing to leave these questions to the presidents of the companies that manufacture flying machines?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the question implies a lack of confidence in the integrity of those whe are acting in an advisory capacity. I should like to say, in connection with that, that I think these men who have been summoned to act in advisory capacities have been very useful in the field of giving their advice and counsel, and have been useful in many other ways. I have very substantial confidence in them and in their integrity.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that it is left in the last analysis to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of War? If they can not be trusted to properly supervise these contracts, then they certainly can not be trusted to appoint and to discharge the so-called board to award them.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, we must consider the element of human frailty in this world, and we must consider that the President of the United States, who may be charged with the authority of conducting this war, has not within the power of flesh and blood the ability to discharge the innumerable duties imposed upon him by statute. We know that, and we know that it is not within the power of flesh and blood for the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy to conduct the details of the great departments of which they are the heads. We have got to distribute this labor; we have got to distribute this responsibility; and we have got to put it in a place where there is somebody who has nothing else to do but this special thing "to safeguard these contracts."

I do not want to leave it with the President of the United States. I have confidence in the President of the United States, but he is neither omniscient nor omnipotent. He is a human being, already charged with duties so great that it is a marvel that a man can stand and not be broken down physically and nervously by the strain upon him. I think we ought to have a concrete plan by which to charge some special individuals directly with the responsibility of safeguarding this money, and then limit such persons as to the profits which under any circumstances they shall permit. The Government can commandeer, if necessary, and when we take into our hands the gigantic power of saying to the young men of this country that they shall go and expose their bodies on the line of shot and shell, when we command them to go into the jaws of death, I say that we should not permit any fraud to creep into the structure of the expenditures and the means of safeguarding the expenditure of this gigantic fund which we are proposing. If we do, we shall be unfaithful to the boys we send to battle, and who are entitled to all the munitions of war that the funds appropriated can honestly buy.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am a member, in an humble way, of the Military Affairs Committee, and I think I ought to say just a word regarding this bill.

There were provisions in the bill as it came from the House that were objectionable, at least to some of the members of the committee, and the one with reference to the draft was especially objectionable to myself. But, Mr. President, the committee arrived at the unanimous conclusion that the thing to do was to report this bill without amendment and ask the Senate to pass it without amendment, so that it might immediately become a law and the work of constructing a great aerial organization of men and materials might be at once entered upon, and I venture to express the hope that we may this morning, without any delay whatsoever, pass this bill in the manner and form that it was received from the House.

I appreciate the objection offered by my distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and, as he knows, and as all know, I concurred in the views he expressed with reference to the draft. But we fought that question out; the draft was ordered; 500,000 men—indeed, 687,000 men—are to be immediately drawn, and an additional number may be drawn, within the discretion of the President, at any time. Any one of these men so drafted can be ordered into the aerial service if it should be desired to order him in. Therefore there is no injury done and no wrong done and no violence done by inserting the provision for drafting in this bill, unless that injury or wrong or violence has already been done, or the end could be obtained by employing the present law.

Mr. HARDWICK rose.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. For instance, let us assume now that the Senator from Georgia is right, and that the department shall want to employ the draft; and let us assume that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia should be adopted, and the word "draft" stricken out of this bill. Still, proceeding under the present law, the war authorities could draft more than 1,000,000 men, and, after having drafted them in that way, could then command any one of them to take charge of a machine if they saw fit to do it. So that while the word "draft" may be obnoxious in this bill to the Senator from Georgia, and I do not like it myself, it seems to me that it is futile and useless to make a contention over it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course the Senator must concede, however, that it is true that additional men may be drafted for this particular service under the law?

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, another question and then I will be through with my interruption. The Senator does not think, I take it, that men ought to be drafted for this peculiarly dangerous service of flying who may not be fitted for or adapted to it; and if the officers of the department feel that way and will not draft for that service, why should they be authorized by law to do it?

Mr. REED. If the bill was here as a matter of first instance, I would vote for the Senator's amendment, but it is inconceivable to me that the War Department would take a man who was unwilling or not qualified to take charge of a machine and by force compel him to get into one of these aeroplanes and undertake to navigate the air. I do not think they will do it. I think it is an unfortunate phrase, but, I repeat, they could under the present law reach the same end if they want to, and I have confidence that they will not want to. I hope the bill can pass without any delay of any kind.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. If I understand it correctly, there are now applicants enough for the aviation service on file in the War Department to supply all the possible requirements of the department for a year. So it does not seem to me that this is entirely a practical question or that it can make any great difference whether the provision is in the bill or not. I think it should be in the bill, but I have not any idea that there will be any drafting of men until next year for this service.

Mr. REED. In regard to the proposition brought forward by the Senator——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should have liked very much to have gone on with the bill that has been before the Senate, but in view of the unanimous-consent agreement and the shortness of the time for the discussion of the food-control bill, I feel that the Senate ought to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. REED. Probably we can get the aviation bill disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN. Why not go on with it for a little while?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think you can.

Mr. REED. I will conclude what I have to say in a moment. I have a great deal of sympathy with the thought that is contained in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma, but I trust that amendment will not be placed upon this bill. I hope we will not get into a position where we are going to have long debates in regard to this measure. I think it is to be differentiated from other legislation which is before us. It relates directly to the battle line, directly to our action at the front. I do not think there is anything as important as to get speedily at the work of constructing these machines and the training of the men. A day's delay now may mean a great deal in the future. I hope the bill may pass without any amendment, and I trust it can be arranged to-morrow morning so that it may have further consideration.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of entering upon the discussion of the bill now pending before the Senate, but I thought it proper just now, in view of what has been said this morning regarding the camps and the sending of soldiers from Northern States to the States of the South, that it would be appropriate to read what Surg. Gen. Gorgas said on that subject as reported in the Official Bulletin of Monday, July 16, on page 4. It is rather a brief statement. I do not know but what it has been called to the attention of Senators before, but it seems to me in connection with what was said on that subject it would be well to have it appear.

FAVORS CAMPS IN SOUTH—HEALTH ADVANTAGES BETTER THERE, SAYS SURG. GEN. GORGAS.

"I am strongly in favor of sites in the South for training camps, because of health advantages to the men," said Maj. Gen. Gorgas, Surgeon General of the Army, when asked his opinion on the camp site selections.

"The outstanding fact is that men trained in the South will have weather conditions permitting their being out of doors practically all of every day," Gen. Gorgas said. "In certain regions, wisely chosen for our National Guard camps, rain is scarce in the winter—when the heaviest training will be done—and at night soldiers here will sleep in quarters where there is free air circulation. Plenty of fresh air all the time means that any germs which may be about are kept on the move and are given slight chance to increase.

"The few weeks of summer weather which soldiers in the South may encounter will be more than offset by the long autumn and mild winter during which the troops will undergo the larger part of their training."

That seems to be a reason given here by the Surgeon General of the Army which should, I think, answer some of the criticisms that have been made upon the subject. There are other reasons undoubtedly of a military nature, and possibly more or less of a confidential nature which prompted the placing of these troops that on the face, to those who are laymen and amateurs, perhaps would not appear wise.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] seems to find considerable fault that his troops from Michigan are going down into Texas. It will be remembered that the camps in the South can not be made ready immediately. The summer will practically be over before the men will go into camp, and the training there will be during the winter months, when it is necessary that the men shall be out of doors. The training should be intensive, and every day used in out-door training.

The troops I have seen who have been in camp on the border at Laredo and other points in Texas are very healthy looking soldiers, and I have not seen a man who has complained of any uncomfortable conditions there, let alone unhealthy conditions. I am quite sure that soldiers in Michigan will be benefited rather than harmed by proceeding to what the Senator calls a hostile country and a hostile climate. I think it would do them good to get out of Michigan and into a life near the border which may be more stirring and interesting.

However, there are reasons undoubtedly for it. I am not possessed of the reasons of the department at all. I simply rose to call attention to this paper by the Surgeon General, which appears in the Official Bulletin, and I thought it ought to appear in the RECORD in connection with some observations that were made this morning on the subject.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from Florida is not in a position to give some military reason for transporting these men to the South. I have not been able to obtain one from anyone, and I am anxious for that kind of information.

In the brief comment which I made I quoted from the Surgeon General of the Army. I should limit what I said, I think, by saying that I have not talked with him personally, but I am informed by a man who did, and the authority is perfectly creditable, that the Surgeon General stated that his advice had not been asked about this transfer of troops from the North to the South. Of course he would not state, and no other responsible officer would say, that healthy places could not be found in the South for troops, but the Surgeon General certainly gave the impression to my authority that he would not be in favor of transferring them from the North to the South during the summer months or early fall months for training.

These men are going abroad, and they are among the first to be sent just as soon as transportation can be furnished.

According to the statement made by the Senator from Florida, they must remain in northern camps for a considerable time until the southern camps are ready. That being the case, why not let them remain in the camps provided for them until they go abroad rather than go to the expense, to say nothing of the health conditions, of transferring men from a northern to a southern climate in the hot season. Why should they not remain in northern camps until they are put on board ship and sent to France?

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to inquire whether there is not a cantonment in Massachusetts?

Mr. WEEKS. There is, for drafted men.

Mr. FLETCHER. That will probably take care of some 30,000 or 40,000 men, I take it.

Mr. WEEKS. I think it is proposed to provide for all the drafted men in New England at the Ayer, Mass., camp.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not proposed, therefore, to vacate that cantonment and send those troops South at all, I understand.

Mr. WEEKS. I am very glad the Senator has made that point again. The men who are being drafted are not to be sent abroad until next spring. No one contends that it will be done or can be done before that time. If it is practicable to have a cantonment in Massachusetts for New England troops who are to remain there throughout the winter, why should we take other New England troops in July or August into a climate to which they have not been acclimated, and when they are to be the men who are to go abroad as soon as transportation can be furnished?

Mr. FLETCHER. As I said a moment ago, the War Department has not confided to me any answer to these inquiries at all. It just occurred to my own mind. Of course, the Senator will understand that these troops—it appears to me, anyhow, just on the surface—are being prepared to be sent across the ocean. They probably will not want to embark them in New York or Boston or Philadelphia. The port of embarkation will probably yet be determined, and that port may be somewhere in this part of the country. That may be a reason. I do not say it is, but that may be a reason why all the troops are not being put in camps adjacent to Boston or New York.

Mr. WEEKS. It is possible the War Department will embark from Deming, N. Mex., to which place will be sent the troops from Iowa, North and South Dakota, or from Waco, Tex., or from some other interior point. The War Department has not confided in me, although I signed a protest against the transfer of those troops at least a week ago. The War Department has not seen fit to acknowledge the receipt of that protest.

As far as I understand it, the War Department is not confiding in anybody and is not giving a single military reason why these men should be transferred to the South.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senator from Massachusetts that the War College have no member of the Medical Department of the United States a member of the War College and they are opposed to having any member of the Medical Department of the Army as members of the War College. They do not want any membership taken from the Medical Department of the Army as members of the War College. If they did that they would probably get some medical advice with regard to temperature and the effect upon human beings of transferring them from a cold to a hot climate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he can speak with some authority as to when the troops are to be sent to France.

Mr. WEEKS. The War Department have not confided that information to me. I am informed, perhaps somewhat indirectly, that the troops that are going to France first are to be those portions of the Regular Army qualified by the training which is being given them and the National Guard, and that the troops will be sent there just as rapidly as transportation can be furnished.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know how that is. I do not know who establishes the camps and reestablishes them. That is with the men who are in control. Senators are making a sectional question of it. I put this article in the RECORD this morning. I do not know who the editor is who wrote it. It is a leading editorial from a leading paper in New England. That is all I know, and that the spirit of it is as fine as that of any article ever written. I know one thing, that no southern man controls the location of these camps. I know that there were no southern men on the board that located them. They had some reason for the location; I can not tell the Senator what it was. This paper goes on to say that your guardsmen want to go down there, and I am glad of it. If they go down there and mix with our people and our people come up here and mix with your people, it will be a very good thing to do.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, a great many southern people go into the section of the country which I represent to avoid the heat of the summer. Great numbers of Floridians go there in order to avoid the extreme heat of Florida. They go to New England to spend the summer months, and I commend them for it; I think they are using good taste; but I think if you were proposing to send men from New England to Florida for the summer these same people would say it was not wise.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator if some other newspaper besides the Boston Transcript would not rather disagree with the Senator from Massachusetts and the New England Senators, because they raise this issue? Why should they raise the issue? What is the purpose of it? You know the troops are not going to get training until about September or October, and it is most delightful down there at that time.

Mr. WEEKS. In a legislative way the Senator from North Carolina raised this issue.

Mr. OVERMAN. The issue was raised and I read the article from the Senator's own paper, in the Senator's own State, which he admits is one of the greatest newspapers in his State.

Mr. WEEKS. It is not my own newspaper. If it were, it would not have said what the Senator from North Carolina has seen fit to put in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator from Massachusetts deny that it is one of the most prominent newspapers in his State?

Mr. WEEKS. It is a prominent newspaper.

Mr. FLETCHER. Without continuing this discussion, admitting that the people from Florida go to Massachusetts in summer and enjoy the bracing and cool atmosphere and splendid climate there, and admitting, as the Senator will, that people from Massachusetts come to Florida to spend the winter and enjoy the climate there, and taking as a fact that people from States adjoining Florida go there in summer in order to get the breezes from the ocean, and they enjoy the climate in summer, I will ask the Senator if it is not true that it is quite impracticable to train troops out of doors during the winter months in Massachusetts? I think I saw a statement like that from the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] a few days ago. I think he stated in the Senate that on account of the low temperature and ice and snow, and that sort of thing, they could not very well train troops there in the winter. Is that the case or is it not?

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Florida how he thinks the 40,000 men who are to be sent to Ayer, Mass., and who are to remain there all winter, are to be trained? Either the War Department is wrong in one case or it is wrong in the other. If they can properly send men there who are to remain all winter with certainty, why should they not retain in Massachusetts those who are to go abroad as soon as transportation can be furnished? You have to take one horn or the other of the dilemma.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not accept that, but I suppose it is one problem to deal with a few men and another to deal with a great many.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, what bill is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The so-called food-control bill. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the committee amendment is under consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that we are likely to get a vote upon that until perhaps very late in the evening, and it would be impossible to present any other amendments under the 10-minute rule as they should be presented. I therefore at this time desire to present and have read, to be considered after the pending amendment, an amendment that I shall propose to offer instead of the amendment intended to fix the price of grain. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] will propose later the following amendment:

On page 10, line 22, after the word "therefor," insert the following:

"In determining the compensation to be paid for farm products all labor employed in producing the same, whether furnished by the farmer or members of his family, including the necessary domestic service, shall be computed and allowed for at the same rate of wages paid for like labor, or labor requiring a like degree of intelligence and arduous efforts, in other lines of business or trade; and in addition thereto there shall be allowed as a charge in the cost of production a reasonable rate of interest upon the capital invested in both real and personal estate and a further reasonable charge for deterioration and upkeep. There shall also be taken into consideration the increased cost to the farmer of all necessary farm equipment, food, and clothing required, and other advanced cost in the ordinary necessaries of life."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KENYON. I rose more to a parliamentary inquiry than anything else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will state it.

Mr. KENYON. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the bill was taken up and committee amendments were first to be disposed of. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he is simply bringing up this amendment to be proposed at some future time and intends to discuss it now?

Mr. McCUMBER. I just stated that a short time ago when the Senator was not here.

Mr. KENYON. If the pending amendment could now be voted on and disposed of, would the Senator have any objection to it?

Mr. McCUMBER. I not only would not have any objection to it but I would much prefer it.

Mr. KENYON. Will not the Senator let us try to get a vote on the amendment now?

Mr. McCUMBER. I certainly will; I will be glad to yield if we can get a vote at the present time.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest that we have had the amendment before us for four days and if it could be disposed of we could then proceed to the consideration of other amendments, but if other Senators offer their amendments and proceed with the discussion of them we will be in a worse mix-up than ever.

Mr. McCUMBER. We have been discussing the pending amendment for a week, I believe, and have never discussed the amendment at all during that time, but have discussed other provisions of the bill. I saw no opportunity of getting rid of it in a reasonable time so that we could consider other amendments.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator is mistaken in saying the amendment has not been discussed. It has been discussed, but everything else under the sun has been discussed. We have about reached the point where I take it we can vote on the amendment. If we can, will not the Senator let us do that?

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is any hope that a vote can be taken upon the amendment that is pending, I will yield for that purpose, and I prefer to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that, of course, the Chair can not bind the Senator to take any such action, and if the Senator does not continue the Chair will put the question and recognize whoever rises. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have taken so much time I am ashamed to take any more, but I want to say that at first I was in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, but on further examination I came to the conclusion that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would weaken the present law. The present law, as it has been for 50 years, is better than the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. I think his amendment ought to be defeated for that reason. I think the latter part of the amendment amounts to a legislative sanctioning of the practice of men making contracts substantially with themselves. It is true the clause provides that they shall not actually sit while the contract is being made, but their influence will be there. If the Senator from Ohio will consent to an amendment being added in the following language, "Provided, That nothing herein shall be held to repeal, alter, or change the provisions of section 41, page 1007, of Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large, of the years 1907 to 1909," I will not object. I ask the Senator if he will accept that amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is substantially asking me to have the amendment defeated. Of course, if you are to attach the amendment which the Senator from Missouri desires to attach to it, it would practically leave the law as it now is, without any change whatsoever. If that amendment is to be adopted, the entire amendment might just as well be defeated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I asked that question in order to bring that very point out. It is now perfectly plain that the Senator from Ohio intends by his amendment to change the provisions of the law as that law has stood for 50 years, and to permit some of the things that are now prohibited by that 50-year-old statute. Let me read it to you:

No officer or agent of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm, or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm. Whoever shall violate the provision of this section shall be fined not more than $2,000 and imprisoned not more than two years.

That section in substantially that same form was passed in the year 1863, during the great Civil War. It has stood upon the statute books ever since. Now that the Senator from Ohio states that his amendment would be nullified if a provision were added to it to the effect that the present law shall not be changed, it is perfectly plain that the purpose is to change the present law and to permit something which the present law does not permit; in other words, to use the language of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], to grant an indulgence to men as members of corporations or joint-stock companies and also as representatives of the United States Government to deal with reference to contracts.

Mr. President, that in my judgment is absolutely intolerable. I want to read from the case of the president and trustees of the city of San Diego against the San Diego & Los Angeles Railroad Co., Fourty-fourth California, Report 106, July, 1872.

This action was brought to have a deed executed by two trustees of the city of San Diego declared void and canceled. The deed was made pursuant to an act in the legislature empowering the trustees of the city to donate to the defendant, the railway company, not to exceed 5,000 acres of Pueblo land of the said city upon the terms and conditions that the trustees might designate. One of the trustees of the city was an owner of stock in the defendant railway company to the amount of $10,000, and was one of its directors.

Justice Belcher, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (p. 113):

The general principle is that no man can faithfully serve two masters whose interests are or may be in conflict. The law therefore will not permit one who acts in a fiduciary capacity to deal with himself in his individual capacity. "It may be regarded," says Parsons, "as a prevailing principle of the law that an agent must not put himself during his agency in a position which is adverse to that of his principal. For even if the honesty of the agent is unquestioned, and if his impartiality between his own interest and his principal's might be relied upon, yet the principal has in fact bargained for the exercise of all the skill, ability, and industry of the agent, and he is entitled to demand the exertion of all this in his own favor." (1 Pars. on Cont., 74.) This principle has found expression in a large number of cases involving a great variety of circumstances. And it applies equally, whether one deals with himself, acting as sole trustee, or with a board of trustees, or with the directors of a corporation of whom he is one.

That same doctrine could be read from a thousand cases, if desired.

I call attention to a case in which Judge Chilton uttered some observations that I think are worthy of repetition:

The State ex rel. Claunch v. Castleberry (23 Ala. Reports, 85; loc. cit., 88, 89), 1853:

Opinion by Judge C. J. Chilton:

"The law wisely withholds from every judge all temptations to depart from the strict line of duty, from considerations of interest, by rendering him incompetent to sit in any cause in which he is interested. The maxim is, 'Nemo judex in causa propria,' and it is alike founded in common sense and a just desire to preserve from impurity the fountains of justice."

Loc. cit., 89: "The earlier common law reports abound with authorities upon this point. Style, 138; 1 Vent., 3; Hardress, 503; Hob., 87; Salked 396, where Holt, C. J., said: 'The mayor of Hereford was laid by the heels for sitting in judgment in a cause where he himself was lessor of the plaintiff in ejectment, though he, by charter, was sole judge of the court.' So in the Earl of Derby's case (12 Co., 114) it was resolved that the chamberlain of Chester, 'being sole judge of equity, can not decree anything wherein himself is a party, for he can not be a judge in his own cause; and this fundamental principle is adhered to with such pertinacity that it has been held that no practice to the contrary shall be allowed to overturn it (2 Str., 1173; 5 M. & S., 513). Indeed, Lord Coke, in Dr. Bonham's case (8 Co., 118), clearly intimates that an act of Parliament contravening it would be void, as against common right (see also 12 Mod., 687; 4 Term R., 71).'"

That is very ancient authority, but it is very honorable. This goes upon the question of public policy.

In the case of E. J. Edwards v. W. K. Estell et al. (48 Cal., 194), 1874:

The county surveyor made a parol contract with the defendant that he would search out and survey swamp and overflowed lands in the county; would notify Stewart, one of the defendants, of such lands, whereupon Stewart would make entry upon such lands. After entry was properly filled out and title was vested, he would by deed convey a one-half interest in said lands to the county surveyor. The contract was fulfilled in part, when Stewart died. The surveyor then brought this suit against Stewart's heirs for the division of the property. The court found as a conclusion of law that the agreement was against public policy and therefore void.

Hawley v. Baldwin (19 Conn., 585), 1849:

In this case the judge and the commissioner appointed by him were both inhabitants and taxpayers of the town of Newtown. This town was beneficially interested in the assigned estate of Lemuel Sherman because of a claim held by the city against the Sherman estate.

The court held that the judge, as a taxpayer of the town of Newtown, was interested in the estate at the time he appointed the commissioners, and, being interested, he had no jurisdiction to make the appointment.

The commissioner, as a taxpayer of the town, was also interested during the whole of the time that he was acting upon other claims against the said estate. No subsequent act can therefore restore the jurisdiction to the judge or the commissioner. Their acts were void.

Loc. cit., 589, 590: "It can make no difference, in respect to the disqualification of the judge and commission, in this case that the town was only beneficially interested in the claim presented by Mr. Belden. A beneficial interest is as great a disqualification as a strict technical interest; it will have the same operation upon the mind of a judge. Besides, the statute speaks of interest generally as a disqualification; and it would be contrary to its express provisions, as well as to numerous decided cases, to limit it to cases where the judge has a legal interest, which he can pursue in his own name."

There is one further authority I want to quote. It is the opinion in the Sixtieth Georgia, page 221, in the case of The Mayor and Council of the City of Macon et al. against Huff.

William A. Huff, while mayor of the city of Macon, Ga., and ex officio president of the council, contracted with the city council to lease the city park for five years to keep the same in good repair, and so forth. When a new council was elected it brought a bill against Huff to annul and set aside the contract.

Judge Jackson, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 225–226):

His administrative and executive duties as mayor require him to overlook and judge of the extent and manner in which, as contractor, he discharges these obligations. Can he do it disinterestedly? Possibly he may; but the law regarding our fallen nature as all weak, and profiting by the prayer which the Son of God prescribed for all men, forbids that such temptation be laid in the path of any man, however exalted his office or pure his character. How would it look for Gov. Colquitt, while in office to lease for himself the penitentiary convicts, or the State road, or Macon and Brunswick road, when it is his official duty to see to it that the lessees carry out faithfully their contracts with the State? It will be observed that these contracts with Mr. Huff are executory and continuous—that the contract is not executed in its totality on his part—but he obligates himself to do things day by day for the entire term of his contract.

It matters not how fair the contract may be, public policy will not uphold it. This principle is iterated and reiterated everywhere in the books.

I commend that language to the Senate; and I say, with all respect to those who are acting on the board of advisors, that they are no better than the judges of the courts of England, that they are no better or purer than the judges of our own courts, and that they come within the language I have just read. I should like to read part of it again:

but the law regarding our fallen nature as all weak, and profiting by the prayer which the Son of God prescribed for all men, forbids that such temptation be laid in the path of any man, however exalted his office or pure his character.

Waymire et al. v. Powell et al. (105 Ind., 328), 1885:

In this case two members of the board of county commissioners measured the abutments of a county bridge so as to allow the contractors the proper money for building such abutments. The two commissioners then put in a claim to the county court of which they were members for a per diem allowance for the work of measuring such abutments.

Justice Mitchell, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 332–333):

As the board of commissioners can make no contract of any kind with one of their own number, there can be no such thing as an allowance to a county commissioner for services voluntarily rendered or things voluntarily furnished by a member of the board. * * *

"It is of no consequence that no injury or that an actual benefit has resulted from such employment. The law will not permit public servants to place themselves in a situation where they may be tempted to do wrong, and this it accomplishes by holding all such employments, whether made directly or indirectly, utterly void." (People v. Township Board, 11 Mich., 222; Kinyon v. Duchene, 21 Mich., 498.)

It was competent and in character for the commissioners to sit in judgment on the claims of others who had performed voluntary services for the county for which a contract might have been made, but it is a matter of an entirely different complexion when members of any tribunal present to the body of which they are a part claims in favor of themselves and sit in judgment upon them. * * *

The salutary rules above stated are not new; they have been declared and enforced by this court in a great number and variety of cases.

In the case of The People on relation of Plugger and others against The Township Board of Overyssel (11 Mich., 222), the court said:

Actual injury is not the principle the law proceeds on in holding such transactions void. Fidelity in the agent is what is aimed at.

That is a case where the board of freeholders were authorized to let contracts for improvements of a harbor, with power in regard to plans of the work, the material to be used, and so forth. Four of the board took the contract from the board to build a pier.

Judge Manning, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 225–226):

So careful is the law in guarding against the abuse of fiduciary relations that it will not permit an agent to act for himself and his principal in the same transaction, as to buy of himself, as agent, the property of his principal, or the like. All such transactions are void, as it respects his principal, unless ratified by him with a full knowledge of all the circumstances. To repudiate them he need not show himself damnified. Whether he has been or not is immaterial. Actual injury is not the principle the law proceeds on in holding such transactions void. Fidelity in the agent is what is aimed at, and as a means of securing it the law will not permit the agent to place himself in a situation in which he may be tempted by his own private interest to disregard that of his principal. * * *

All public officers are agents and their official powers are fiduciary. They are trusted with public functions for the good of the public, to protect, advance, and promote its interests, and not their own. And a greater necessity exists than in private life for removing from them every inducement to abuse the trust reposed in them, as the temptations to which they are sometimes exposed are stronger and the risk of detection and exposure is less. A judge can not hear and decide his own case or one in which he is personally interested. He may decide it conscientiously and in accordance with law. But that is not enough. The law will not permit him to reap a personal advantage from an official act performed in favor of himself.

In the case of Neil Currie v. School District No. 26, or Murray County (35 Minn., 163), April 19, 1886, the plaintiff brought action in the district court of Murray County to recover upon three orders issued by the school district board, which orders were issued for labor on the schoolhouse. The trustees of the school district entered into a contract with Mons Larson, who was then a director and member of the board of trustees, whereby said Larson agreed to erect a schoolhouse for the said district, receiving a per diem allowance of $2.50 for his labor. Larson completed the contract and erected the schoolhouse. The compensation agreed upon was just and reasonable.

Judge Vanderburg, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 165):

The trustees, occupying a fiduciary relation as agents of a common principal, can not contract with each other so as to bind the district by the terms of a mutual engagement between them. That is to say, such contract is voidable by the district, at its option, and it may resist the enforcement thereof. * * *

As before indicated in the authority above quoted from, it matters not that the contract seems a fair one. The rule is a salutary one, founded on public policy, to guard against the hazard of abuse, and can not be departed from to meet the exigencies of particular cases.

Judge Story says:

It may be correctly said with reference to Christian morals, that no man can faithfully serve two masters whose interests are in conflict.

This doctrine is well settled in law. It is simply declaratory of the law as it had existed previous to the passage of the statute.

This quotation from Story is taken from the case of Adam V. Smith v. The City of Albany (61 N. Y., 44), January, 1875. In this case the common council of the city of Albany let a contract to one of its members to render services to the city. Justice Gray, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 445, 446, 447):

The Common Council of the city of Albany, of which the plaintiff was a member, were the agents of the city, and while holding that relation to it each member of that body was under such an obligation of absolute loyalty to the interests of the city as prohibited any member of the board from entering into any arrangement with his associates by which his individual interest could come in conflict with the interests of his constituents, who are entitled exclusively to such an exercise of his caution and judgment in their behalf as an ordinarily prudent man would exercise in his own business. In bargaining for the city he could not be one of a party, acting as an employer, and become himself, by the same bargain, an employee. The rule upon this subject, as well as the reason for it, is so clearly stated by the late Justice Story in his treatise on Agency, as to render a restatement of it in the words of its learned author quite appropriate. "It may," he said, "be correctly said with reference to Christian morals, that no man can faithfully serve two masters whose interests are in conflict. If, then, the seller were permitted, as the agent of another, to become the purchaser, his duty to his principal and his own interest would stand in direct opposition to each other; and thus a temptation, perhaps in many cases too strong for resistance by men of feeble morals or hackneyed in the common devices of worldly business, would be held out, which would betray them into gross misconduct and even into crime. It is to interpose a preventive check against such temptations and seductions that a positive prohibition has been found to be the soundest policy, encouraged by the purest principles of Christianity. This doctrine is well settled at law. And it is by no means necessary in cases of this sort that the agent should make any advantage by the bargaining. Whether he has or not, the bargain is without any obligation to bind the principal." * * *

The act of 1843 (session laws of that year, p. 36) making it unlawful for a member of any common council of any city in this State to become a contractor under any contract authorized by the common council, and authorizing such contracts to be declared void at the instance of the city, has not wrought a change in the rule referred to; it is, so far as it goes, simply declaratory of the law as it existed previous to its passage. It does not encroach upon the common law, and is not, therefore, to be construed strictly.

In Goodyear v. Brown (155 Pa. St. Rep., p. 514, 1893) the defendant offered in evidence a warrant to Isaac B. Brown for 900 acres of unimproved land. The plaintiff's counsel objected on the ground that it was against public policy for the deputy secretary of internal affairs to have a warrant from the Commonwealth granted to him, as he, in the absence of the secretary, is the custodian of the records, has charge of the books, has charge of the acceptance of surveys, and in fact represents the Commonwealth with whom he deals; that his trusteeship as such deputy officer is such that it is against public policy to allow him to take a warrant.

Justice Williams, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 518, 519–523):

It is true, as the appellants contend, that there is no enactment to be found in the statute book of this State which in words forbids the secretary of internal affairs to receive his own individual application for a land warrant, grant it, cause a survey to be made and returned upon it, accept the return of survey, pass upon the validity of the survey as a member of the board of property, and finally cause a patent to issue to himself, the individual, for the land included within it. But it does not follow that everything may be done by a public officer that is not forbidden in advance by some act of assembly. Remedies are provided for evils when they are discovered, and rules of law are applied when a necessity arises for their application.

What is alleged in this case, and was held by the learned judge of the court below, is that dealings between a public officer and himself as a private citizen that bring him in collision with other citizens, equally interested with himself in the integrity and impartiality of the officer, are against public policy In a general way it may be said that public policy means the public good. * * * It would require no statute to justify a court in holding that a city or county treasurer could not be at the same time the auditor to settle and adjust his own accounts. The temptation it would afford is too great to make it good policy to subject the officer to it, or the public to its possible consequences. Our Constitution makes a member of the legislature ineligible to an office that was created by the body of which he was a member. The reason is that if he was eligible he might be affected by the temptation to make a place for himself. Examples of the practical application of the rule, that what is against the public good is against public policy, might be multiplied largely, without rendering the reason of the rule any more apparent than it must be from those already referred to.

* * * * * * *

Whether we consider the interests of the citizens for whose security and protection the State exists, or the preservation of public confidence in the purity of the administration of public affairs, or the honor and character of the officer as a public servant, the conclusion reached is the same. Public policy can not tolerate such dealings by an officer with his own department or office. It will not uphold them.

Mr. President, there is a multitude of authority along that same line, but I refrain from reading the rest of the matter which I have here. Indeed, one might consume the entire day in reading it.

I object most strenuously against withdrawing any part of the present law. I would much prefer to see no legislation enacted than to see any legislation enacted such as is proposed in the amendment of my distinguished friend from Ohio, because the Senator from Ohio admits that his amendment does change the present law and does remove some of its safeguards.

I wish to put in the RECORD as a part of my remarks certain quotations which I have from text writers and decisions of courts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

It is a rule of the common law that judicial and discretionary officers are disqualified to act in a matter in which they are personally interested. This principle is often incorporated into the statutes. * * * The rule as to disqualification for interest is applied to make invalid contracts by a board or commission with one of its own members. (29 Cyc., p. 1435.)

It is a rule of universal application in the law governing the dealings between principals and agents, both public and private, that the agent shall not be permitted, in the course of the execution of his agency, to put himself in such a position that his own interests shall be antagonistic to those of his principal. By accepting the undertaking he impliedly agrees, and it becomes his duty, to use all his endeavors for the benefit and advantage of his principal, to whom belongs all the profits, increase, and advantages which may result from its execution. This duty can not be performed if the agent is to be permitted to take advantage of his position and its opportunities to make gain for himself. Public policy, therefore, demands and the law declares that, except with the full knowledge and consent of his principal, the agent shall not in the execution of his trust deal with or for himself, whether directly or indirectly. * * * If authorized to let or grant rights or contracts, he can not let or grant them to himself. (Mechem Public Offices and Officers, sec. 839.)

It is a principle of great importance, and of quite general acceptance, that no officer shall act as such in a matter in which he is personally interested as a party. (Mechem Public Offices and Officers, sec. 524.)

"It is a maxim of every code in every country," says Sandford, chancellor, "that no man shall be judge in his own cause. The learned wisdom of enlightened nations, and the unlettered ideas of ruder societies, are in full accordance upon this point, and wherever tribunals of justice have existed, all men have agreed that a judge shall never have the power to decide where he is himself a party. In England, it has always been held that however comprehensive may be the terms by which jurisdiction is conferred upon a judge, the power to decide in his own cause is always a tacit exception to the authority of his office. Such I conceive to be the law of this State." (Mechem, sec. 517.)

No man ought to be judge in his own cause, is a maxim—

aimed at the most dangerous source of partiality in a judge. It is not necessary that a judge should be a party to the cause to create this disqualification. If he is interested in a suit brought in another's name, he is equally disqualified. Any, the slightest pecuniary, interest in the result, not merely possible and contingent, will be quite sufficient. (Mechem, sec. 517.)

The courts go so far as to hold that contingent agreements based upon the success of obtaining contracts from the Government for Government supplies are against public policy and void, even though the party obtaining such contracts is not a public officer.

Mechem, Public Offices and Officers (sec. 363):

The Supreme Court, by Mr. Justice Field, said: "The question, then, is this: Can an agreement for compensation to procure a contract from the Government to furnish its supplies be enforced by the courts? We have no hesitation in answering the question in the negative. All contracts for supplies should be made with those, and with those only, who will execute them most faithfully and at the least expense to the Government. Considerations as to the most efficient and economical mode of meeting the public wants should alone control, in this respect, the action of every department of the Government. No other element can lawfully enter into the transaction so far as the Government is concerned. Such is the rule of public policy; and whatever tends to introduce any other element into the transaction is against public policy. That agreements like the one under consideration have this tendency is manifest. They tend to introduce personal solicitation and personal influence as elements in the procurement of contracts, and thus directly tend to inefficiency in the public service, and to unnecessary expenditures of the public funds. * * * Agreements for compensation contingent upon success suggest the use of sinister and corrupt means for the accomplishment of the end desired. The law meets the suggestion of evil, and strikes down the contract from its inception." (Tool. Co. v. Norris, 2 Wall. (U. S.), 45.)

In Stropes v. The Board of Commissioners of Greene County (72 Ind., 42), 1880, the plaintiff was the auditor of Greene County, and also the publisher of a newspaper at Bloomfield. While auditor he published in his newspaper the delinquent tax list. Then he filed a claim against the county for the value of the work done by him. Judge Elliott, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 43-44):

Officers ought not to be permitted to place themselves in a position in which personal interest may come into conflict with the duty which they owe to the public. The rule which has so long prevailed is eminently just, and there is no reason for relaxing it because the officer who makes the claim is the one having power to award the contract. On the contrary, the rule ought, in such a case, to be even the more rigidly enforced.

Wills and Mitchell v. James Abbey (27 Tex., 202), 1863: In this case a deputy surveyor contracted with the owner of land certificates to locate the same, pay all expenses, and obtain the patent. While in office he made the survey and located the certificates; after the expiration of his term of office he paid the public dues. The court held that the contract was contrary to law and void.

Justice Bell, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 204):

Public policy required that the officers chosen to locate and survey the public lands should not be permitted to speculate in them or to acquire interests in them, which would present to such officer the temptation to take advantage of the information which their official positions enabled them to acquire, to the detriment of the holders of certificates generally. * * * (Flanikin v. Fokes, 15 Tex., 180; De Leon v. White, 9 Tex., 598.)

If the contract was made with a surveyor or a deputy surveyor while in the discharge of his official duties, and the location and survey were made while he was acting officially, that is enough to invalidate the contract. Any other rule would enable a surveyor to take the fullest advantage of his official position, and by a timely resignation of his office reap all the benefits arising from contracts which he was forbidden to make.

Pickett v. School District No. 1, Town of Wiota, etc. (25 Wis., 551), 1870:

In this case one of the school board contracted with the board for the building of a schoolhouse.

Judge Paine, delivering the opinion of the court, stated (loc. cit., 553-554):

We think there is one fatal objection to the plaintiff's right to maintain this action, which renders it unnecessary to consider any of the other questions discussed. That is, that, inasmuch as it appears that the plaintiff was himself the director of the district at the time the contract was let, and took part as such in the proceedings to let it, it was against public policy to allow him, while holding that fiduciary relation to the district, to place himself in an antagonistic position and obtain the contract for himself from the board of which he was a member. The general principle upon which this proposition must rest is that no man can faithfully serve two masters whose interests are in conflict. And as men usually and naturally prefer their own interests to those of others, where one attempts to act in a fiduciary capacity for another the law will not allow him while so acting to deal with himself in his individual capacity. This principle has been most frequently illustrated in cases of sales by officers, agents, and trustees, in all of which it has been held that they can not become the purchasers, because this would allow their interests to come in conflict with their duties to their principals. The same doctrine is as applicable to the question of taking a contract as to that of making a sale. * * *

I have found several well-considered cases where the doctrine has been so applied. In Cumberland Coal Co. v. Sherman (30 Barb., 553), a very elaborate opinion was given by Justice Davies, in which the whole subject was very fully considered. In relation to this precise point, commencing on page 572, he says:

"Neither are the duties or obligations of a director or trustee altered from the circumstance that he is one of a number of directors or trustees and that this circumstance diminishes his responsibility or relieves him from any incapacity to deal with the property of his cestui que trust. The same principle applies to him, as one of a number, as if he were acting as a sole trustee. It is not doubted that it has been shown that the relation of the director to the stockholders is the same as that of the agent to his principal, the trustee to his cestui que trust; and out of the identity of these relations necessarily spring the same duties, the same danger, and the same policy of the law."

A careful reading of the following authority on "Who are public officers" will clearly demonstrate that members of the advisory committees of the Council of National Defense are public officers in the meaning of the law even though they serve without compensation.

Mechem on Public Offices and Officers states:

SECTION 1. A public office is the right, authority, and duty, created and conferred by law, by which for a given period, either fixed by law or enduring at the pleasure of the creating power, an individual is invested with some portion of the sovereign functions of the government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public. The individual so invested is a public officer.

SEC. 2. A public agent acts only on behalf of his principal, the public, whose sanction is generally considered as necessary to give the acts performed the authority and power of a public act or law.

SEC. 7. Like the requirement of an oath, the fact of the payment of a salary or fees may aid in determining the nature of the position, but it is not conclusive, for while a salary or fees are usually annexed to the office, it is not necessarily so. As in the case of the oath, the salary or fees are mere incidents and form no part of the office. Where a salary or fees are annexed, the office is often said to be "coupled with an interest"; where neither is provided for, it is a naked or honorary office and is supposed to be accepted merely for the public good.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, in view of the criticisms which have been directed to this amendment, I should like to occupy the time of the Senate very briefly. I prefer to place my own construction upon this amendment, and particularly upon my own motives.

An amendment was presented here by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] which would have completely disorganized the advisory commission and all of its committees. I have before me a list of the members of the advisory commission and of the several committees which have been appointed by that commission, perhaps with the advice and consent of the Council of National Defense. As to that I am not certain, but there is a list of 31 pages, containing the names of the several subcommittees, which embrace many of the experts in every line of industry in the United States and many of those who will be interested, directly or indirectly, in the furnishing of war supplies.

I take exception to the statements which have been made by certain Senators to the effect that these men are contracting with themselves. I understand that as laymen we sometimes speak loosely, but as lawyers we ought to speak with exactness.

Under the proposed amendment no man can contract with himself. I want that to be made perfectly plain. No man on this advisory commission is given any authority to contract with himself. In the first place, under the legislation which was adopted last summer we provided for the Council of National Defense. That is composed of six members of the Cabinet. Under the same legislation, in addition to the Council of National Defense, there was a provision for the organization of an advisory commission, and this commission is advisory only, with no power to contract and with no power to obligate the Government for a farthing. Now, let us bear that fact in mind. The law provides:

The members of the advisory commission shall serve without compensation, but shall be allowed actual expenses of travel and subsistence when attending meetings of the commission or engaged in investigations pertaining to its activities. The advisory commission shall hold such meetings as shall be called by the council or be provided by the rules and regulations adopted by the council for the conduct of its work.

The act establishing the Council of National Defense also provides:

That the Council of National Defense shall adopt rules and regulations for the conduct of its work, which rules and regulations shall be subject to the approval of the President, and shall provide for the work of the advisory commission to the end that the special knowledge of such commission may be developed by suitable investigation, research, and inquiry, and made available in conference and report for the use of the council; and the council may organize subordinate bodies for its assistance in special investigations, either by the employment of experts or by the creation of committees of specially qualified persons to serve without compensation, but to direct the investigations of experts so employed.

I indorse everything the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has said with regard to the policy of the general legislation upon this subject. I would not under normal conditions detract one iota from anything that is provided in that statute; but this is the situation, if Senators please: We are confronted by the greatest war ever known. We were never mobilized from a military standpoint or from an industrial standpoint or from a transportation standpoint. All the great powers of the President and his advisors, all the powers and all the knowledge of both branches of Congress were commanded for the purpose of getting us into a position whereby we might be able to meet the tremendous task that is before us. So we provided last year for the organization of this advisory commission. We gave to them, as I have already said, not the power to spend one single penny of the people's money. The contracts for military supplies are entered into and signed only by the Secretary of the Navy or by the Secretary of War. They are responsible, after they have gotten the fullest advice and knowledge which they can get from the several committees which the Congress of the United States has authorized.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I prefer not to be interrupted now. I want to proceed with the thread of my argument, but I will be glad to answer questions later on.

What is the situation? The Council of National Defense goes out and invites the leaders of industry, the leaders of transportation, the leaders of thought in this country and puts them on these committees. Why? In order that the Government of the United States and its 100,000,000 people shall have the benefit of their united wisdom. Great steel men like Gary and Schwab, great electrical men like Edison, great merchants like Rosenwald, great transportation men like Daniel Willard all come here and tender their services. To what end? Are these men so corrupt that every move they make must be questioned here in public and even, I dare say, without facts sufficient upon which to base charges?

Now, let us see what the situation is. By the amendment which was proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, in substance we provide that the entire advisory commission of this great Government, organized as I have indicated, shall be disorganized, and we shall not have the benefit of their advice and counsel.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I prefer not to be interrupted. A little later on I shall be glad to submit to any questions Senators may care to ask.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. POMERENE. When the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee was submitted it was quite apparent from the discussion in the Senate that it was going to completely disorganize every effort that had been made by the Government of the United States looking toward industrial and military preparedness, and I felt that if I could frame some modification of this rule which would at the same time protect the interests of the taxpayers and relieve these men from suspicion and give to the country the benefit of their services and their knowledge I would be doing a public service. I had conferences with certain gentlemen who had given this matter some thought—one a lawyer from my own State. I have conferred with Senators on the subject, and the amendment as now presented and which is known as the Pomerene amendment is the result of these several conferences.

What are its provisions in brief? Bear in mind, as I have said, that this advisory commission has no contracting powers. Pure as they may be, and as we all hope they are, wise as they may be, disinterested as they may be, in my judgment and in the judgment of those who have been concerned with the preparation of the amendment we all believe that all the cards should be placed on the top of the table, so that the country could have the benefit of the knowledge of any interest, directly or indirectly, proximate or remote, that they might have in any of these contracts.

I recognize that some men in a place of that kind might yield to certain temptations. I realize that the best of men sometimes go astray, and so we have provided in substance that none of these persons "acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce, any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts or to enter into such contracts."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, if it is for a question I will yield, but I have declined to yield to certain other Senators because I prefer to go on with my statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. If it is not pleasant to the Senator, I will not ask him the question.

Mr. POMERENE. If it is a question, I will answer.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will not interrupt the Senator now.

Mr. POMERENE. I would a little bit rather the Senator would wait until I have finished. I am trying to speak for only a few minutes upon the subject, because I think that the proposition is plain, and Senators have made up their minds either in one direction or the other as to what they will do regarding it. So the amendment not only provides that the men who are acting as an advisory commission shall not be interested in soliciting, inducing, or attempting to induce any authorized agent of the United States to enter into any contract for supplies but it goes further than that and prevents these gentlemen who have volunteered their services and are acting as members of the advisory commission or its committees shall not make or participate in making any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such council, board, commission, or subordinate of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and of his interest in any firm, corporation, company, or association being a party thereto; nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving such order.

I happen to have before me the first draft of this amendment. It was slightly modified afterwards, and I direct the attention of Senators to the last modification. It does not change the substance of the amendment, but it changes the phraseology, so as to make it, I think, much clearer.

Now, under the circumstances what is the part of wisdom? Shall we continue this organization which already has done so much toward the mobilization of the industries and transportation of the country and the promotion of its military and financial power? Shall we place them in a position where they are either compelled to withdraw from this commission so that we shall not have the benefit of their advice and of their experience, or shall we allow them to serve, and say, for instance, to the great steel industries of this country, like the United States Steel Corporation and the Bethlehem Steel Co., and other great concerns: "You are entirely eliminated from furnishing any military supplies or naval supplies whatsoever to the Government"? That is the alternative that presents itself to the Government of the United States.

In my judgment, when we say to these gentlemen, "You shall not solicit these contracts; you shall not act in making any recommendation unless you tell what financial interest you have in it, and then you shall not take any part in the making of the contract," we have done all that should be done.

Which is the best policy? Shall we cripple the management we have now? Shall we say to the President, "You have made a mistake. You shall reorganize, and you shall perhaps get some one who knows nothing about the steel business to advise you as to steel. You shall get somebody who does not know the mechanism or the science of an electric light to tell us what electrical apparatus we shall have. You shall get somebody who does not know what a steamboat is and never saw one, or rode in one, to advise us with respect to the Navy."

I recognize, Senators, that the situation is not exactly as any Senator here would like to have it. It is not as I would like to have it, but it is a choice between methods, and as for me, my judgment is that we will be best serving the cause of our country by continuing the organization that we have under the safeguards that are provided by this amendment.

Mr. President, I only care to say a few words more with regard to a subject of controversy here yesterday. A good deal was said yesterday reflecting upon the motives of men, a good deal based upon charges, a good deal based upon inference without knowing the facts which were the subject of discussion. As a practicing lawyer I always found it advisable to be sure of my facts and draw my conclusions when they have been established, and I think it is a pretty good safeguard for the legislator as well. I say that in all kindness. It is very easy for us to get partial information and be misguided. I charge no bad faith, because I think that where facts have become public to such an extent that the motives and integrity of men in responsible positions are put in a questionable light there ought to be an investigation, and if Senators have information which leads them to believe that the people's money is being squandered or wasted or preferences are being given to certain firms because they happen to have a friend at court the public ought to know all that, and I shall not only not place a stone in the way of any investigations of that kind but I always court investigations.

Now, let us address ourselves to one of the subjects of criticism of yesterday. Without attempting to give the exact language, it would appear from statements made on the floor of the Senate that some one at the head of a shoe company had given to himself a contract at prices in excess of prices presented by other bidders. In part that is true, but it is not the whole truth. I regret that I have not complete information with regard to this. When this statement was made on the floor of the Senate I went to the telephone and called up the Secretary of War. He was just about to go to a Cabinet meeting, and after the Cabinet meeting he was obliged to go on some official business out of the city; but he was kind enough to have one of the men in his office send to me certain memoranda with respect to these shoe contracts, and I want to call them to the attention of the Senate.

These were the McElwain contracts, which were questioned yesterday. This memorandum furnished me is dated as of yesterday.

First, there were purchases by the Quartermaster Corps independent of the committee on supplies; that is, this shoe committee. The regular officials of the Government had made them. On March 5, 1917, the Quartermaster Corps awarded contracts for 450,000 pairs of shoes on an opening of sealed bids to three concerns. Between March 30 and April 30 the Quartermaster Corps purchased in the open market, without sealed bids and without recommendation from the committee on supplies or its subcommittee on shoe and leather industries, 1,982,910 pairs of shoes from 21 manufacturers at prices ranging from $4.90 to $5.108. Purchases from 16 of these concerns were made at $5.10. Among these purchases were two contracts with the W. H. McElwain Co. for 50,000 pairs at $5.075 and 125,000 pairs at $5.10, which was the price of the 16 firms.

Purchases of the Quartermaster Corps, with the recommendation of the committee on supplies under the awards of May 29, 1917, were made as follows; and there is a memorandum on the margin of this paper to the effect that "this was the only opening in which the McElwain Co. were awarded" on which recommendations were made by the committee on supplies:

On May 29 sealed bids were opened by the Quartermaster Corps. The committee on supplies—of which I understand Mr. McElwain was a member—had sent special requests to 74 manufacturers, extending from Maine to California, asking them to bid. Bids were submitted by 47 concerns. Awards were made to 47 manufacturers by the Quartermaster Corps, awards being made in every case to the lowest bidders. On this opening awards were made to the W. H. McElwain Co. of 400,000 pairs of field shoes at $4.795. The awards on field shoes ranged from $4.67 to $4.85. There is a note here, "See Schedule A, attached." Four hundred and seventy thousand pairs were awarded at prices lower than McElwain's and 630,000 pairs at prices higher than McElwain's.

Schedule A, to which the memorandum refers, gives a list of 11 firms submitting these bids, varying from 20,000 pairs of shoes, the lowest in number, to 100,000 pairs of shoes, the highest number. The prices range from $4.67 to $4.85 per pair. They had asked for bids for a million and a half pairs of shoes. No bidder presented any bid for the whole amount. The bids, as I am informed, expressly stated the number of pairs of shoes which the bidder was willing to furnish to the Government at the price therein contained, so that it took all the bids of all of these bidders, where bids were accepted, to supply the requirements of the Government for 1,500,000 pairs of shoes. Some bids were lower than others, but the Government took all of the lowest bids, which it was necessary to take, in order to get the proper requirements of the Government; and, of course, not knowing that fact, at once the cry can be made that there was some favoritism.

Now, let me call attention further to this——

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator pardon me until I finish this statement?

Mr. CALDER. I just wanted to clear up one fact, if the Senator will allow me, at that point.

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. As I understand the Senator's statement, the lower bidders were awarded contracts for all of the shoes that they offered to manufacture. In other words, all of the shoes they bid for were awarded to the manufacturers.

Mr. POMERENE. And it took all of the accepted bids to make up the total requirements of the Government. I ask now, Mr. President, that this schedule A, giving the full details as to these bids, be incorporated in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[No. 1206.]

SCHEDULE A, OPENING OF MAY 29.

Calf or veal marching shoes (610,000 pairs).

Name of manufacturer.	Number of pairs.	Price.
1. Corbin	25,000	$5.035
2. L. Q. White	25,000	5.10
3. Rosenwasser	100,000	5.10
4. Herman	25,000	5.10
5. Commonwealth	25,000	5.12
6. C. A. Eaton	50,000	5.122
7. Corbin	25,000	5.145
8. Herman	25,000	5.15
9. L. Q. White	25,000	5.165
10. McElwain	100,000	5.175
11. Corbin	50,000	5.23
12. Brown Shoe	50,000	5.24
13. W. H. Moulton	85,000	5.24

Average, $5.165.

Mr. POMERENE. On the same opening the W. H. McElwain Co. was awarded 100,000 pairs of veal marching shoes, specification 1206, at $5.17½. Awards varying in price were made, from $5.095 to $5.24, in every case to the lowest bidders. Three hundred and twenty-five thousand pairs were purchased at prices lower than McElwain's bid, and 185,000 pairs at prices higher.

There were certain awards on June 1, 1917. On June 1 the Quartermaster Corps awarded 750,000 pairs of field shoes to 10 concerns at a flat price of $4.75. Now note: This award was made upon the recommendation of the committee on supplies. This purchase of 750,000 pairs, in which no shoes were awarded to McElwain, was made by the Quartermaster Corps at a saving of over $75,000 from the price which would have been paid had these shoes been awarded on May 29 to the bidders next lowest after the awards then made.

Again, awards were made on July 9, 1917. On July 9 the Quartermaster Corps awarded 1,225,000 pairs of field shoes, specification 1257, and 950,000 pairs of side-leather marching shoes, specification 1258, on sealed bids, to the lowest bidders in every case. These awards were made upon the recommendation of the committee on supplies. No award was made to the W. H. McElwain Co.

Certain awards were made on July 13, 1917. On July 13 the Quartermaster Corps awarded 971,000 pairs of field shoes, specification 1257, at a flat price of $4.70. No award was made to the W. H. McElwain Co.

As to the purchases made by the Navy Department and the Marine Corps, the W. H. McElwain Co. has submitted no bids to these departments since January 1, 1917, and no awards have been made to them.

Mr. President, when the facts are fully known there is not anything in connection with this award of the contract for shoes that is the subject of legitimate criticism.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator will emphasize the fact that this firm has received no contract for shoes since the beginning of the war, and that the last contract was made something like three or four months before the beginning of the war.

Mr. POMERENE. I have given the dates in my statement here, and I am not prepared to say that the Senator's statement is correct; neither am I prepared to say that it is not correct.

Mr. WEEKS. I understood from the Senator's statement that that was the fact.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not read it with that thought in mind, and so I am not prepared to answer specifically the inquiry of the Senator.

Now, Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question of these cantonments at the present time. It may be that there is something there to criticize. I do not know, but I will know before I speak publicly about it; and I dare say, knowing the character of these men as we do, that while there may be an occasional man among them who might so far forget the duty that he owes to his own manhood, and the duty that he owes to his country, as to take some advantage of this situation, my judgment is that it would be better for this country to suffer a loss in that respect rather than to disorganize this advisory commission and drive to the four winds these tried men of experience for men about whom we know nothing.

Mr. President, if I were helping to frame legislation which was to formulate the permanent policies of our country, the law could not be made too drastic for me. I should insist that no man should have any interest, directly or indirectly, in a contract with the making of which he had anything to do in an advisory capacity; but I am not willing now to say that, in order to avoid some of these criticisms, a part of which may be well founded but most of which, I dare say, are without any foundation whatever, we must deprive the country of the information which these men can give us, particularly when we say to them, by the form of the proposed legislation, that if they are interested they shall tell the world, or the Government, at least, what that interest is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says that ordinarily he would be for the most drastic law prohibiting them from selling to themselves under these circumstances, or acting the part of both buyer and seller, but that now the situation is different. Does the Senator contend that there is a different standard of honesty at a time when our country is in peril from the standard of honesty that obtains when we are at peace with all the world?

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President; but the Senator's question is purely an academic one. Of course, the principles of honesty do not change, but the principles which measure our conduct do change. I have done a thousand things in the last year in connection with this war, and so has the Senator from Tennessee, that we would not do were we considering legislation relating to the permanent peace conditions of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. But, Mr. President, neither the Senator nor I, I am sure, has done anything of questionable honesty; and all that we ask in this amendment is that men acting in a fiduciary capacity toward the Government shall deal honestly with the Government and with themselves. The proposed amendment of the committee does not in the slightest degree affect these men on the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense if they merely follow those principles of honesty which the Senator uniformly advocates.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator is like a good many friends in these days: they would save at the spigot, and they would waste at the bung. I would rather lose, if we must lose, a few millions of dollars rather than to be deprived of the advice and experience of these men. I detest militarism; I am not willing that we shall become a military power permanently, but there is not anything that I will not do within reason to make ourselves so strong from a military and naval standpoint that we shall meet the foe and win the victory. I would rather be 100 per cent overprepared than 10 per cent underprepared.

Mr. President, I think I have said all that I care to say, save this: The proposed amendment does not change the principles of honesty. There is not anything in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee that will place any safeguards around the Government which will not be more than overbalanced by the disadvantages the Government will suffer if his amendment is adopted, and the President and the country are deprived of the assistance of the members of the advisory commission and its committees.

Mr. REED. Mr President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. REED. Is the pending amendment open to further amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be glad to have the Senator from Ohio state just what the condition is so far as his amendment is concerned. The present occupant of the chair was not here when it was presented.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not been here all the time; but as I understand, the committee had proposed section 3, which is contained in the committee print, and I offered my amendment as a substitute for that amendment, which is the pending question. I desire to suggest that after the presentation of the first amendment, which I think was discussed here on Saturday, after a conference with the Senator from Montana, we made, together, certain verbal changes. They do not change the substance of the amendment, but I think it is perhaps better phrased, and I ask leave to offer the last printed amendment in lieu of the one which was then under consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, under that statement, I think clearly the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio is open to amendment. I therefore move to amend the substitute——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wanted to get the facts in regard to it. The Chair is not of the opinion expressed by the Senator from Missouri, that it is open to amendment. The Chair would rule that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is an amendment in the second degree, and not now open to amendment.

Mr. REED. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. REED. A motion to strike out and insert can be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a motion to strike out and insert an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. REED. And either of those propositions is then amendable. That is my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that would be true of an original amendment to strike out and insert; but this is an amendment to an amendment which is now before the Senate.

Mr. REED. I am not a parliamentarian, but I want to get before the Chair this thought: There is a bill here before us, and it is reported by the committee with a committee amendment. For that committee amendment the Senator from Ohio offers a substitute which is in the nature of a motion to strike out and insert. Now, before that motion to insert is carried, I think it can be perfected by another amendment, and I call that to the Chair's attention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the ruling was correct, for this reason: The amendment proposed by the committee is an original amendment. It is the insertion of a new section.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is to change that amendment by substitution.

Mr. REED. It is to strike out and insert; that is what it amounts to, under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But it can not be in that form, as this is an amendment offered by the Senate committee, as the Chair understands.

Mr. REED. I do not think the Chair understands me, or I do not quite catch the Chair. The committee proposes a new section which, of course, is in the nature of an amendment. For that new section the Senator from Ohio proposes a substitute which is in the nature of striking out that new section and bringing in another section for it. I have understood the ruling to be that when a motion was in that form you could propose new matter by amendment. I do not desire to press it further than to be sure that I made myself understood.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, we are so tangled up I am afraid I shall not get an opportunity later, so I wish to offer an amendment now, that the Senate may be informed of what I propose.

The amendment I send to the Secretary's desk and will ask to have read for the information of the Senate is very important. We are discussing food control, but we can not control food that we have not already produced and have on hand. The title of this bill is "To provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel." It is generally known throughout the country as the food-control bill, and people know and understand its purpose is to control food, feeds, and fuel. It ought to have one more alliterative word, "fertilizers," making it "food, feeds, fuel, and fertilizers." Any farmer will understand, if he lives in the South, that most of the land will produce very little of either of the first two unless the fourth is added to it. The purpose of the amendment is to enable the Government to give aid to the farmers in procuring this vital ingredient to winning the war.

My colleague [Mr. SMITH of South Carolina] is the author of this amendment, which passed the Senate as an independent proposition some time ago, but has been stalled in the House by reason of an understanding over there which confines legislation to important war measures. Why the House does not consider this an important war measure I can not understand, any more than I can understand why the Secretary of Agriculture considers nitrate of soda as a more or less worthless, negligible commercial fertilizer. I know what I say, and there are official reports from experiment stations in the South to verify the utterance, that nitrate of soda applied to grain in the spring and to corn about the time it is tasseling sometimes doubles the crop and always increases production very greatly.

My colleague is in South Carolina now on important business. He may or may not return. If he does not, I give notice that I shall ask for a vote on this amendment to-morrow. The Senate has already passed it by a vote of 52 to 8, and has therefore already expressed its own ideas and feelings in regard to it. I merely want to let the Senate understand what the amendment is intended to accomplish.

I ask that the amendment be read for the information of the Senate and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda as he may determine to be necessary, and find available, for increasing agricultural production during the calendar year 1917 and 1918, and to dispose of the same at cost, paying in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations and to use such means and agencies of the Government as in his discretion he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to offer an amendment, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. While I am on my feet, I desire to ask a question for information of some of the gentlemen who have the bill in charge. Is there any section of the advisory committee that has charge of the matter of distilled spirits?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not answer the Senator myself right now. There is nothing in the bill about it, but there is a document published that gives all the information, showing who composed the advisory council and the subcommittees thereof. I will send to the Senator a copy of that document, which will inform him on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I am paired with him for the day and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I have been unable to get a transfer. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the affirmative). I find that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], with whom I have a pair, has not voted. I am therefore compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], but I am assured by some of his friends that he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore take the liberty of voting notwithstanding the pair. I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the affirmative). For the purpose of a motion to reconsider I change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], with whom I am paired, would vote as I have voted, and therefore I let my vote stand.

Mr. McCUMBER (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of the announcement of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] I transfer my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]; but I am at liberty to vote on this bill and amendments, and I therefore allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I cast my vote, but in the absence of that Senator and not being able to get a transfer I withdraw my vote.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 17, as follows:

So Mr. POMERENE's amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from Oregon that I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment just adopted. We are now in a parliamentary situation where I think that may be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought that question was disposed of.

Mr. REED. I think not. The motion for a substitute has now been adopted and I think that is amendable. I desire to offer an amendment to it. I move to amend by adding at the end of the amendment just adopted the following words:

Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not change, alter, or repeal section 41 of Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts will state it.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment just adopted was in the nature of a substitute, which was open to perfection before the vote was taken upon it.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. Pardon me; allow me to finish the sentence. The Senate has adopted that precise form of words and I do not think it is amendable at this stage. It can be amended in the Senate, of course.

Mr. REED. I undertook to amend it; I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts I asked for the privilege of offering an amendment to it, and it was held I could not offer it at that time. Now that it has been adopted I am asking for the privilege of offering that amendment. That is what I meant when I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I do not know who made that ruling, but nothing is more fixed under our rules than that when an amendment is offered in the nature of a substitute there are two questions presented, and the original matter and the other are both open to a perfecting amendment. If perfecting amendments are not offered, I think it is general parliamentary law that when the complete substitute is adopted the body has adopted that precise form of words.

Mr. REED. I made the very point the Senator suggests when I undertook to offer my amendment, that the substitute was in the nature of a motion to strike out and insert and the matter to be inserted could be perfected, and I was ruled out of order.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If what the Senator says is true, it still does not improve the situation, that because we have had one erroneous ruling that therefore we must have another one.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, Mr. President, I hardly think we ought to be doing business in that way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is the exact situation.

Mr. REED. The matter was insisted upon within the last hour. The President pro tempore of the Senate was in the chair. I made my statement very plain and insisted upon it very firmly. If the ruling is now that I can not offer the amendment, that I am deprived of any chance to offer an amendment to this proposition, I shall either have to submit to it or make a motion to reconsider the vote just taken.

In my opinion the Senate of the United States will hardly deny the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota will state the inquiry.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand, of course, that the original committee amendment was open to amendment. An amendment in the form of a substitute was offered. That substitute was adopted by the Senate. It must still be adopted by the Senate as the committee amendment, must it not, being a substitute for that committee amendment? Therefore, is it not still open to amendment as a substitute for a committee amendment? Must we not vote for it exactly in that particular form, inasmuch as the Chair must still put the question whether we shall adopt this now as a part of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair has some little knowledge of general parliamentary law, but has learned that the parliamentary procedure of the Senate is not an exact science, and that the precedents are not uniform. The Chair will be glad to receive any suggestions and have his attention called to any precedents bearing upon the point of order raised.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, when the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] was before the Senate the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] tendered the amendment, which he now again proposes to tender. The then occupant of the chair held that the amendment was not amendable at that time. Now, the amendment, which was in the nature of a substitute, has been adopted, and we yet have before us this amendment which still must be disposed of. It was simply adopted as a substitute for the committee amendment. It is now to be disposed of by the Senate.

I am not myself a parliamentarian, but it does seem to me that both these propositions can not stand; that the amendment was either amendable when the Senator from Missouri offered his amendment a short time ago or it must be up for consideration now. There must be sometime when a body can complete and consummate a proposition which they propose to put into a bill. It is not yet adopted; it is not yet a part of the bill; and it must be within the power of this body to make it what it wishes to be before it is put into the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the parliamentary situation is quite clear. In the first place, I want to say that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had, under the rule, a perfect right to offer his amendment, if the statement he has made is correct, and I have every reason, of course, to believe that it was correct. I was not in the Chamber at the time, but under Rule XVIII——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion to him, I desire to say that the occupant of the chair at that time ruled that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri was an amendment in the third degree, and was therefore out of order.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand it was a substitute, and if it was an amendment to the substitute it was an amendment in the second degree.

I now desire to say that Rule XVIII provides that the original text shall be first perfected, that the substitute shall then be perfected, and that was supposed to have been done before the vote was taken upon the substitute. Now they are both perfected, the Senate having decided that it would accept the substitute in place of the House provision; but the Senate has yet to adopt that substitute as a part of the bill. The Senate now can only reject it as a whole or not at all; but the Senator from Missouri can reserve the right to offer an amendment to it in the Senate. The Senator can not, however, offer an amendment under the rule, as I understand it, while the bill is still in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I say just a word?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply wish to suggest that I understood the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri was ruled out of order because it was an amendment in the third degree, and not because of any other reason. When we have adopted the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as a substitute for the committee amendment, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri ceases to be an amendment in the third degree, and is an amendment to what stands as a substitute for the committee amendment. I merely wish to state where we would land if we follow any other rule.

It is possible that some of us voted for the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio because we thought it was better than the other, but still we might desire to vote against the other or to perfect the other. As I understand the parliamentary situation, we must still vote upon the question of whether or not we will adopt this substitute now as a part of the bill. We simply adopted it as a substitute for a proffered amendment. The question is not yet disposed of. We have a right to say now whether or not we will accept that as an amendment to the bill.

We have a right, as I understand parliamentary law, to determine whether or not we can perfect that substitute amendment before we are compelled to vote on it. Otherwise we would be compelled to vote without any change, even though we might desire to amend an amendment, which now would simply be an amendment in the second degree, which is always parliamentary.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, we have been operating for the last two or three weeks as in Committee of the Whole. The Committee of the Whole acts on a bill for the purpose of adopting amendments, which are then recommended to the Senate and adopted or rejected by the Senate as it sees fit. Acting under the unanimous-consent agreement, so far the Committee of the Whole has been acting only on committee amendments, and this was the last of the committee amendments to be acted upon. The committee reported a certain amendment; the Senator from Ohio offered an amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute. The substitution has been made of the matter suggested by the Senator from Ohio for the committee amendment; so, as the matter now stands, section 3 has been amended in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, but no one outside of the committee as yet has had a chance to offer any amendment to section 3. We now have adopted the substitute of the Senator from Ohio to section 3, and it is clearly the right of any Member of the Senate now to offer to amend, as in Committee of the Whole, section 3 as perfected by the Committee of the Whole. Otherwise it is obvious that no one but a member of the committee offering a committee amendment would have a fair chance to amend this bill as in Committee of the Whole. This being the last committee amendment, we shall have passed that stage when it is finally put into finished shape. We do not perfect a section and then adopt it as in Committee of the Whole, but we perfect the section as in Committee of the Whole, and then adopt it, if we see fit to do so, in the Senate; therefore, when we have passed the stage of considering the last committee amendment, thereafter all that can be considered will be amendments to the sections as they now stand. When a perfected substitute has once been adopted for a perfected original section, thereafter it can not be amended. I think that is the situation, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my attention has been called to the fact that section 3 was a committee amendment and that there was no House provision in the bill covering that subject matter. My remarks had reference to a case in which the House had acted upon the same subject matter. Being a committee amendment, I want to say that I think the Chair ruled correctly that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was an amendment in the third degree, because the substitute was in the second degree, and a further amendment would consequently be in the third degree.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Considering the ruling of the President pro tempore referred to and the conditions and facts surrounding the presentation of the amendment that is now offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Chair is of opinion that to sustain the point of order would result in an injustice and would not tend to serve the purpose for which a legislative body is organized. Perhaps technically the point is well taken, but with the views the Chair entertains with respect to this matter, the Chair holds that the amendment is in order and overrules the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I most earnestly beg the attention of the Senate for a few moments to this amendment. I shall read the law as it stands and as this amendment will permit it to stand, because if we are going to abolish the common law and the law of morals at the same time we are abolishing the Constitution. I want it known that that is just what we are doing.

There is upon the statute books, and there has been for 50 years, in substantially this form, the following section of the statute, which was put there during the Civil War and which has stood ever since, with slight verbal changes:

No officer or agent of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm, or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] declared over and over again that not a single one of the members of the advisory commission was engaged in making contracts with the Government; that the contracts were made by others; that the Government was represented by its proper agents; and yet he opposed the addition of the words which I now offer in my amendment. If the Government of the United States is represented by its own proper agencies, if the members of the advisory commission are not making contracts with themselves, then the amendment I propose will do them no harm. If they are making contracts with themselves, then it is immoral; it is against the laws of God and of man, and the people of the United States will not tolerate it. You can not excuse it because there is a war on. It is not necessary because there is a war on; and, I repeat, the Senator from Ohio a number of times stated—and the RECORD when it is printed to-morrow morning will show it—that the members of the advisory commission were not making contracts. If not, why should we not then preserve this old law without impairment, for it only provides that an agent of a corporation or company shall not be directly interested in the pecuniary profits of contracts made with the United States when the person is employed as an agent of the United States?

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be agreed to. I think the amendment which was adopted a moment ago indicates what the Senate's view is respecting it. Section 41 is perfectly plain in and of itself. It reads:

No officer or agent of any corporation, joint stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint stock company, association, or firm.

We have just declared by the affirmative action of the Senate that no agent or officer of the Government shall solicit or induce or attempt to induce any contract with a firm in which he is interested. It is perfectly plain English, and we understand what was intended. Then we provide further that if any of the specified persons are serving on any board or commission they shall not participate in the making of any recommendation respecting such a contract, and neither shall they participate in the making of contracts. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri in effect repeals the very amendment which the Senate has adopted. If the Senate desires to do that, well and good; but we might just as well wipe out the entire section which has been adopted if that is the intention.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a moment. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me to ask a question?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio if he has not said on the floor of the Senate within the last hour at least three times that no one of the members of the Council of National Defense or their advisors were engaged in making contracts for the Government?

Mr. POMERENE. I so stated; and I will say it the fourth time, if the Senator desires.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator, if that is the case how any of them will be affected by this provision:

No officer or agent of any corporation, joint stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint stock company, association, or firm.

How will they be interfered with?

Mr. POMERENE. The old section of the statute provides that—

No * * * person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation * * * shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States—

And so forth.

Under the section adopted by the Senate a member of the advisory commission might have an interest in some of these contracts if he is a stockholder in the corporation to which the contract is awarded, but we say, if he is so interested, that he shall not solicit contracts, he shall not induce or attempt to induce the making of a contract, and he shall not participate in any recommendations for that contract, nor in the making of the contract.

Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator will pardon me, the language of section 41 is again—

No officer or agent of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm, or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm.

The Senator has said that they do not transact business with the Government; that they do not act as the agents of the Government——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I insist that the Senator shall not misrepresent what I have said. I said that they did not enter into any contracts. I did not say that they were not interested in a transaction.

Mr. REED. I say that the Senator has stated that they do not act as officers or agents of the United States in the transaction of business with their corporations, and that section 41 only applies to that class of individuals. Now, either these men are acting as the agents of the United States in transacting business with their corporations or they are not. If they are acting as agents of the United States and transacting business with their corporations, they are not harmed by this amendment; they do not come within the provisions of the old statutes. If they are acting as agents of the United States Government and at the same time representing their corporations in business transactions between those corporations and the Government, then I say there is no man who can justify it; there is no man who can defend it. You will find out before long that you ought to have something back of this war beside mere arbitrary law, and beside the mobilization of a few wealthy men. You have to put back of this war the good will and confidence of the American people, which is a greater asset than all other things combined; and I warn you that you will shake that confidence grievously if you undertake to permit these men to deal with themselves and for themselves and for the Government of the United States at the same time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Ohio, upon reflection, will object to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I take it that the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio was not intended to controvert the fundamental principles found in section 41. In order to avoid such a construction as has been placed upon the amendment, it seems to me necessary to place in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio section 41. Let us see what that section says, and see whether or not the Senate wants to go on record as favoring the repeal of it, if the amendment does repeal it:

No officer or agent of any corporation, joint-stock company, or association, and no member or agent of any firm, or person directly or indirectly interested in the pecuniary profits or contracts of such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm, shall be employed or shall act as an officer or agent of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation, joint-stock company, association, or firm. Whoever shall violate the provision of this section shall be fined not more than $2,000 and imprisoned not more than two years.

As has been said by the Senator from Missouri, that law was adopted many years ago, if I remember correctly, in 1862 or 1863, but I will not be positive as to that. It is a principle, Mr. President, which should obtain and which should control the business transactions of this Government in one period as well as in another. There can be no possible reason why we should suspend fundamental principles such as embody common honesty in public affairs merely because we have an emergency confronting us in the way of a war.

This principle, Mr. President, is peculiarly and particularly applicable in time of war, because we all know that, be as vigilant as we may, and as earnest as we can, with reference to protecting the Public Treasury and the taxpayer in time of war against sinister influences in reaching the Treasury, it is almost impossible to do it. There never has been a war from the beginning of recorded history until now in which the people have not been astounded at the activities of supposedly patriotic citizens in taking care of themselves during the emergency. It was true even in the Revolutionary War; it was true during the War of 1812; it was true in 1861 to 1865; and it was astoundingly true in the last contest in which this Nation engaged,

It is not sufficient, Mr. President, to say that this or that individual when considered as an individual is honest and patriotic; it is necessary, sir, to have recorded upon the statute books those things which reach the man who is not honest and patriotic. It is not within human power, the power of Presidents or others, to select as between the honest and the dishonest when they come purporting to serve their Government.

Now, Mr. President, who would want this principle ignored in any transaction that may take place between the Government and its citizens during this war? It will not injure any man, in my judgment, who wants to deal thoroughly and honestly with the situation; but it will be of tremendous help in enabling the Government to control those who may not be desirous of really serving the Government.

Let us see what the amendment which has been adopted does, in view of the fact that it is objected to. It reads:

No person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts—

Mr. President, that might be ample and sufficient and efficient to protect the Government ordinarily——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment—to protect the man who is honest in his duties; but the man who is dishonest, the man who would work in byways and in crooked ways to circumvent this statute, could do so without any difficulty whatever.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the incomplete character of the language employed. Turning to line 3 of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, I find the words:

Shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce.

To make that amendment of any value, the words "or recommend" ought to be added. Without the addition of those words, the door is thrown wide open; the sentence is incomplete and will not accomplish the purpose it is designed to accomplish.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to say to the Senator from Minnesota that I think he has overlooked the last sentence in the section which has been adopted.

Mr. NELSON. The provision to which I have called attention relates to the members of the advisory commission. The portion of the provision the Senator from Ohio has in mind relates to outside employees, a different class of men. The words "or recommend" ought to be included, otherwise these men can escape the effect of the language. I apologize to the Senator from Idaho for interrupting him; but so long as these men do not directly solicit or directly induce, they can go on and recommend in a smooth, Oily Gammon fashion that the company in which they are interested shall be recognized. Does the Senator from Ohio understand the meaning of that? Oily Gammon, of course, can go up and recommend. He can say, "I do not want to mislead you; I do not want to induce you; but I, Oily Gammon, recommend this to you."

Mr. POMERENE. I can understand how the Senator might be justified in making a criticism of that kind; but it is quite well always to read the whole section and place our construction on the whole of it. The latter part of it is:

Nor shall any agent or employee—

Which means of the Government—

make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? That part of it which the Sentaor from Ohio quotes is to preserve the integrity of the advisory commission. No one shall recommend anything vicious to this advisory commission. If the Senator will notice that part of the language, he will see that it reads:

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission.

It is to keep this advisory commission from being corrupted.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the language is perfectly plain.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator believes in the principle, why not insert, after the word "induce" in line 19 of this substitute bill, the words "or recommend"? Then you will get something of a clean bill of health.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Minnesota and myself are trying to do the same thing. I do not believe that he quite understands this section. Let me say that this section as originally drawn had in it the words "advise, induce, or attempt to induce any person authorized to execute a contract to enter into it." Now, if the War Department is not to be permitted even to have the advice when asked by the Secretary of War, we would eliminate perhaps a good portion of this advisory commission; so the word "advise" was changed to "solicit." Under that wording, I take it that if the Secretary of War should say to some one who might have a pecuniary interest in some corporation with which the Government was going to deal, "I should like your judgment about this quality of steel or this quality of material," it might preclude him even from expressing an opinion. So for that reason the word "advise" was changed to "solicit"; but we also provided that he should not make any recommendation concerning a contract, if he was interested, without disclosing that fact, and disclosing it in writing fully and completely, and he was not even to participate in the making of the contract. To my mind it is perfectly clear.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that I believe the whole difficulty in his mind could be cured by striking out, in line 8, after the word "thereof," the balance of that sentence down to and including the word "thereto," in line 14, so that it would read:

Nor shall any agent or employee make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof.

And end the sentence there. I had in mind proposing an amendment of that kind, to strike out all after the word "thereof" to the end of that sentence.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am glad to have the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota, but I should like to conclude what I have to say with reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri before taking up these other amendments which have been suggested by the Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Florida.

As I said a moment ago, Mr. President, if this amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is to be construed as being in opposition to section 41—that is to say, if the two propositions are to be construed as being opposed to each other, one not in harmony with the other—I do not see how we can for a moment refuse to make it plain that we do not propose to disregard the principle which is covered by section 41. I have not construed the section which the Senator from Ohio has offered to the extent of going as far as the Senator from Ohio has suggested, but he is the author of the amendment and an able lawyer, and he has construed it, and he says that it is in conflict with section 41; that to adopt section 41 is to emasculate, if not to completely repeal, the amendment which has just been adopted. That being his construction, so far as I am concerned I must vote to put in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, because I am not willing to record my approval of a man contracting with himself when he is the representative of the Government. It is a principle so revolting that it can be defended in no court, either of law or of conscience. If a man will stop to reflect upon the matter, he will realize that it is an indefensible proposition. Now, it is not a necessary proposition to this situation, any more than it is in time of peace, and I hope the Senator from Ohio will not oppose the reservation of section 41, that it may continue to be a fundamental principle in our law that a man can not, as an officer of the Government, contract with himself.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it is my judgment that that section continues to be a part of the fundamental law of the land; and the amendment, if adopted, it seems to me is perfectly plain. If the old section is to inhibit the things which we affirmatively allow in the new section, then clearly we have modified the old law to that extent; but the principle remains the same.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I believe that no Member of the Senate can afford to vote to repeal the statute referred to by the Senator from Missouri. Let me state that statute in plain terms. That statute provides that no officer or agent of any corporation shall act as an agent or officer of the United States for the transaction of business with such corporation. Of course not. That should not be allowed. Now, so that the Senate may get the distinction between the three propositions that are before it, I should like to illustrate.

Let us assume the case of Mr. Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation. Assume that Mr. Gary has been commissioned by the President to make some contracts for canvas or wheat, something entirely apart from the United States Steel Corporation. Then, in case Mr. Gary, being an officer or agent of the Government, and assuming to act as such, should perform any business with the Government of the United States having to do with the United States Steel Corporation, he would be criminally liable under that statute, and we should all want him to be so.

Now let us take the case of the section we have just adopted. That provides that Mr. Gary, as a member of the advisory commission or any subsidiary of it, shall not seek to make a contract for the United States Steel Corporation with the United States Government. It goes further than the older law referred to, and we are all for that. We want to prohibit Mr. Gary from attempting to get any contract, through any committee or through any officer, for the United States Steel Corporation. But the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio is meant to cover this case, and the Senate can vote for it or not, just as it appeals to the Senate. It is intended to cover this case.

Suppose that there are steel contracts under consideration by the Government, and the Government desires to take the advice of the subcommittee on steel. Then Mr. Gary can not take any part in recommending what contracts shall be made; but because Mr. Gary happens to be one of five members on that subcommittee, it is not intended that the other four members shall not advise the Government on the subject. Therefore, under the Pomerene amendment, the other four members are allowed to act; but unless Mr. Gary notifies the other four members of the subcommittee in writing before they act, before they make a recommendation, of his interest in the corporation concerned in the contract, then he is criminally liable.

I can not see how the Pomerene amendment repeals this old law in any particular. If it does repeal the old law in any particular, I am against it; and because some one may construe it as a repeal of the old law in some degree, and because I do not care to have an imputation of that kind made in regard to any vote that I cast, I sincerely hope that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Oregon will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, so there will not be any question about it. In my judgment it does not impair at all what we have done, and it may stop a lot of ugly talk.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I favor the amendment of the Senator from Ohio; but as the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has so well expressed it—and I do not pretend to repeat feebly what he has stated so strongly—I see no inconsistency between the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. The fact is, as I construe the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, that no agent of a corporation can possibly participate in making, on behalf of the Government, a contract in which he is interested without being guilty under the amendment of the Senator from Ohio; and that is all that the old law of 1862 provides—that is, that a man who is an agent for the Government can not at the same time make a contract with a company in which he is interested without violating the provisions of that statute.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, in my judgment, much of the confusion of mind which has existed on this subject in the Senate arises from a confusion as to the character of the advisory commission. I have always contended that the advisory commission is frankly a commission of producers and sellers, and that the purpose of the law in providing for the advisory commission was to mobilize the various industries of the country and to organize them through their chiefs in such a way that the entire resources of the country can be readily summoned to its support in case of war.

I do not regard the members of the advisory commission as agents of the Government. They are producers and sellers who may have relations of contract with the Government, but they are brought together under an organization authorized by the Government in order that the Government's real agents, the Council of National Defense and the department chiefs, may confer with them, may gain information from them, and finally, after exhausting inquiry, make contracts with them if such contracts are desired.

I do not find a word in the legislation authorizing the organization of the advisory commission with reference to recommendations as to prices; and I will read from the statute:

> It shall be the duty of the Council of National Defense to supervise and direct investigations and make recommendations to the President and the heads of executive departments—

And so forth. They are the agents of the Government. It is their duty to investigate. It is their duty to make recommendations. Now, the advisory commission: It shall consist—> of not more than seven persons, each of whom shall have special knowledge of some industry, public utility, or the development of some natural resource, or be otherwise specially qualified, in the opinion of the council, for the performance of the duties hereinafter provided.

Now, what are their duties? Their duties are to investigate with reference to "the development of seagoing transportation," among other things—and I read only a part—and secure "data as to amounts, location, method, and means of production;" not a word regarding price.

> Data as to amounts, location, method, and means of production, and availability of military supplies; the giving of information to producers and manufacturers as to the class of supplies needed by the military and other services of the Government, the requirements relating thereto, and the creation of relations which will render possible in time of need the immediate concentration and utilization of the resources of the Nation.

I contend that the purpose of this act was to make the Council of National Defense and the department chiefs the agents of the Government, but not to make the members of the advisory commission the agents of the Government. They are there frankly as producers and sellers for the purpose of giving all the information within their power to the Council of National Defense with a view to the mobilization and organization of the resources of the country in aid of war.

It is perhaps unfortunate that the term "advisory" has been used in this connection, but no one can mistake the nature of the organization if he reads the law; and, as I understand it, the main purpose of these advisory organizations and these subcommittees organized for the various industries is to give the Government the information. If they make any recommendation regarding price, then they go beyond the statute itself. The statute says nothing whatever as to prices, but refers only to amounts, location, method, and means of production.

We can understand, of course, that these are all matters of the highest importance, and it is of the highest importance that we should not disqualify the most capable men on this advisory commission. The most capable men are, of course, the great chiefs of industry, and they are not only stockholders but they are officers of these great corporations which have become so large a part of the vital force of the country.

It seems to me that somewhere in this legislation we can amend the act providing for the advisory commission in such a way as to give these organizations of producers and sellers a name that will indicate the nature of their services, and thus demonstrate that their members are not acting as agents of the Government, but that they are there simply as the heads of their various industries and organizations to give the Government the information which it needs with a view to prosecuting the war.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may say a word further, since this debate has been going on I have been examining the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, and I have come to the conclusion, after conferring with lawyers in whose judgment I have very great confidence, that the only effect of this proviso will be to let these two sections—the old section and the new—stand side by side without the one repealing the other, or without this proviso nullifying the preceding provisions of the section. With that understanding of it I will accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and that amendment is made; and the amendment as amended is agreed to, without objection.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to amend the amendment further.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks this amendment has passed beyond the Committee of the Whole. It can be amended in the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. We have just adopted one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment just adopted was an amendment that was adopted after the amendment had been substituted. This is as much in order as the amendment we adopted a moment ago.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. Unless we are going to have two rulings on the same matter, it is in order for me to offer this amendment as well as the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the Chair is not taking up the ruling that was made by the Presiding Officer at the time. The Senator from Ohio accepted the amendment. The Chair asked if there was any objection, and there was no objection. The Chair then announced that without objection the amendment as amended was adopted. There was no objection. Then the Senator from Minnesota rose and said he wanted to offer an amendment. The Chair is holding now that whether or not it was at any time in order, it is not in order now. It will be in order in the Senate. All that the Senator from Minnesota has to do is to reserve a vote on this section and submit his amendment to the Senate.

Mr. NELSON. Oh, not at all, Mr. President. I am simply unfortunate that I did not offer my amendment when the Senator who just retired from the chair ruled the amendment of the Senator from Missouri in order. It is my misfortune that I did not move more rapidly.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, thinking it possible that the previous occupant of the Chair may have ruled as he did on account of a suggestion of mine, I should like to repeat it to the Vice President.

We have been proceeding for the past week or two under a unanimous-consent agreement that we would consider the committee amendments first, and until the committee amendments have been disposed of no other Senator has been allowed to offer an amendment to the original bill. The matter just adopted, the Pomerene amendment, was to section 3, and it was the last of the committee amendments. Now, up to this time, no one has been permitted to offer an amendment to any part of the original bill save the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and it seems to me manifestly unfair that Members of the Senate should not be allowed at this time, after the committee amendments are disposed of, to offer amendments to the original text. After this committee amendment is disposed of, then, of course, the ordinary rule would obtain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire is not insisting, is he, that Members from the floor have not been offering amendments to the committee amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. They have; but in this case it was a motion to strike out and insert.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no; there was not any such thing as that.

Mr. HOLLIS. That was the ruling of still another occupant of the chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It could not be a motion to strike out and insert, because there was not anything in.

Mr. HOLLIS. There was pending the original committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; but it was nothing but a pending amendment. It was not the original bill; it was only an amendment offered to the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. The motion of the Senator from Ohio was to strike out of that amendment the original matter and insert new matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But there was not any original matter in the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. There was original matter in the amendment that was offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not in the bill. It was proposed by the committee to put it in the bill, but it was not in there.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Chair will pardon me, I did not say that it was in the bill; I said it was in the amendment. The Senator from Oregon offered a committee amendment as matter to be inserted in the bill in the shape of a new section. That was the matter before the Senate. It was an amendment. The Senator from Ohio moved to strike out the matter of the amendment and insert new matter in the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Hampshire inform the Chair how you can strike out something that is not in?

Mr. HOLLIS. Because we are talking about amendments and not about a bill. There was something in the amendment. It was moved to strike out what was in the amendment, and to substitute something else for it. The President pro tempore of the Senate ruled that the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio could not be amended, because that would be an amendment in the third degree; and that ruling became the ruling of the Senate for the purposes of this amendment, as I understood it. It seems to me manifestly unfair, amendments to the substitute offered by the Senator from Ohio having been refused, not to allow them to be offered at this time, because it is the first opportunity that there has been. Otherwise, Members have been precluded from perfecting matter that they offered.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair does not think they are precluded at all. The Chair would feel inclined to test the sentiment of the Senate upon the question if the Senator from Minnesota were losing any right that he has. He is not losing a right. It is simply being deferred until the bill gets into the Senate. If he had lost any right the Chair would be much inclined to coincide with the view of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The Chair does not believe that these rules ought to be so construed as to preclude any Senator from offering any amendment that he wants to offer to a bill; but this does not preclude him. It simply postpones him.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on the question of order, if I may say a single word, as I said some time before when it was up, an amendment was proposed by the committee. The Senator from Ohio moved an amendment in the nature of a substitute for that amendment. Now, if our Rule XVIII extends to a case of that sort and is not confined to the text of the bill, undoubtedly both the amendment from the committee and the proposed substitute could be treated as separate questions, and each would be open to perfecting amendments; but if our rule is not held to extend to the case of an amendment for which a substitute is offered, then it is clear that the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri was in the third degree.

But that does not in the least alter the next proposition, in my judgment. The next proposition, after the amendment in the nature of a substitute was adopted, was to amend the adopted amendment.

I venture to say, and I think inquiry will bear me out, that when a body has adopted a certain form of words as an amendment it is not possible to amend it at that stage—it can be amended afterwards—for the very simple reason that if an amendment has been adopted and is then open to indefinite amendment there is never an end. I see that it has been ruled otherwise, but not by the present occupant of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The present occupant of the chair is not going back to that ruling or express an opinion upon it.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But he expresses the opinion that, after having asked the Senate whether, without objection, it would agree to the amendment as amended, and there was no objection, the Chair announcing it was agreed to, the Senator from Minnesota is not deprived of his right to present his amendment, but he is postponed for the present.

Mr. NELSON. I rose as soon as I could to offer the amendment, but the Chair was too swift in declaring that the amendment was adopted. We should not have a lightning speed here. Senators must have a little breathing space in which to offer their amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Section 3 has been finally disposed of, has it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless there is an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to make a statement in regard to section 3? I understand the Chair holds that any amendment proposed to this section is ruled out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is amendable in the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am now giving notice to reserve it for amendment in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 1 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

That, by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and fuel, including kerosene and gasoline, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war the President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem advisable to carry out the provisions of this act. He is further authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, at an annual salary of $7,500 each, payable monthly, who shall constitute a board of food administration, and who shall perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. One of said commissioners shall be a farmer actually engaged at the time of his appointment in the cultivation of the soil. The President shall designate the chairman of said board. Said commissioners shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask whether that comes as a committee amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is not a committee amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator expect a vote on it right away?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Not if anyone wants to discuss it. If there is no discussion upon it, I would ask for a vote.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not desire to discuss that particular amendment, but I have already presented and had read an amendment. I yielded the floor that the other might be disposed of, with the expectation of going ahead with the amendment which I presented just before we disposed of the amendment known as section 3. If the Senator expects to get a vote on this amendment right away, I would rather yield and dispose of it, because I wish to have a vote upon the amendment which I propose to discuss for a few moments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not care to ask for a vote now. I would be glad to have the Senator go on with his proposed discussion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to section 8 of the present bill and its provisions. Section 8 provides:

That the President is authorized, from time to time, (a) to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, * * * and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor.

I assume that if the President makes a requisition on foods and feeds and fuels he will adopt some kind of a rule to determine what is a just compensation therefor, and before we make this measure a law we ought to understand thoroughly just what power we are giving to the President and how that power will be exercised. The President may have one idea of what constitutes just compensation when it applies to the purchase of coal, and he may have a different idea and a different rule to be applied when he makes a requisition for grain and desires to pay just compensation therefor. I want the same rule to apply in both cases and in all cases. I have therefore offered an amendment to secure that result.

Mr. President, the amendment which I have offered will follow the word "therefor," on page 10, line 22, of the bill as reported on June 27. This amendment is as follows—and I really want the attention of Senators to the proposition:

In determining the compensation to be paid for farm products all labor employed in producing the same, whether furnished by the farmer or members of his family, including the necessary domestic service, shall be computed and allowed for at the same rate of wages paid for like labor, or labor requiring a like degree of intelligence and arduous efforts, in other lines of business or trade; and in addition thereto there shall be allowed as a charge in the cost of production a reasonable rate of interest upon the capital invested in both real and personal estate and a further reasonable charge for deterioration and upkeep. There shall also be taken into consideration the increased cost to the farmer of all necessary farm equipment, food and clothing required, and other advanced cost in the ordinary necessaries of life.

Mr. President, before proceeding to the merits of this amendment I wish to say just one word in reference to the bill itself. I have heretofore taken no part whatever in the discussion of the bill.

Only a short time ago the Senate, after a very long and strong debate, lasting for weeks, passed a bill providing against the hoarding of foods, feeds, and fuels, or other articles necessary for the support of the Army and the Navy. We prohibited any undue or improper speculation in any of those products. We further provided a penalty for any act done in the handling, in the storing, in the selling, or in the distribution of any of those products which would unduly and improperly enhance their value.

This comprehensive measure did very much for the assurance of an adequate supply of the necessities at reasonable figures. That was the first act passed by the Senate. Then, for the purpose of assuring prompt transportation of food and other products necessary for the support of the Army and Navy, there was passed in the Senate, which, I believe, is now a law, a bill empowering the President to authorize and direct that preference be given in the matter of shipments of one article over another. The purpose of that law was to assure that the people should have the necessaries of life promptly and in adequate quantity where it was needed. If it was necessary that wheat should be given a preference in shipment over pianos the President had a right to direct such preference. Goods offered for shipment must give way to those articles deemed more necessary in the prosecution of the war and for the support of the people of the United States.

Nor did we stop there, Mr. President. For the purpose of further conservation we authorized the President of the United States to lay an embargo against the exportation of feeds, foods, and fuels, or any other article necessary for the prosecution of the war, to any other than those countries engaged with us in the war against the great central powers.

It would seem to me that when we passed these three bills we had practically done all that was necessary, but I admit that there is one further thing that ought to be done, and that is to grant the authority to commandeer any of these necessary products at a reasonable compensation to be used either for the support of the Army or the Navy if necessary. And after commandeering them, if we find we do not need them, that they might be disposed of for the benefit of the public. The right to commandeer, of course, must be based solely upon the necessities of war. Now, it is evident that the Senate and House are not at all satisfied with the powers already conferred, or with this additional power of commandeering for the benefit of the Army and Navy and for war purposes, and it is desired to give the President extensive powers in dealing with many of the commodities which enter into our daily life. I do not believe myself that all these powers are necessary, but I am inclined to vote for the bill. I shall vote for it, however, with the conviction that while we give broad and sweeping powers, neither the President of the United States nor any commission or committee will ever attempt to exercise all of the powers given in the bill. I am satisfied of that, because I know that no one man nor any thousand men could operate in an orderly way and without conflict of all the business of the United States, that is now performed by 100,000,000 people, and I assume naturally that no one will ever attempt such a colossal task.

I believe, however, that it is proper, if not necessary, to clothe the Executive with authority that will enable him in an emergency to seize upon any product in the United States necessary for the conduct of the war, or to even go beyond that and seize upon the source of production for the purpose of hurrying the process of production of things which may be necessary before we get through with this calamitous conflict. So I shall vote for some provision of this kind.

I believe that most of the purposes, the intendments, in the bill will be brought about through the power of persuasion rather than through the power of law, but I am willing to grant the law lest I may leave the Executive, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, in a position where he will not be able to use the entire power of this great Nation and all of its resources in the prosecution of this war.

Under section 8 the President is authorized from time to time to requisition food, feeds, and fuels necessary for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor. Now, how will he proceed in case he makes a requisition upon our coal fields, or upon the products of those fields, to determine what is a just compensation? What will be his first act? It will be this: He will first determine what is paid out in labor wages per ton to bring that coal to the surface. That is the first thing to be considered. He will then take into consideration the cost of transporting that coal to any given point. He will not attempt to interfere with the scale of wages adopted by the miners' unions or fixed upon by agreement between the operators and their employees.

The third thing that he will do will be to ascertain all other overhead charges, and after he has ascertained all of these they will be entered as charges against the cost of production. Nor will he stop there. He will make allowance for the deterioration in the machinery that is used. He will then make an allowance for all interest paid on borrowed money used in operating the mines. Finally he will ascertain the amount invested in that busines and after making allowance for all these expenses he will allow a reasonable return upon the investment.

Mr. President, that is what he would do in case he was commandeering any quantity of coal for the benefit of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What is there in the bill which the Senator seeks to amend—that is, the particular section sought to be amended—with reference to just compensation that the Senator's amendment is intended to cover? In other words, in ascertaining what is just compensation under the section the Senator seeks to amend what is there that he would include that is not included in the original section?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would fix the rule to determine that just compensation so that the rule applied in determining a just compensation in the matter of one article would be applied in the matter of compensation for another article.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Would not the same rule be applied in ascertaining what is just compensation?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; it would not; and I will in a very short time show the Senator why it would not.

Mr. President, I propose to assure by this amendment that the same rule which shall be applied by the commission or anyone authorized by the President of the United States to act for him shall be the rule that will be applied in the requisition of steel or coal or copper or any other article that is mentioned in the bill.

If I felt, as the Senator seems to feel, that that rule would be applied in the one case as in the other there would be no reason for this amendment, as I am certain that the rule which I have mentioned will be applied in all of these other cases. Why not in the case of foods? It is because the consumers in the large cities have for a hundred years and more received a compensation and have had applied to them a rule to measure the value of their products so different from that compensation and that rule which have been applied to the producers of cereals and other farm products that they would not be willing to adopt a rule that would equalize the compensation or conditions of both classes. The pressure would be so great against such a rule that we never could get it applied, unless we put it in the law. If we shall put that in the law, you can throw to the winds all of your provisions relative to a minimum price. The farmer will not ask for any. All he will ask for, Mr. President, will be just and fair treatment, exactly the same that you would give to any other line of business. He will be satisfied with a reasonable profit upon his investment and a reasonable wage scale for himself and family.

I am putting it up to you, Senators, who have been talking in favor of the farming interests of this country so long, not only throughout all the years that I have been here, but with redoubled vigor in the discussion of the provisions of this bill. I have not failed to note your tones of pathos nor the briny tears that you have shed in discoursing upon his rights; but I have been a little skeptical as to whether when you were brought right up to the point of decision you would be willing to make your sentiments effective and give the American farmer all that he has ever asked, and all that he has ever been entitled to—just compensation for the labor he employs and for the capital he uses in producing the things which you purchase from him.

Mr. President, I want the Congress of the United States, which represents all of the people, to make a rule that will be fair and adequate as a rule of compensation in fixing the price of anything that the Government may see fit to requisition during the progress of this war.

Every other business in the United States is operated and run upon the theory that that business shall pay, first, all the labor employed; that it shall pay, second, all salaried officers' wages; that it shall pay, third, all overhead charges and insurance and taxes; that it shall pay reasonable allowance for depreciation; and, finally, that, after you have charged all of those things against the gross receipts, that it shall pay reasonable returns upon the investment. Are you willing to apply that rule to the farmers' products in case it is necessary to commandeer any portion of them, or in case it is necessary to fix a minimum upon them?

Mr. President, if any man in my State were to operate a farm entirely with hired labor, he could not afford to farm less than one section, or 640 acres of cultivated land. I will place the average price of that land in the State of North Dakota at $50 an acre. That will require an investment of $32,000 for land alone. In addition to that, there would be an investment in the ordinary farm equipment that is used on a farm of that size of about $8,000 in value. Therefore, the entire investment in farm and farm equipment would be about $40,000.

Mr. President, it requires a man of more than mere ordinary ability and intelligence to successfully operate a farm of that size and with that much invested capital in a manner that will bring in a return upon the investment. You can not pick up your ordinary laborer, to whom you are paying from $3 to $3.50 a day, place him upon such a farm and expect him to make a success of it. He would fail the very first year. Therefore, I say it requires a man of more than ordinary intelligence, and just as much intelligence and more of the elements of economy in his make-up than it would require to run the ordinary mercantile or other business with a capital, say, of $40,000. My position, therefore, is that such a farmer should receive a compensation as great as you would pay to anyone you would employ to take charge of a business in which you would have to invest a capital of $40,000.

Mr. President, you can not operate a farm without cooks and other domestic help. You have got to have your female employees. What difference, then, should it make whether the farmer employs his own wife to do the cooking upon that farm or whether he employs some one else? What difference should it make whether the labor in waiting upon the table and in taking care of the ordinary household affairs is performed by the farmer's grown-up daughter or whether he hires that help? Both are worthy their hire. I want to be certain that in fixing your "just compensation" you allow for that service.

Let me put the proposition up to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who yesterday thought that if we allowed the laborer the same wage upon the farm as is allowed in the cities for work on the streets, wheat would be worth $5 a bushel. Let me ask the Senator, Is he a housekeeper in the city of Washington? If he is, he probably has a cook and a waiting girl as well. If he hires white help, he probably pays them each from thirty to forty dollars a month; and if he hires colored help, he pays certainly not less than from $20 to $25 a month. You have got to hire a cook for your ordinary domestic service in the cities, with Wednesday afternoon off or Sunday afternoon off, and you pay, we will say, that cook $25 a month. That means $300 a year. Can you get any cook for $25 a month who will measure up in capacity and ability to do good cooking with the ordinary housewife upon the farm? If you are paying $25 a month, then, for your cook, should you balk at paying the farmer for his product a compensation that will allow him to turn over to his good wife, who labors 15 to 18 hours a day upon the farm, the equivalent of $25 a month?

If you are paying $20 or $25 a month for your chambermaid, would you object to paying $20 a month to a good North Dakota white girl out on a farm, who is up at 5 o'clock in the morning and never thinks of retiring before 10 o'clock at night? Would that be an excessive charge? Would I be asking too much if I asked the Senate to fix a compensation for the product of that labor equivalent to the compensation which is paid to the cheapest labor in the entire United States? If you wish to be fair, if you really wish to do justice to the farmer, then stand with me for an amendment that will give him this justice. It may be said, "Why, the wife gets her board." Yes; and so does your cook. It may be said, "The daughter gets her board." Yes; and so does your chambermaid get board and lodging. Just treat our North Dakota good girls as fairly as you would the colored waiter; treat the North Dakota farmer's wife with the same consideration that you treat the colored woman who does your cooking here in the city. That is all the farmer is asking of you.

The trouble lies in the fact, Mr. President, that you of the cities have so long enjoyed a preference and an advantage in wages and in everything that tends to the sum total of human happiness that you are struck with horror when there is presented to you a proposition that you shall treat the people from whom you purchase your food with the same consideration as you yourselves ask to be treated.

Mr. President, if the boy stays upon the farm, instead of going to the town, where he can get from five to six dollars a day; if he gets up at 5 o'clock in the morning, takes care of the stock before breakfast, then works until 8 o'clock at night, and then takes care of the stock again in the evening before he retires, do you not think that that boy ought to be encouraged by allowing a compensation for the things he produces which will yield him from two dollars to two dollars and a half a day? If that boy must go to town and hire a laborer to assist him and pay that laborer from $3 to $4 a day to work 8 hours do you not really think that he is entitled to more than 20 cents a day for his own work of 16 hours a day? That is the question involved in my amendment.

All we ask is that you treat the farmer and the farmer's business exactly the same as you treat the merchant and the merchant's business and the banker and the banker's business. If the merchant employs his son in his store, he pays him the usual wages, and they are charged against the operation of that business. If his daughter is employed as bookkeeper or clerk, he pays to her the ordinary wages, and charges them up against the business. That is fair; it is exactly what ought to be done. He is allowed to make a return upon his investment after paying those wages. Am I asking too much if I ask that the farmer conducting his business be allowed exactly the same charges against his receipts and his gross profits as are allowed in the other lines of business?

What I want is a condition under which one hour of labor upon the farm will purchase just as much of the things necessary for human comfort and happiness as one hour's labor performed upon the streets of the city. We can never have equal justice between the different trades and professions until the amount of human energy expended in one business will purchase as much as the same amount of human energy expended in any other line of business. Is there anything unfair in that proposition? If the ordinary laborer working eight hours a day at 50 cents an hour can purchase by an hour's labor 10 loaves of bread, then do you not think that the farmer is entitled to receive for his services in producing the flour that went into that bread as much as the ordinary laborer receives? That is exactly what this rule will mean if it will be accepted and applied.

Now, Mr. President, we have an anomalous situation. Here is the farmer complaining because he does not receive for his labor a compensation equivalent to what he is paying for the things he purchases. On the other hand we have the ultimate consumer complaining that the price of his foods are exorbitant, and he cries for relief.

How are you going to solve this difficulty? Is the complaint of the farmer well founded? You say he is right. You say he is not receiving any too much for what he produces even at its present high price. You also say that the laborers are not receiving any more than they should for their labor. Now, some one is at fault for this high cost of living. Who is it?

You are cautious in arriving at your conclusion. You say, "It is not the farmer's fault. We can not blame him. We can not pass any legislation that would cut down what he receives." He has too many votes. Then you turn around to the laborer and you say, "It is not his fault"; and to the ultimate consumer and you say, "It is not his fault. We can not blame him." He has quite a few votes, also. Then you say to the retailer, "Why, it is not your fault. You are not receiving any more than you ought to, and therefore we will exclude you from the operation of any of these restrictive laws." Finally you light upon the middleman, the cold-storage man, and the wholesaler. He is the fewest in number, and therefore all of the evil is laid upon his shoulders.

Now, Mr. President, you know and I know that that is not wholly true. Undoubtedly these middlemen of whom you complain so much should bear their fair share of the blame for the present high cost of living, but they are not wholly at fault by any means. What, then, is the trouble? Where is the initial cause of all of this disturbance and this dissatisfaction?

Mr. President, it is not hard to find if we will only be courageous enough to look for it. It lies in the maladjustment of the earning capacity of the several classes of American citizens—a maladjustment that has been brought about by combination with a constant pressure shoving up certain salaries and wages higher and higher and higher, month by month and year by year, without any corresponding increase in the earning capacity of other classes.

There are two things that are vitally necessary for the American people. One is houses to live in; the other is buildings in which to do business. Both of those are essential; and while those should be the cheapest things in the United States, by reason of this maladjustment in scales of wages and hours of labor they are the most costly and expensive things in the world.

Mr. President, out of all just or reasonable proportion to all other wages and earnings are the enormous wages of those engaged in the several building trades. The boy who has been educated here in your high school, and who has obtained a trained and an expert mind, fit for almost any line of business, will go searching over the country to get a position in the line of his education which will pay him to start with from $40 to $50 a month. The boy who has taken no time whatever for an education, and takes the time that this other one gives to his high school or his college and enters into the building trade, in a few months is commanding from $5 to $8 a day. While one is struggling to find a position at $40 a month, or $1.25 a day, the other is organizing strikes to raise his wages from $4 to $4.50 per day schedule to $5 and $6 a day.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that very interesting analysis, will he permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. What does the Senator think of the overorganization of skilled labor where, for instance, in a painters' union, when a painter comes to my house, one is forbidden to paint wooden surfaces because he is a painter only of metal surfaces, and therefore another one has to come after he gets through? I give that as an illustration. It has actually happened a number of times; and that same degree of overorganization and overtraining extends to a great number of trades.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; with the result which I have stated, that it has added so enormously to the cost of your home, so enormously to the cost of every building in which business is being done in the United States that it has made them cost from three to three and a half times what the same homes and the same buildings cost 20 years ago. Never were rents so high as they are to-day; and inasmuch as in the ordinary line of business the business man must turn over his capital every month to pay the rent alone, an equivalent of 1,200 per cent a year just to take care of the rent in the ordinary, average small businesses in the United States, is it any wonder that the retail price of everything has gone up by leaps and bounds, driven up by the higher cost of rentals? Is it any wonder, then, that the clerk who is receiving from forty to sixty dollars a month finds living extremely high, when he must buy everything that is purchased out of buildings constructed by other labor that runs from five to ten dollars per day? The high cost of our living is not at all surprising.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. In connection with what the Senator from Illinois has said, I do not want the Senate to understand that the farmer is not confronted with the same condition mentioned by the Senator from Illinois. In substantiation of what he has said, I know from personal experience that the so-called organized labor, when they perform work upon the farm, will refuse, for instance, to set up corn shocks. They will drive the binders, but they will refuse to drive seven horses pulling a triple plow. You may be able to induce them to drive four or five, but they will not drive seven or eight, as we have to do in my country. Now, that adds a further expense, and it makes the farm products cost the farmer more, just as well as it adds to the expense in the cities, as the Senator says.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes, Mr. President; and I want to tell my colleague why we suffer more than he indicates by his remark. There has been a battle going on for 20 years between capital and labor in the manufacturing and in the building trades. Labor strikes for higher wages. Capital battles for a while and gives in and raises the wages. Then capital has to get a return upon its investment and raises the price of its products. It charges more back to the labor for the same thing that the labor produces. Then labor strikes again, because of the higher cost of living, and his wages go up, and then capital charges just so much more to get a return upon the investment, and then labor strikes again for more wages to pay for the higher-priced commodities which he must purchase. And so this everlasting jackscrew process goes round and round and round and pushes the prices of manufactured products higher and higher and higher, while the farmer and those who are not engaged in unionized labor, the farmer and the clerk, must still go on doing business and selling products at the same old rates, while buying back on this higher wage-scale basis.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. What is the average annual wage of the manual laborer of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. In that which pertains to the building trades, the line of work I am discussing, it will run from $5 to $8 a day now for a so-called eight hours a day, with very leisurely labor.

Mr. BORAH. The average annual wage of some 85 per cent of the working men of the United States is about $900 a year, according to the statistics.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, that is $3 a day.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; that is $3 a day.

Mr. McCUMBER. The average wage of the farmer is 20 cents per day.

Mr. BORAH. But what does the Senator say as to the ability of a man to maintain himself and his family and educate them on $900 a year at the present high cost of living?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am just explaining that. I say that those receiving the smaller wages and those with fixed, small salaries, suffer the result of this maladjustment of earning capacity; nor do those who secure the higher wages get the entire benefit of the higher wages, because after running up their wages to $8 and $10 a day they make the cost of everything that they produce cost just so much more to each other. While, of course, they get some benefit, they do not get the entire difference between the lower wage scale and the excessively high wage scale.

Mr. President, I have stated that these laborers themselves do not reap the full benefit of the higher wages that are paid them, and I am referring now to the building trades generally, because therein lies the greater trouble that is at the bottom of the higher charges for everything that is handled and sold at wholesale or retail in our great cities. Those are the things that are charged up finally to the ultimate consumer. And that is not all. These excessively high wages—and I am speaking of them as excessively high simply in comparison with other wages—have resulted in stopping the normal development along very many lines. Many people would like to build homes but they can not pay $6 and $8 a day for the labor which must be employed. They can not afford to pay that much to build a home. Therefore there is no home built. I can find plenty of people right here in this city whose homes need replastering. They can not pay $6 and $7 a day to do it. Their homes need repapering. They can not afford to pay those onerous charges. Men who are earning $60 a month or $80 a month can not afford to pay from $5 to $8 a day for the work around their homes, and therefore the work is not done. Were these things equalized there would be a greater demand for all kinds of labor, and that of itself would equalize to a considerable extent the maladjustment, as I have expressed it, in wages between the several classes.

I have stated before that an estimate made in 1912 by the Agricultural Department showed that the farmer that year, including his wife and grown-up sons and daughters upon the farm, earned a net compensation of about 20 cents a day. That was his net earning. Now you are asking these people to produce wheat cheaper in order that others that are earning $5 and $6 a day may not have to pay so much for their bread. Have you ever stopped to think that your bread bill is the lowest bill you have in the United States?

Have you ever stopped to consider that the average American citizen consumes one barrel of flour, or about 196 pounds of flour, a year, and that even if it were $15 a barrel the entire cost of the staff of life per individual per annum would be but $15? Do you know of anything else on the face of the earth as valuable as flour that can be purchased so cheaply?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that it will be most gratifying information to everybody when I state that I noticed this morning on a grocery bill that since certain indictments have been returned in Washington my loaf of bread has been reduced from 15 cents to 10 cents. That is the only evidence I have seen of governmental power in the District of Columbia since I have been in Washington.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, if people would do their own cooking, a loaf of bread would not cost them very much. You spend in this city ten times as much for your nickel and 10-cent shows as you do for bread. Before you begin to shriek about the high cost of bread, had you not better cut out a few of those things? You pay twice as much for cigars as you do for your bread. Before you begin to complain about that, had you not better cut out at least one cigar a day, and give the farmer an honest compensation for his wheat?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota further yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will yield, of course he does not make any personal allusion in looking at me.

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because I always have to look at a man to understand what he is saying. I do not smoke myself, but I would be willing to reform on anything else. Why should not the dwellers in cities cut out ice cream? I wish to inquire of the Senator what effect that would have. There is more spent for ice cream, in my judgment, by every dweller in the city than there is for bread. Talk about luxuries! Bread may be a necessity—I think it is—but the material used in making ice cream can be used for something else, and it would go much further for drinking or in the form of cheese than it will in ice cream.

Mr. McCUMBER. Your soda water, the soda-fountain products, ice cream, and confectionery that are sold with it amount to more than the American people pay for their flour.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every day?

Mr. McCUMBER. Every day to double the amount they pay for their potatoes. Yet we are declining to take any steps at economy in these lines.

Mr. President, there are good, kindly ladies in this city who will pay $5 to hear some lady sing—who, by the way sings for 50 cents in her own country—will pay $5 for a sent in a theater and then complain because buttermilk is 5 cents a glass. Do you not think you had better start your reform right where it belongs? If you or any of those people who are complaining against the farmer's prices for his products will live on what he and every member of his family live on, you can still pay as much as you are paying to-day for any farm products and grow rich each year.

The trouble is, Mr. President, that we can not deny ourselves any of these luxuries. We can not deny ourselves the luxury of travel. I am speaking of those whose earnings are excessively high when compared with the farmer's earnings. I know there are many in these cities who are underpaid. There are department stores, where poor girls are working at from four to six dollars a week, a shamefully low wage, but I must admit they are not quite as economical as they might be. If one would go into your theaters or into your picture shows, he would find all of them loaded to the limit with these same people. New York is complaining about what people have to pay for farm products, and yet you can not get a seat in a theater in New York unless you engage it a week or two ahead, so I am informed; I do not go myself.

Mr. President, I am asking the Senate when the proper time comes to vote upon this bill that it shall simply apply to the product of the farmer the common rule which you apply in fixing the price of every article which you will commandeer. The committee, I believe, has agreed upon another provision, and that provision is a minimum wage. It is unfair in every respect; it is bound to be unfair. One dollar and seventy-five cents a bushel for such a crop as we raised in 1915 might be unjust to the consuming public.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. If we raise what we raised in the year 1916, $1.75 a bushel is not sufficient to pay the farmer. But why can you not adopt a system such as I have suggested, and just say to the farmer, "If you will put your land into wheat, we will allow you a compensation that will take care of your labor at reasonable rates, all the labor, that will pay your borrowed money interest for running the farm, and will then give you a reasonable return for the money you have invested in your business."

Why would the farmer rather have this? Because heretofore he has never received any wages. As my colleague has told you, he works for his board and very cheap clothing. His wife and his daughter and his son work on the farm the year round for what little clothing they have, and there are no evening dresses to pay for, and nothing else do they receive. Now, just assure him honest pay for his labor and 6 per cent upon his investment in land and equipment, and he will be satisfied. Then if he raises only a half crop, of course, he will receive a better price per bushel; if he raises a very large crop, he will not receive as much per bushel; but he will receive justice in both instances, and that is all he is after. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. If my colleague will permit me, I wish to correct him. I understood his statement to be to the effect that the committee has agreed upon a minimum price. I wish to say for the information of my colleague that the committee has not agreed upon any minimum price.

Mr. McCUMBER. An amendment was brought in in which it was proposed, and I supposed it was a committee amendment. I know it is printed.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think it was even submitted to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to hear that. I simply want to say that there is another objection to this price. Where are you going to locate it? What point will you fix for determining your price? What kind of grain will you apply it to? There are eight different kinds of wheat according to the section in which it is raised, with many subdivisions of the same species. One kind is not worth as much for flour as another. One farmer may have to ship from eastern Montana to Minneapolis, another may have to ship only from a little point out of Minneapolis to the mills there; so no price that you could fix would even approximate equal justice.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask in lieu of any attempt to fix a minimum price that we shall simply provide that we will treat the farmer the same as we will treat the coal operator. If you will do that, he will be satisfied and the rest of the people ought to be satisfied.

Mr. GRONNA. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

Mr. BECKHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. May I have the privilege of asking my colleague a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota took his sent and the Chair recognized the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. GRONNA. I was standing here, desiring to interrupt my colleague.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair knows the Senator was standing, but the Senator from North Dakota, who had occupied the floor, had taken his seat.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GRONNA. No, Mr. President; I shall try to get recognition in my own time.

Mr. WEEKS. Will the Senator from Kentucky permit me to offer an amendment, to be printed and lie on the table?

Mr. BECKHAM. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer an amendment, and ask that it be printed and lie on the table, and also that it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. WEEKS's amendment is to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of five Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and two Republicans, and five Members of the House of Representatives, including three Democrats and two Republicans, to be known as the joint committee on the conduct of the war. The membership of such committee shall be designated by the respective committees of the Senate and House which select the members of the regular standing committees. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress; shall make a special study of the problems arising out of the war, including safeguarding expenditures; shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war; and shall make report to Congress from time to time, in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress. Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary; and, to pay the necessary expenses of such committee, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50 000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I have been unwilling to increase the delay in final action upon this bill by a discussion of it, and I shall not now take up much time of the Senate in doing so.

It is one that calls for prompt and speedy action, and I fear the debate upon it has already been too prolonged and that much good has already been lost by our failure to enact into law long before this the substantial features of the measure. For nearly five weeks it has been discussed upon the floor of the Senate, and it has attracted the serious and solicitous attention of the press and the people of the country. It is a war measure of the first importance, involving the discussion of fundamental principles of government and proposing legislation of an experimental and far-reaching character. Its provisions have been fully discussed upon this floor, and I believe that the country demands the earliest possible passage of the food-control bill.

It has been evident for some time that a majority of the Senators were in favor of the enactment into law of the essential features of the bill and accomplishing all possible relief by legislation from the evils at which it is aimed. I do not criticize those Senators who oppose the measure in whole or in part for the time that they have consumed in its discussion, and I do not exaggerate when I say that the greater part of the time in this debate has been consumed by those who oppose it. Its friends have desired and sought as early a vote upon it as possible, believing that time was an essential point in whatever good may be accomplished by such a law. But it is gratifying now, Mr. President, to see the prospect of an early final settlement of the matter by Congress and that by some compromises and adjustments a reasonably satisfactory law may be passed.

We shall confer great and unusual powers upon the Government by its provisions, the grant of which can be justified only upon the grounds of the extraordinary conditions existing at present in this country and throughout the world. Opponents of the bill have argued, in some instances with much ability, against conferring such unusual powers upon the Government, and argue that the Constitution of the country was being stretched, if not violated, by some of the provisions. I do not concede that their loyalty and reverence for the Constitution is greater than that of the supporters of the bill, nor do I believe that there is any provision in the Constitution that can be properly invoked to circumscribe the power of Congress and of the Government in the exercise of every authority and agency to protect the national safety and the rights and welfare of our people in times of war. It was never the intention or the purpose of the framers of our organic law to place any ironclad restrictions upon our Government in exerting to the fullest extent the power and resources of the country in meeting a national peril and in its manifest duty of protecting our land from a foreign foe.

In this European war, to which we have become honorably and inevitably a party, the food question, and I might add to it the fuel question also, has proven to be one of the biggest problems. It is of equal importance to the problem of munitions, to the raising and equipping of armies and navies. It has been shown that it is just as important to intelligently conserve and distribute our food and fuel resources as it is that our armies upon the fields of battle or our ships upon the seas should be skillfully and successfully directed.

This country has, as one of its most serious and important duties in this great struggle for civilization and liberty, to provide not only sufficient food for our own people but in a large measure to meet the necessities of our allies in that respect. We must, as far as possible, correct the waste and extravagance of food supplies which have so long prevailed among our people, and we must do our best to supply the needs of those brave and gallant peoples who are struggling across the Atlantic to beat back and overthrow the barbarous and ruthless hordes of German autocracy which threaten the liberty and the civilization of the world.

The President of the United States, with his usual wisdom and farsighted statesmanship, has seen for a long while the importance of this matter and has earnestly and energetically urged Congress to clothe him with the necessary authority of law and with these enlarged powers not for his own aggrandizement but that he might the more effectively and speedily use the resources of the country in bringing this atrocious war to an early and successful termination.

It is no time to delay action by elaborate and technical discussions of constitutional limitations. The Constitution of the United States has not in either House of Congress a more reverent or conscientious or patriotic supporter than Woodrow Wilson. No lust of power, no dazzling light of glory, has tempted him away from his early and devoted regard for that great instrument of our Government and of our freedom. He seeks this additional power for the good of our people, for the safety of our Republic, and for the success of the sacred cause for which this country with its allies is now fighting.

In times of war we have to trust our President even more than we do in times of peace. We must give him greater power and broader discretion than we would think of giving him when the country was at peace. I do not believe that any man who has been elevated to that high position since the beginning of our Government has ever abused the extraordinary powers incident to his office in time of war, and there is not one in the long list of our eminent Presidents upon whom I would not cheerfully vote to place such powers in times of our country's danger. I do not believe that either of the great parties has ever placed in that office a man, or has ever nominated a man for it, who would abuse such power. If the occupant of the White House was a member of a different party to the one to which I belong, I would support him, and just as cordially and heartily in times like these, as I do the distinguished and able statesman who now holds that exalted position. It has been one of the gratifying experiences in American politics to observe upon the floor of the Senate since this country entered into the war the almost total absence of partisanship, and the occasions have been rare, indeed, where the usual political lines seemed to be drawn.

I believe that in time of war we should not hesitate to clothe the President with ample powers for its successful conduct. Congress does not in doing so surrender permanently, if at all, any of its constitutional privileges and prerogatives. It is in almost constant session; it holds the purse strings of the Government; it alone can raise taxes and provide revenues; and it has power by impeachment to remove from office any official who betrays or misuses his trust.

The President has already selected as the head of this food-control organization Mr. Herbert C. Hoover. That gentleman has been the object of the severest criticism and of attacks even in the Senate. Personally I am not acquainted with him, nor did I ever hear of him until his distinguished and remarkable services in the relief work among the Belgian people gave him an international reputation. I have no doubt, notwithstanding the criticism of him, that the President has acted wisely in selecting him, and that he will prove in every way a most capable and competent man in the great work which he has undertaken, and which is intended by the provisions of this bill. If he should prove unfaithful or incompetent, the President, I am sure, would not hesitate to promptly remove him and put some one else in his place.

But, Mr. President, there is another element in this question which I wish to briefly discuss. It is, of course, a fact well known to all of us that in times of war the prices of necessities and commodities increase, and it is natural that there should be some increase. The reasons for such increases are so well known that it is needless for me to mention them. It is also a fact that in times of war these increases in prices are frequently even greater than are justified by any war conditions. It is a time when food speculators and speculators in every commodity seize the opportunity to enrich themselves at the expense of the consumers and increase prices beyond all reason. That has been especially true in this country.

I believe it to be a fact that never before in the history of this country have our people been robbed and pillaged by food pirates, by gamblers and speculators in all kinds of necessities and commodities, as much as they have been in the last year. We have seen the prices of commodities, and especially of those things most necessary in the lives of our people, go to the highest point ever known, and in most instances sold over here at much higher rates than they have been sold even in the European countries that have been at war for now almost three years. The slightest pretext has been seized upon, the flimsiest excuses have been invented, to justify these increases, and yet the fact stands out beyond question that all this has been done, and is being done, because there is no power in the Government sufficiently effective to protect the people against these extortions.

Food prices have been unreasonably raised to such points that many of our poorer people are threatened with starvation, even in sight of plenty, and fuel prices have mounted so high, even in sight of inexhaustible mines and supplies, that a serious problem confronts the country when the winter comes if nothing is done to give relief. These great increases can not be justified upon any theory of the law of supply and demand. They are due largely to the avarice and greed of men and combinations of men who have had it in their power to control these supplies and to extort these ruinous and inexcusable prices. This great Government has had to stand by, limp, feeble, and helpless, while this gigantic scheme of plunder has been worked upon the people of this country.

It is not surprising, therefore, Mr. President, that much impatience and restlessness are manifested among the great majority of the people of this country at the delay of Congress in providing some relief. They have not been as much interested as some of us may think in the very able and fine-spun discussions upon the Constitution, upon the relative powers of Congress and of the President; nor have they been alarmed by any fear that we might confer too great powers upon the President and the Government.

If a burglar enters a house to ply his trade, the master of that house is not going to lose any time in listening to any discussions, however able or however eloquent, as to the ownership of a gun or weapon within his reach, but he will promptly seize the first and best weapon he can get to overcome the burglar and drive him from his house. The parallel is not overdrawn, because if there ever was a time when our people were being robbed and when burglars were in their homes that time is now and has been for many months.

There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. President, that the vast majority of the people of this country are ready and anxious to trust to the fullest extent the President of the United States in using whatever powers may be conferred upon him for their good and welfare and for the protection of our country in the critical conditions in which it is now placed.

I have the utmost confidence in the discretion, the ability, and the patriotism of the President, and I shall not hesitate to give my vote upon this or any other measure during this war to clothe the President with every reasonable power to uphold the dignity and honor of our country and to use the mighty arm of this great Nation in striking down the arrogant foe that would not only establish its imperial dominion over all Europe, but would extend, if possible, its hated power to the shores of our own land.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of asking the indulgence of the Senate for a little while in discussing the merits of the pending bill and the arguments which have been made against it during the past five weeks. Before entering upon the discussion of that, however, I want to reply, as briefly as I can, to some of the statements which have been made this afternoon and during the past few days in regard to purchasing supplies for the Government.

I am very glad that the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] was adopted, and that the powers granted under this bill to the various boards do not permit or in any way relax the rigid rule which forbids men in public service to purchase commodities from themselves. I think the discussion has been very helpful, and I am sure that the gentlemen who are placed in a very delicate position as regards commodities that they sell will not be surprised or offended if a jealous supervision and a watchful eye is kept over all the proceedings with which they are connected both as public officers and as private individuals. It in nowise imputes to them bad faith, and it is the duty of the Senate to see to it that the highest and loftiest sense of honor on the one hand and vigilance and jealousy on the other go hand in hand between the two interested parties in these transactions.

I heard the statement of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] in regard to shoe contracts, and I merely want to take occasion to observe that it seems to me that in the letting of any contract in which any member of the advisory board or any subcommittee is involved the utmost care should be taken that when one in the public service deals either directly or indirectly with the Government in the way of selling that which is his own he should observe the strictest punctiliousness and stand so straight as to lean backward rather than forward.

When, as it appears in this case, any gentleman connected with a large war order is put in a position where for certain reasons he is justified, or his firm is justified, in exacting a higher selling price from the Government, I believe the burden is on him to show that he is so justified; and that he should anticipate any criticism by a frank, full statement as to why he charged more for the commodity, with the selling of which he was connected, than those who underbid him. I think that should be the case in all selling contracts; and because of the peculiar situation in which the Government finds itself, it seems to me that this ought to be handled with the greatest carefulness, so that ugly and sinister rumors and accusations will not creep in to an otherwise already complicated situation; and so that men intrusted with certain public duties will not invite or even furnish the slightest basis for criticism or suspicion which will reflect on the men themselves or give cause to bring themselves into disrepute; and further that they will not place a weapon in the hands of anyone to bring the Government into disrepute or impair the public faith and confidence.

But, Mr. President, I do not understand that any of these gentlemen are making contracts. I have it from high authority that the mode of selling goods to the Government is very much like this: On July 3, in the RECORD, a list of the Council of National Defense is given, which is composed of Cabinet officers. Then the advisory board, headed by Mr. Daniel Willard, is a body of men appointed to advise the Government, but not to make contracts. In turn, subcommittees are appointed, and you will find in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 3 the names of the men who have been selected, who are supposedly possessed of the highest degree of technical knowledge and experience concerning the subject matter with respect to which they are going to advise. Of course, in selecting these experts it seemed to be necessary to find men who knew something in a practical way of the subject matter with respect to which they are to advise, because per necessity it seemed that men had to be taken who were in the business, because it was thought difficult, if not impossible, to have gotten anybody in any other way with the practical knowledge required of an adviser.

Right here I want to say something about the inconsistencies, or which appear to me to be inconsistencies, which have appeared in this debate. The attacks that have been made upon this board have been because of their connection with the business of the country. They are criticized and attacked very severely for that. In the case of Mr. Hoover, he is attacked, on the other hand, because it is said he has not any business here at all. So it would be very difficult to satisfy the objections of Senators who, on the one hand, criticize boards and officials because they are interested in the matter and have substantial interests in the country, and then, on the other hand, condemn men because they have no business interests in the country whatever.

To refer again to these advisory boards, these gentlemen are there in an advisory capacity. I understand that the way the contracts are made is that a proposed purchase is first laid before a subcommittee composed of men all of whom are familiar with the particular line of business. They agree among themselves as to the value of the product. They can not fool one another, as each member of the committee knows just as much about it as the other. When they have finally agreed upon a price the matter is taken up by the higher advisory board, and the advisory board then goes over it. The advisory board has nothing to do with the particular commodity or business. Perhaps one or two of the members have, but the great majority of them are men outside of the particular line of industry. They, in turn, after they have agreed on the terms, take it up with the Council of National Defense, namely, the Cabinet officers of the Government. These men, whether they are on a subcommittee or the advisory board, take the same oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the United States as that taken by the Cabinet officers themselves.

The Council of National Defense, including the Cabinet officer who has the matter immediately within his jurisdiction, takes this matter up among its members, and, after having advised with one another, decides as to what should be done. I understand that the particular Cabinet officer having jurisdiction of the subject matter is the man who finally executes the contract, places his honor and his reputation back of the contract, and is the man who makes the contract. Every Cabinet officer who makes a contract is held responsible for the fairness of that contract.

So, although we hear so much discussion about men making contracts with themselves, we find on analysis that they make no contracts, but that the Secretary of the department which has the matter in hand makes the contracts, and he alone is responsible for the contracts. It is important to settle that question, because then it resolves itself down to this: Have we got faith and confidence in the men who are going to execute the contract, viz, the Cabinet officers?

We of the younger generation know from hearsay, at least, what happened during the Civil War. According to all accounts, there was scandal and a great deal of it. Ugly charges were made, and we understand to-day that men made profits and wealth out of the distress and suffering of their country and of their countrymen. There was plenty of scandal in 1898. There was the embalmed-beef scandal, and there were others, as well as very ugly rumors, which have not died down to this day. I do not know what system they had at that time, but evidently, as good as it was, it was bad enough; it was so bad that even scandals growing out of the Civil War have survived to this late date, over half a century afterwards, and are still a stench in the nostrils of the people. Now, it is only fair to say that under the present system thus far no case of dishonesty has been substantiated. Even though intermediaries have been in some instances interested, the administration by its officers has been able to safeguard the public interest, and it is also only fair to say that it also appears that the men advising the Government have in many instances rendered valuable and patriotic service.

I hope I will not be charged with partisanship when I say that as to this administration not a breath of scandal has touched it since it has been in power. No suspicion has been directed against any member of the Cabinet. The only charges which have been made against the members of the Cabinet and the President of the United States is that they have been too penurious and parsimonious, too jealous and watchful of the interests of the Government, because they have screwed some prospective contractors down too tight.

The only complaints that have come came from men who have been hit. Only last week we were told that certain great interests of the country went away dissatisfied because they had been cut down over $20 a ton for their steel. I, for one, want to make the statement, and to express it as my own judgment and as my understanding of a fact that no one will dispute, that not a breath of scandal has touched this administration. Five important and eventful years have passed, and no administration ever stood higher in the estimation of the people than does this administration. I, for one, believe that this Government will see to it that no graft charges and no scandals of that kind will enter into war contracts if vigilance, watchfulness, and honesty of purpose will keep them out. I am authorized, I think, to say that no scandal will be permitted to creep into any contract let by this Government in this war, and if, perchance, anything of that kind ever does arise it will meet with summary treatment and summary consequences. That being the case, I feel that, under the circumstances, we are warranted in having a confidence that the affairs of this country, being in the hands in which they are, will be faithfully administered and that the President, jealous of his own good name and the good name of his administration, will see to it that, no matter what the emergency, it will not be so used by selfish men—and that some such will try to use it I have no doubt—to carry themselves to affluence and wealth. The proof of the pudding is in the eating, and when a system is giving good results the purpose is being fulfilled.

The men who are sitting upon these boards, with very few exceptions, if any, have never been even charged with doing anything that is not entirely proper and right. The actions which have been referred to on the floor, I feel confident, if run down, would prove to have good reasons back of them. I believe that the members of the advisory board and subcommittees have come to Washington in a spirit of service, and that they will not violate their oaths; but back of them, I say, is an administration which will not brook anything of that kind, but will see to it that our governmental matters are well taken care of in all respects.

Now, there is something that can be done in this matter, even in the way of preventing favoritism. I have been advised that large contracts have been let, greater proportions of the work have been given in some instances than would seem to be equitable; but the situation is something like this, as I understand it: The people, for instance, in the independent steel concerns are not anxious to serve the Government at Government prices, for the reason that the public has got to pay a great deal higher price—a much higher price—than the Government pays for steel. I understand that the market for steel is something like 100 per cent higher to private citizens than it is to the Government. Now, that is a compliment to the Government, and does away with any idea of graft or fraud if citizens can not buy as cheaply as the Government is buying; but that also has another side to it. Where concerns come in and sell at 50 per cent of the market price, they are the ones that are serving the Government at a sacrifice of 50 per cent, and other concerns are escaping their just responsibilities and continuing to sell at 100 per cent higher.

Now, what ought to be done? I just want to suggest this for what it may be worth: The suggestion was made to me that we ought to prorate, as far as practicable, these contracts, and if any concern is producing, for instance, 10 per cent of the total output of the country it should have 10 per cent allotted to it as the amount which should be done for the Government. That might do away with charges of favoritism and compel all concerns to come in and help the Government at prices that are lower than the average citizen is getting. Of course, this presupposes that the price which is exacted from the Government is as low a price as the Government can reasonably demand.

There is another suggestion I should like to make, and that is that when the Government finds what is a just price to pay that should be the market price for the people of the country. That is to say, that that should be the price the people of the country ought to pay for the product. The Government, although it is wise in fixing the price at a just rate for itself, but no more, is only looking out for itself as a Government.

It should go further, and see to it that the people of the country pay no more than it has to pay, because it knows that every dollar in excess of what it pays is extortion from the people and a tax upon the people, and should not be tolerated. And it knows, moreover, that the increased price to the public means increased prices that the Government will have to pay for what it purchases from the public. It is the loophole through which the gold in our Treasury will unduly flow out.

I do not know that it would require any particular statute, but the Council of National Defense ought to adopt that rule and prorate this stuff out, whether it is shoes or whatever it may be, so that any concern that manufactures an appreciable amount of the total output or is in a position to do the business at the right time and at the proper price ought to be treated with absolute equity and fairness both as to its obligations as well as to its own interests, and the Government should make the price it has to pay on all contracts the market price for its citizens. All scandal or even breath of scandal would be done away with if that simple device should be adopted.

I think the gentlemen that have got this matter in their hands owe it to themselves to see to it that no suspicion even rests against them. They should be above suspicion. If we are going to have tranquillity and peace at home, the people must have faith and confidence in their Government; and they can not have faith and confidence in their Government if men occupying places of responsibility use their posts in a way to make it even appear that they are having an advantage over somebody else. In other words, the burden of proof is upon them to show that they have not and they ought not to be willing to assume a burden which they never ought to carry; and they will not have to carry it unless situations of that kind come to the front.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say something about the food bill. This bill has been discussed for five weeks, and it has been attacked and attacked and attacked day after day here, evidently upon the theory that we do not need any bill of any kind. I took occasion to observe some time ago that this was not a question as to whether or not we liked to regulate business; it was a question whether we are going to permit somebody else who officially owes no duty to the Government to regulate for us in time of war, when the Government needs all the power it can possibly get into its hands to wage a successful war. I say again that the question here is, Do you prefer to let the President of the United States regulate our food supplies and food prices, or are you going to leave it to those that have already got it in their hands and have made a mess and a botch of it and enormous fortunes out of it? I mean private and selfish men who are bound by nothing but the boundless avarice which encompasses them.

Senators say here that they do not want to interfere with business. I say that the most important piece of business that any man has in the United States to-day is to help this Government win this war. All of his own petty business affairs in comparison and for the time being dwindle into insignificance and should not be weighed by him in the scale of patriotism and duty to his Government. I say that when young men are conscripted and sent to France and put in the trenches you are interfering with their business. You are not only interfering with their business, but you are interfering with their life, their liberty, and their pursuit of happiness. You are interfering with their lives, you are interfering with their business, you are interfering with their earning capacity, you are interfering with their happiness and the happiness of the people who love them. You are conscripting their incomes and perhaps their lives, and you are conscripting their future as well.

Take, for instance, for the purpose of one illustration, some young man that is practicing law or practicing medicine or engaged in a business that only he can run or operate. He is making $4,000 a year. What do you do with that young man? You tap him on the shoulder and you say: "Come here; we need you; you have got to go to war. You have got to give up your $4,000 income; you have got to give up your practice; you have got to accept in lieu thereof $360 a year, if you live that long, or $30 a month. Then you go to Europe, and you may be killed; you may be wounded. If you come back alive, and you are capable of doing any work, you have got to go and build up your practice again." In the meantime it is costing him as a tax the difference between $360 a year and $4,000 a year, which is $3,640 a year out of a $4,000 income.

We admit that we have a right to do that. There is nobody here contending—any more, at least—that the conscription law is unconstitutional. When you have done that you have interfered with that man's business. You have interfered with his life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness. Is it not the last word of power that the Government can exercise? And if you concede that we have a right to do that, then do you not concede that we have a right to do anything less than that? The greatest, the supremest power must include the lesser power. In interfering so seriously with a man's life and business affairs the lopping off half of a hundred per cent excess profit does not approach in importance what is required of the individual that is called upon to do what under the volunteer or draft system he is compelled to do.

So, when we are talking about interfering with business, I want to point to the young man that carries the gun across his shoulder and say you are interfering with his business. His life, his future, his income, everything that he has and hopes to do in the world is being interfered with. Who will get up and talk about interfering with his own business when we know that we are going to send a million young men perhaps across the sea to fight for their country, and they have not been asked whether they want to do it or not? I say it is necessary to do that. It would be unjustifiable if it were not necessary; but when it is necessary to do that, it is necessary also to do other things. It is not a question of whether you like to do it or not; it is a question of whether we want to win this war, and whether we have got to do it to win it. That is the point that I want to argue for a little while.

Mr. President, in my judgment, it is vitally necessary to pass a bill like the one now pending. Its defeat would be a disaster leading to consequences which I, for one, do not want to be held responsible for. Even its delay, I believe, has been a great misfortune, although under our present unanimous-agreement rule that can not be helped now. Let us pause and take stock of our situation. In order to properly impress ourselves with the gravity of the times and of our situation, it is sometimes necessary to permit our minds to observe our surroundings and the surrounding facts, circumstances, and conditions which obtain. We are engaged in a dreadful war, the most important, most serious, most dreadful, most pitiless and bloodiest war of all history. Our foe knows no law but that of his necessity. He gives no quarter. If victorious, there will be no limits to his demands; if victorious, his demands will be boundless and limitless in their far-reaching effect.

If he defeats our allies before we can bring to bear our full force and resources to their succor, we will have to fight alone the most formidable, ruthless, relentless, and implacable enemy to freedom and civilization that has ever lifted his bloody front over the horizon of time. If he dictates the terms of peace to our allies, he will possess himself of their fleets, far larger than any that we can hope to meet him with. If he dictates the terms of peace to our allies, he will plant his bloody feet upon this hemisphere and challenge us to meet him here. If Germany is victorious over us, our Monroe doctrine will be but a memory and our Constitution will have become a mere scrap of paper. Freedom will be manacled with locks and chains and our independence as a nation forever banished. Now, is there no danger of such a consummation? For three years Germany has almost single-handed held Europe at bay, and at the same time has defied the laws of God and man and has defied the people of the world. To-day her armies are deadlocked upon foreign soil, with armies the biggest, the bravest, and the best that England, France, Russia, Italy, Roumania, Serbia, and others can marshal against her. We are told that France has reached the limit of her man power; that she is bled white; and that England is approaching the zenith of her man power. We have already loaned more than a billion dollars to our allies. Every ship that can spread a sail or be moved by power has been mustered to carry ammunition, guns, food, and supplies to aid them. We have already sent thousands of our brave soldiers over to their aid. And yet, with all this, I say that Germany has fought her foes to a standstill on their own soil and now holds against all that valor, blood, money, resources, and power can bring to bear the territory of her enemies.

Now, how goes it with our allies on the sea? With fleets far superior in size and efficiency to that of Germany our allies appear to be practically powerless to stop the havoc and damage done, and that is being done, by the submarine piracy. Condemn the submarine as we may, abhor it as we do, denounce it as unfair and contrary to international law, as diabolical and detestable as it is, nevertheless it is doing work. It is destroying the tonnage and the food of the world, and we may as well recognize the fact. Holding her enemies' fleets in their own waters, she plies her concealed dagger with deadly efficiency and effect.

I have here an excerpt from an article written by Ryley Grannon in the Washington Post of the 7th instant. I will ask permission to put this in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

While the United States in this fashion is adjusting itself to the business of war, Germany is sinking ships on an average of 1,000,000 dead weight tons a month. Since February 1, taking big weeks with little ones, the average has been almost exactly 1,000,000 tons per month in dead weight. I get these figures from British and French officers now in the United States—men who know what is going on. They tell me that the total available shipping of the world suitable for running the submarine blockade is not over 15,000,000 tons. Much of this shipping would be hard to get; probably the allies would have to force some neutrals into war before the latter would surrender their ships.

With all the vessels now under way in the United States—about 1,200,000 tons—and the vessels contracted and to be contracted for, this country will have about 5,000,000 tons under construction one year hence (this is presuming that there will be no long delay in starting the 2,100,000 tons which Gen. Goethals is about to recommend). From now until July 1 next the Germans will have sunk 12,000,000 tons, unless the submarine is checked. Granting that the United States will have turned out 1,000,000 tons within the year and that Great Britain will turn out 5,000,000 tons—she can't do it—there will still be 6,000,000 tons to be supplied by neutrals to put the supply question where it is now. How much England can stand in reduced shipping without starving is, therefore, a question of the next 12 months.

Two years of indecisive land fighting and continuance of submarine raids mean the wiping out of the world's shipping, or practically so—sufficiently, at any rate, to settle the war in Germany's favor. Either the land fighting must be made decisive or the German fleet must be destroyed, or a way found to checkmate the submarine. The problem is up to the United States, according to the foreign officers who gave me these figures. They say the allies can not solve the problem, and so they ask us to do it. If we don't do it, the end of two years will see the war settle down to a fight between Germany, master of the Old World, and the United States, master of the New.

Mr. HUSTING. I will not read that at this time. This article, published in the Washington Post about a week ago, shows that 1,000,000 tons a month of the world's tonnage is being destroyed, and that at that rate there will be scarcely enough a year from now, unless this problem is solved, to carry the world's commerce or to carry our foodstuffs to our allies to support them and their people, and it has not been denied. I know there are other reports out, but I am just citing this for what it may be worth. That an immense amount of tonnage is being sunk no one can deny. No one can claim that the problem has been solved as yet.

Here is a statement made by Chairman Denman and published in the Washington Star of the 10th instant:

CAN NOT MAKE GOOD LOSSES BY SUBMARINES—CHAIRMAN DENMAN, OF SHIPPING BOARD, TELLS NEW YORK MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION OF THE SITUATION.

"No legislation of Congress, no administrative effort of the shipping board, and no activity of ship constructors can hope to make good for commerce the losses from the activity of the submarines at the rate of 1,000,000 tons a month now established," Chairman Denman, of the Shipping Board, has advised the Merchants' Association of New York.

The seriousness of the submarine warfare to commerce at the rate of loss now established is strikingly brought out by Chairman Denman in the course of his letter, in which he says:

"The Shipping Board is in entire sympathy with your difficulties in obtaining a reasonable rate for overseas transportation. As you know, no power has yet been granted the board to regulate such rates. We are in hopes that relief may be obtained when the commandeering power over vessels is delegated.

"You must be aware, however, that with the destruction reaching the rate of over 1,000,000 dead-weight tons per month in April and June all the reproductions of steel vessels and of wooden vessels in which a most enthusiastic advocate of either material can hope for will not replace over half the tonnage destroyed."

In the postcript the chairman says:

"In figuring tonnage it should be remembered that the reports of losses of English vessels where the tonnage is given refer to gross tons, to which must be added from 30 to 50 per cent to reach the dead-weight unit on which the new tonnage to be constructed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation is reckoned. It should also be remembered that the English reports of sinkings represent but 55 per cent of the total, judging from the figures given out during the first two months of the sinkings. We understand that the English proportion is now higher, but at the same time the size of the vessels sunk are much larger in tonnage."

So goes the war, both on land and sea. More and more we read in the foreign press of our allies and in the public statement of their representatives that the failure or success of this war lies with us. The world recognizes now that it is up to the United States to win this war. Now, does anyone doubt that if we unite the people of this country into one compact, militant force and support it by a speedy mobilization of all the resources of this country and place all this in the hands of the Commander in Chief, thus enabling him to deliver a crushing blow with all of our man power and our power of resource put into the swing, we shall be able to accomplish this task which the world concedes is ours? I have no doubt that we can win this victory and destroy the Prussian menace if we can unite our people and mobilize our resources speedily and enable the President to bring to bear upon our enemy all the power that this great and powerful Nation possesses. I want to emphasize it that we can win, but that union and time are of the very essence.

Now, how is it at home? Are we doing all we can and as quickly as we can to win this war? We still have the German sympathizer with us and the pro-German press of this country, which continues its sniping tactics, waving the American flag with one hand, but shooting our boys in the back with German guns, loaded with German ammunition, in the other.

The pro-German socialists have adopted a resolution counseling mass resistance—which means forcible resistance—to the draft, and a referendum is now in progress to ratify the resolution, if it has not already been concluded and ratified.

We have the pacifists who continue to cry "peace" when there is no peace, and who are counseling the repeal of the conscription law.

The I. W. W.'s are fomenting strikes and riots in Arizona, Idaho, Oregon, and other States in the far West. Gen. Liggett, commander of the Western Department, has been ordered by Secretary of War Baker to take steps necessary to suppress the reign of terror in these and other threatened States.

German spies are amongst us. The departments are infested with them, it would seem. Our foes know the departure of our troops and our vessels before we do.

Now, in addition to this situation, we have the high cost of living. Food and clothing and fuel are so high that our wage earners are undernourished and in actual want. We must feed and supply ourselves and our allies, and the supply is limited. Now, in our stress we have the speculators and food and fuel manipulators who are doing all that they can to fill their pockets and undermine our Government. In our stress these vampires and these locusts are sucking our blood and consuming our substance. If the cost of living goes any higher, it will be impossible for our laborers and wage earners to live. Then what? They will have to and will demand a raise in wages, and if it is not given to them they will strike. They are striking now in many places. There are none more loyal in the land than the laborer and the wage earner and none who in proportion to their means are sacrificing as much as they are in this war. They furnish the men who make up the rank and file of our armies. But one thing they will not endure, and that is to see their families suffer from want in a land of plenty. They will refuse to remain the nonresistant victims of greedy and avaricious men who fatten and batten upon the life blood and distress of their fellow citizens. Let conditions once become intolerable—and such almost are the conditions now, or have been—and you will goad men into acts of violence and riot. Now, it is clear to me that one or two things has got to be done, either wages will have to go up or the cost of living has got to go down. The present rate of wages and the cost of living are irreconcilable. Let me here read into the RECORD a telegram I have just received from Mayor Hoan, of Milwaukee. Mayor Hoan is a socialist, a real American nevertheless. He knows the labor situation and is familiar with the laborer's point of view, and he is well worth listening to:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 18, 1917.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
Washington, D. C.:

I desire to advise you that in my opinion it is absolutely necessary to insure the keeping of the peace and good order of this community that the United States Government must not only be empowered but must take immediate action to control the food and fuel situation in the United States. I want you to know that in times of peace from 15 to 25 per cent of the families here live below the poverty line, and now the condition is infinitely worse. If the loyalty of these people is expected, then show them this is not Morgan's war by a practical demonstration. If the United States Government will busy itself a little more in stamping out the treason of the country's worst enemies, namely, those who are reaping huge profits out of the necessities of life from a helpless people, than it does in trying to suppress free speech and freedom of press it will be practicing some wholesome Americanism and achieve the confidence of the real patriotic, hard-working, self-sacrificing, but unbragging people of this country. If the working classes can make no profits, why not eliminate the profits of our coal, rail, and food-hoarding Benedict Arnolds by the Government taking possession of these activities now, not after the people find it necessary to have another Boston tea party. There is a tremendous responsibility upon the shoulders of Congress in dillydallying with this food and fuel issue. The people of Milwaukee love their country, and I serve this notice on you in their behalf in a friendly spirit, but in full realization that Congress is gambling with fate in delaying action.

DANIEL W. HOAN,
Mayor.

Now, what is the most practical thing to be done? The Federation of Labor, through its able and patriotic chief, Samuel Gompers, told us at the beginning of the war that labor troubles and labor differences would be sidetracked during the war. The laboring men were willing to forego any demand which they felt entitled to make to have their wages increased, the hours of labor lowered, or conditions bettered. They volunteered to do this so that they might not embarrass their country and their Government or lessen its productivity at a time of an emergency like this. But, of course, they had a right to expect and demand that the purchasing power of their wages would not be substantially diminished. But what have we seen since then? The cost of living has increased 50 per cent in most things and in some things 200 or 300 per cent. So we begin to hear the murmurings of discontent, dissatisfaction, and distress throughout the land. Men are crying for relief from conditions that are not only unjustifiable but almost unforgivable. Last but not least, benefit of this advanced cost of living accrues only to the drones—the vampires of society. The producer does not get the benefit of the increase, but the consumer has to pay for it. The only gainer is neither the producer nor the toiler, but the man who is actuated and guided solely by selfishness and greed.

We are seeking a remedy for this intolerable evil. We all know that we must find a remedy, and that soon. Grain is now being cut and ready for market in the Southwest. In the North and Northwest the sound of the reaper likewise will soon be heard in the land. Speculators and food manipulators are already plying their nefarious trade. It is even said that our enemies, through their agents, are abroad in the land buying up our foodstuffs. We are trying to equip our armies; we are trying to build ships for the Navy; we are trying to build both wooden and steel ships to carry food to our troops and to our allies. We saw this coming four or five weeks ago—yes, months ago. The President saw it coming and with his usual foresight and wisdom, asked Congress for legislation to enable him to properly deal with this menacing and perilous situation. He well recognized the necessity for speedy action as well, and in letters and interviews he has pointed out the imperative necessity of action. In a letter a short time ago he told Congress that because of the conditions I have named, time was of the very essence and that this bill should be passed by July 1 at the very latest. Has it been done? No. I have already alluded to some of the questions that have been injected into this debate. I will not talk about them now, but they have delayed the consideration of this bill for weeks. When I say that, I refer to the prohibition question, happily settled for the time being at least.

There is another condition that I have not spoken of—and this occurs to me—and that is the attitude this country has got to take toward the neutral countries in Europe. I have here on my desk some editorials—some by German newspapers—complaining of the way this country is now treating neutrals, and that we are inconsistent in our attitude toward them, saying that we have forgotten that we always claimed the right to trade with a belligerent country while we claimed to be neutral. Here is one of them:

EMBARGO BRUTAL, SAYS GERMAN PAPER—AMERICA WILL DESTROY NEUTRAL NATIONS IS TEUTON CRY.

[Special cable from the London Times to the Washington Post; copyright, 1917, by Public Ledger Co.]

LONDON, July 13.

Interesting as showing where the shoe pinches is the following German comment on the American embargo, especially in view of Germany's tender treatment of small neutrals, as evidenced, for instance, by submarine ruthlessness. The Frankfurter Zeitung published Saturday, under the heading "Campaign of annihilation against little neutrals—brutal assault by Americans," the first telegrams from the United States to Copenhagen about the American embargo and added the following:

"Never has brutality been more shamelessly displayed than in glorifications of violence of the roughest kind which ascend from complacent American friends of the world. On the other hand, we hear complaints that are overwhelming in their strength—the cry of the free citizens of the north, before whose eyes the torture chamber is opening. America dares what England shrinks from doing. America not only overcomes neutrals but will master the entente."

To digress just a moment, I want to say this in reply to those contentions: We recognize to-day that neutrals can trade with belligerents, but we never claimed when we had our differences with Germany that she must sell to us. While we claimed the right to sell to a belligerent—to England or to one or other of the allies—we never insisted that Germany must sell to us and replenish the supplies of our market. We never claimed that Germany must send her goods to us so that we could sell them to the allies.

Some of these editorials appear in very prominent newspapers. If they want to state the situation correctly, they would have to say that while we claimed the right to sell to belligerents, we did not insist at the same time that a belligerent must sell to us and to furnish us with the goods that we sold to belligerents. We recognize the right of all these neutral countries to sell to Germany if they wish, but surely no American will say that we ought to follow it up and provide them with the goods to sell to Germany in order to remain consistent with ourselves. Neutrals have a right to sell to Germany if they desire, but they can not make us a party to that transaction, no more than we could have compelled Germany to furnish us with goods to sell to England. That is the distinction between the attitude we are taking now and the attitude we took when we were a neutral and not a belligerent.

In passing, I will say that I do not believe in coercing any nation into this war. I hope that we will never use our great power to force a people into a war in which they do not think that their interests are involved. It would be a crime to do that. But one thing we have a right to say to ourselves—not because we penalize somebody else—that having once entered into this war, it is our duty, our first duty to ourselves, to see that the war is won, and consequently the neutral countries can not expect us indirectly or directly to be called upon to furnish supplies to our enemies and thus help to defeat ourselves.

In a war like this, which is a war of Germany against the world, I venture to say it will not be long before every neutral nation in the world will recognize very clearly that every time a ship goes down with a cargo of provisions no matter what flag she flies a blow has been struck at her own life and welfare, that the world shipping has diminished just that much, that the world's food supply has shrunk just that much, and there is that much less to live on on the globe on which we live. They will find that when Germany sends its torpedo into a ship, no matter what flag it flies, she is making an attack on the nations that are crying loudly for food, because it is their food that is going down to the bottom of the ocean, no matter what or whose ship is sunk or what flag she flies.

Every time a million bushels of wheat goes down another million has to take its place, and if the original million bushels is destined for armies that need it and that is sunk it means that another million bushels more which would have been available to a neutral nation goes down, and they and not our armies are deprived of the million bushels. Our country has enough to feed its own people and its own armed forces. But the whole world is calling on us to help feed them besides. When an attack is made on our food supply the World's Provider is attacked, and our loss must mean the loss of the countries who call on us for their provisioning. What have these countries to say to that country which prevents and hinders and obstructs us from giving the help to those who so loudly and distressfully call for help?

I repeat that the war of Germany, this subsea war, directed against the shipping of the world, is no longer directed against her enemies alone, it is directed against every country on the face of the globe; and they will soon recognize it. Instead of Germany criticizing the United States as being harsh against the neutrals she should remember that it is she, not we, that is depriving them of the food that is to keep them alive.

Another suggestion, if this country should forget its own interest and in the interest of what appears to be the spirit of humanity, should undertake to serve the neutrals, have they or we any guarantee that this shark of the world seas is not going to deprive them of the things we are trying to get to them? Do they not know that between our shores and their starving people is a barrier that has been set up by Germany that will destroy this food without compunction even if she knows that act will starve to death the neutral nations of the world?

How long will it take them to understand these things? The Lord knows it took us a long time to understand it, but I think we better appreciate now that the German strategy, the German plan, is to indiscriminately destroy every ton of shipping in the world she can destroy, to destroy every piece of food that she can destroy in the world, so that the world's shipping and the world's food supply, regardless of whether it belongs to friend or foe, neutral or belligerent, so that eventually the people of the world will be deprived of food, or having food no bottoms to move it to the ports of need and want, and thus by the process of starvation bring the world to her knees and under her dominion. But there is one country that will not go down on her knees. There is one exception, and that is the United States. We can feed ourselves, at all events. But how about those who must depend upon us for their supplies, our neutral friends, for instance? If all the shipping in the world is destroyed, as Germany threatens she will, what will it then avail our neutral friends if we have aplenty but there are no ships to get it to them? What will it mean to them if we are defeated and our enemy triumphs?

I repeat, therefore, that regardless of our desire to serve neutrals—no matter how badly we want to do it—if the war goes on another year, or two at the utmost, our land may be teeming with plenty, enough to feed the civilized world, but with nothing to carry it across to those who will perish because the arch-enemy of the world has destroyed all means to do it with. What good will foodstuffs in America do to Holland, Denmark, or any of the Scandinavian or other countries if this destruction is going to go on and on, as they threaten it will do?

That brings us down to this proposition, that the only way in which the United States can defend its source of supplies for them is for the United States to defend and preserve itself. When it destroys the German power it liberates the world and the world is made safe for democracy. In that way, and in that way only, can we remove this cloud that is hovering over the horizon, and which, if it extends much further, will envelop the world in one tremendous cataclysm. But nevertheless, one of the things to be figured on, to be reckoned on, is whether these neutral people will be wise enough to understand that their salvation is not in our hands. It is not for us to say whether they shall starve or shall not starve. Only one power stands in the way, and it is as much the business of those nations who are suffering as it is our business, as they will soon recognize, to do these things and to put this mad dog that is running amuck in the world where it can bite nobody.

Mr. President, why should we not pass the bill? A number of reasons have been advanced. One of them is that it is unconstitutional for us to pass it. I said before, and I say it again, I hate to see a perfectly good Constitution always arraigned on the side of the Kaiser. I hate to see an instrument that was destined to protect us and our country become the refuge and shield of our enemy. I refuse to construe this perfectly good Constitution in any such way as that, and I am speaking now from a legal and constitutional point of view as well as from a common-sense point of view.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] not many days ago I think answered the constitutional question. I want right here now to ask permission to put into the RECORD certain citations of the speech of the Senator from Illinois as a part of my remarks in order to save time and useless repetition. Here are his authorities and what they say:

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Miller against United States, in Eleventh Wallace:

> The Constitution confers upon Congress expressly power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules respecting captures on land and water. Upon the exercise of these powers no restrictions are imposed.

Then says the court:

> Of course the power to declare war involves the power to prosecute it by all means and in any manner in which war may be legitimately prosecuted.

The Supreme Court of the United States said, on page 606 of One hundred and thirtieth United States:

> To preserve its independence, and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment, is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated. It matters not in what form such aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. The government possessing the powers which are to be exercised for protection and security, is clothed with authority to determine the occasion on which the powers shall be called forth, and its determinations, so far as the subjects affected are concerned, are necessarily conclusive upon all its departments and officers.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in One hundred and thirtieth United States, says:

It matters not in what form such aggression and encroachment come, whether from the foreign nation acting in its national character or from vast hordes of its people crowding in upon us. * * * To preserve its independence and give security against foreign aggression and encroachment is the highest duty of every nation, and to attain these ends nearly all other considerations are to be subordinated.

Mr. James Madison, in his observations on the Constitution, says:

With what color of propriety could the force necessary for defense be limited by those who can not limit the force of offense? If a Federal Constitution could chain the ambition or set bounds to the exertions of all other nations, then, indeed, might it prudently chain the discretion of its own Government and set bounds to the exertions for its own safety. * * * The means of security can only be regulated by the means and the danger of attack. They will, in fact, be ever determined by these rules and by no others. It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation.

Justice Bradley, in Tenth Wallace, in the Legal Tender case, says:

It is absolutely essential to independent national existence that government should have a firm hand on the two great sovereign instrumentalities of the sword and the purse, and the right to wield them without restriction on occasions of national peril. In certain emergencies government must have at its command, not only the personal services, the bodies and lives of its citizens, but the lesser, though not less essential, power of absolute control over the resources of the country.

Its armies must be filled and its navies manned by the citizens in person. Its material of war, its munitions, equipment, and commissary stores, must come from the industry of the country.

The time not occupied in the discussion of the prohibition question was occupied by the ever and ever recurring ogre of the Constitution. It was said that this bill was unconstitutional. The senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] rather effectually disposed of that argument. I want to make a reply to the constitutional objection to this bill. Everyone admits that the conditions warrant this legislation; everybody admits that the cost of living is too high; everybody admits that the food speculator and the manipulator are to blame in part; and everbody admits that unrestrained and unrestricted competitive bidding between ourselves and our allies and even our enemies for the same foodstuffs will drive the prices clear out of sight and will fill the pockets of those who neither toil nor spin. It is admitted that we ought to find a remedy, but it is said when anything is proposed like this bill here that it is unconstitutional. It is too bad to see our Constitution and the Kaiser always on the same side. Our Constitution ought to be our ally and not the Kaiser's. Our Constitution ought to be our friend and not our enemy. It ought to be our refuge and our shield, and not the refuge and shield of our enemy. We have yet to take one single important step which was essential, sometimes indispensable, for the proper protection of ourselves and of our rights since our troubles with Germany began that has not been declared to be unconstitutional by some Senator in this Chamber. The armed-ship bill, the conscription bill, the espionage bill, and others, were all declared to be unconstitutional in their most essential features. Now, we are told in this, as we have been told in so many other measures, that we must not avail ourselves of remedies which will save us because we are endangering our constitutional liberty. I can not place a construction on our Constitution the effect of which may be the destruction of the Constitution itself. If Germany should defeat our allies and then defeat us, then the time will come sooner or later when we will have to fight her for our national existence and our independence, and if we then lose our independence and our national existence because we are told not to do this or that which is indispensable for our defense, then, I ask, what becomes of the Constitution? We are told that we must refuse to defend ourselves in a certain manner because it is against the Constitution, and in consequence of our solicitude for the Constitution we are defeated and lose our national existence. Then do we not also lose our Constitution?

So we find ourselves in this absurd position, that because of our solicitude for our Constitution we permit ourselves to be defeated, thus losing our national existence and the guarantee of our liberties and render our Constitution a mere scrap of paper, because then the Kaiser will furnish us a constitution in lieu of the one for fear of violation of which we permitted ourselves to become his victim; or, to put it in other words, to save our Constitution we lose our national existence and our independence, and that Constitution which is responsible for our downfall and destruction we lose with it. As a legal and constitutional proposition I can not follow a construction which leads to the absurdities that the construction which some of the Senators lead us to. The Constitution must be construed as a life-giving and not a death-dealing instrument. The country that gave birth to the Constitution can only safeguard and perpetuate that Constitution by safeguarding and perpetuating itself, because in this instance, when the creator dies, of course the creature succumbs with it.

I say we can not construe the Constitution in such a manner that the Constitution itself will be destroyed as a consequence of the construction we place upon the Constitution.

We may be defeated and the Kaiser will dictate the terms of peace. We may be defeated if we do not do everything we can to protect ourselves, and if he defeats us and dictates the terms of peace, what becomes of our independence? What becomes of our Monroe doctrine? What becomes of our Constitution? What becomes of everything that Americans hold dear? What becomes of their rights? We can not lose this war without becoming a subservient nation, because if we lose it we will be dictated to, and we will for once, and the first time in our national existence, have to listen to the dictation of a foreign master. We will have to bow to our master. Our Stars and Stripes have never been struck before any force on earth, and God forbid that they should be struck now at this momentous hour in the world's history, when we and the world are threatened with all that a freedom-loving humanity abhors. Yet that is within the possibilities.

So, I repeat, if we adopt the construction some Senators have placed upon the Constitution, and out of a tender regard for constitutional limitations we refrain from doing something that will preserve our national existence, we thereby not only lose our national existence, but, as we slip off this coil of our existence, we slip off the Constitution with it and the Constitution becomes a mere scrap of paper. I refuse to adopt a construction of the Constitution which says we can not do something to preserve and protect and perpetuate the Constitution itself.

A constitution is a dead thing of itself; it is the spirit and the power back of the Constitution in the heart, in the brain, and in the body of our citizens which makes that Constitution a vital force. Once take away that power—spiritual, mental, and physical—strip it of its attributes, and what will you have left? You will have a mere scrap of paper like unto the German treaty with Belgium. Senators, this is not a fancy. This danger looms dark in the offing. Belgium has felt it; Roumania has felt it; Serbia has felt it; the allies will feel it if they lose. Yes; the neutral countries will feel it if Prussianism wins and democracy loses. Germany's own allies will feel the same thing if they do not watch out, and if they do not make peace before she does. Her own allies are in a position where, if Germany wins, they will lose, because Germany will absorb, as she has almost already absorbed, them, and their dynasties go into the pot. If Austria loses, the dynasty goes and the people of Austria win, because they get their independence. So we see that if the Hohenzollern autocracy wins, the world loses, the whole world, Germany herself with it. The dynasty only will be the winner. Now, when the map is changing, when governments are changing, shall we close our eyes and our ears and refuse to see or hear the things which are at our threshold and which will be put upon us unless we do what we have got to do to save ourselves? Shall we let them change our map and our form of government also? So I say—and I am just coming down now to the end of that—that I put a construction upon the Constitution that is far deeper and bigger and broader than those who would tie our hands and our feet at a time when we are assailed and our national life is assailed and our very existence and the democracy of the world is in the balance. I say we have a constitutional right under the Constitution to defend our existence and our Constitution. I do not believe that you can find any respectable authority to the contrary. I have heard read excerpts here of opinions that do not touch the bottom of the matter at all, that are a mere scratching of the gravel on the ground above; that is all. A good judicial construction of the Constitution, if it is ever put up flatly to the Supreme Court, will, I am convinced in my own mind, be a verdict in favor of a constitutional right to defend our country, its national existence, and the rights of our people in such a way as appears to the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States and to the Congress of the United States to be reasonably necessary. The Supreme Court will never stultify itself by a decision embodying an interpretation of the Constitution which would mean our destruction and not our salvation.

What else is said here? Why, it is said here that the farmers do not want to be regulated. I have two or three letters here, which, instead of reading, I am going to ask to have put in the RECORD, from Mr. J. W. Shorthill, secretary of the National Council of the Farmers' Cooperative Association, in which he states the attitude of the farmer. I am going to tell you who Mr. Shorthill is, so that you will understand that I am talking of no irresponsible gentleman. I will ask to put these letters in the RECORD. He is the secretary of the Nebraska Elevator Co. These elevators are controlled by farmer stockholders. Their State organizations are also organized into a Federal organization.

Mr. Shorthill is the national secretary, as well, of the elevator association. He is secretary of the national association. I think they represent something like 2,800 elevators in the United States, representing something between 200,000 or 300,000 farmers. I am not going to read these letters, but I am going to put them in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted. The Chair hears none.

The letters referred to are as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF
FARMERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS,
Hotel Bellevue, Washington, July 14, 1917.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I note with grave concern the situation which seems to be developing in the Senate in regard to the elimination from H. R. 4961 of all necessaries except foods and fuels. In this connection I earnestly solicit your careful consideration of the following suggestions:

Who is afraid to place the products of his labor or his genius in the hands of our President, when winning this war makes it necessary? Who is afraid to permit our Government to control the product of his labor or his genius in order that ruinous speculation in that product may be curbed? Certainly not the grain growers of this country.

The grain growers will never permit any other class to be more patriotic than they. They know that if this war is to be effectively fought it is just as necessary for our President to direct the distribution of our food as it is to manage the movements of our Army. They know that in times of war if some strong arm is not ever present, ready to act promptly and decisively, the heartless speculator will ruthlessly reap profits that are criminal. They know that in these things food is first always and that it should be the first to be controlled.

But, just as surely as food is first, some other essential is second. Many other things almost take first place. In numerous cases it is difficult to determine which necessarily should be subjected to the most rigid control. So, why should you at this time formulate or enact legislation which is designed to single out the control of food to the exclusion of all other necessaries? Why stop the advantages there?

The grain growers are ready for food control. They welcome it; but, if the legislation that may be enacted is going to appeal to them as being just, it must confer the power to exercise the very same control over any other necessary when unusual conditions demand it. They want no special favors permitted to or conferred upon any class by this legislation; they ask no special privileges for themselves; in fact, they are humiliated by the proposal to exempt them from any of the penalties of the law.

In this matter the grain growers of this country now "stand at the side" of our President. If the growers of other products, the miners, the manufacturers, the merchandisers of other necessaries, will now step up in the same row, this essential legislation can be passed in a day.

I am submitting this letter to you for the purpose only of giving you a correct presentation of the attitude of the grain growers toward the proposed legislation for food control, and in the hope that these suggestions may be received by you in the same helpful spirit in which they are tendered.

I beg permission to remain,
Very truly, yours,
J. W. SHORTHILL, Secretary.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF
FARMERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS,
Hotel Bellevue, Washington, July 17, 1917.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington.

DEAR SENATOR: I know you will pardon me for writing you again in regard to the food-control bill, for my only reason is because I want to see the legislation you are about to pass be most highly successful in results.

One of the prime purposes of this bill is to increase the production of foods. The most important thing that can be done to bring this about is to pass legislation that is fair on the face of it.

This legislation goes beyond the needs of the Army and Navy and takes up the old problem of the producer and the consumer getting nearer together, a problem that was with us long before this war and which is the very problem that brought our organizations into existence and which keeps them going, and it singles out for control all that the farmer has to sell and leaves without control all that he has to buy except fuel, if all necessaries are to be eliminated except foods, feeds, and fuels. It is perfectly proper to narrow the margin between the producer and the consumer, but it should be narrowed just the same when the product is approaching the farm as when it is leaving it, because the farmer is himself a consumer.

You can do no greater thing to encourage production of food than to make this legislation fair on its face, and you can do nothing to discourage it more than to narrow the bill until it becomes the rankest sort of class legislation that makes a "goat" of the grain farmer. Grain farmers are for real control of excessive margins between the producer and the consumer, whatever the necessary affected, or they are for none.

Hoping that this makes entirely clear to you the attitude of the grain growers toward this bill, I am, Very truly, yours. J. W. SHORTHILL, Secretary.

Mr. HUSTING. I also wish to insert here in the RECORD a memorandum of an interview I had with Mr. Shorthill on July 11 and which was reported by my stenographer. The first long paragraph contains facts as given me by Mr. Shorthill:

JULY 11, 1917.

Mr. J. W. Shorthill and Dr. Charles McCarthy called at my office to talk over with me the matter of the food bill.

Mr. J. W. Shorthill is secretary and treasurer of the Farmers' State Cooperative Association of Nebraska and was delegated by 11 State organizations, known as the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations, to represent them here at Washington in this emergency. He is visiting Washington now for the purpose of representing the National Council of Farmers' Cooperative Associations, which is comprised of 2,800 companies with more than 280,000 farmer stockholders, in connection with the legislation on the so-called food bill. Mr. Shorthill is authorized to negotiate for and speak in behalf of the national organization, the 11 State organizations, and their respective local organizations and their respective stockholders. Mr. Shorthill states that the 280,000 stockholders are bona fide, practical farmers engaged in the raising of grain and are primarily interested in growing grain, and consequently in grain prices. He states that the interest of these cooperative associations and their respective stockholders is identical. These local organizations were first formed because of the exorbitant margins charged by grain buyers in these States. Before these cooperative associations were formed grain buyers charged from 10 cents to 15 cents per bushel, and in many instance at least as high as 28 cents was charged. Since these associations have been formed the margin charged by private grain buyers has, of course, dropped greatly, although where there is no competition through cooperative associations private grain buyers still charge from 5 cents to 10 cents per bushel margin, and even more sometimes.

Mr. Shorthill states that now grain is handled for the stockholders' patrons of the several companies at about 3 cents per bushel and still leaving a legitimate profit to the stockholder association.

Senator HUSTING. Have you seen this bill that is pending?

Mr. SHORTHILL. Oh, yes; I keep in close touch with it.

Senator HUSTING. Have you as representative of the farmers whom you represent any objection to that bill?

Mr. SHORTHILL. As it stands now?

Senator HUSTING. Yes.

Mr. SHORTHILL. I am going to speak on that bill only as it would affect the grain proposition. That bill as it was first introduced was objectionable to the farmer in that it contained a provision for maximum prices. Later on it was objectionable to the farmer in that it did not contemplate a dealing with anything other than food products, which means grain as far as he is concerned.

Senator HUSTING. Now, since they have added steel, wheat, cotton, and these other various products which the farmer must buy, do you approve of the bill?

Mr. SHORTHILL. Yes, sir; as it stands at the present time. The situation of the grain grower is this: He is against the speculator manipulating any product when it is sold; he does not object to any control that may be necessary over his product when the necessity is due to the requirements of this war. He is going to raise just every bit of stuff that he can, and he is perfectly willing that it should be handled as it needs to be handled, but the only thing that he will object to at all is to have a single product singled out and controlled.

Senator HUSTING. In saying this do you feel that you are expressing the sentiments of the farmers?

Mr. SHORTHILL. There is no question in my mind about it. I have received telegrams and letters since I have come here in order to assure myself of that situation.

Senator HUSTING. Have you met any representatives of farmer organizations here who are now here objecting to this bill?

Mr. SHORTHILL. I have met a representative of farmer organizations who, to my knowledge, is opposing this bill.

Senator HUSTING. Now, it has been represented over and over again in the Senate that the farmers do not want their prices curtailed or diminished in any way, but that they are insistent on getting all that they can get. Now, I want to ask you if you don't think that the farmers of the United States are patriotic and are interested in winning this war and are willing to do whatever is fair in the way of mobilizing our resources with a fair profit to themselves?

Mr. SHORTHILL. Absolutely so; there is no question about it. The only thing that they are asking for in this legislation or in any treatment from the Government is a square deal—nothing more or nothing less. They have already in their efforts toward increased production and increased efficiency shown that this is the true sentiment of their attitude. I have in mind a particular instance. In one county of Nebraska a county defense council is organized. The basis of this organization is the school district. Each school district has a membership, and necessarily a very large majority of that membership is composed of farmers. It could not be otherwise. They held weekly meetings and do yet. They discussed how the production of that county can be increased; how farmers who are in need of help can be helped; and they are following out their discussions with the things that will meet the requirements that should be met. For instance, if a man says, because I have lost my wheat crop, I have got more land than I can plant with corn and tend it properly. They say we will see that he gets the help to plant this land with corn in order to get the food that we need. The farmer has felt that this legislation was directed to the control of his product to the exclusion of some other products which ought to be subjected to just as rigid control.

Senator HUSTING. He is willing to make his sacrifices as well as the other people have to make their sacrifices.

Mr. SHORTHILL. Absolutely.

Senator HUSTING. Would you mind stating what prices you got last fall for your wheat—let's say, the average price you got for your last year's wheat crop?

Mr. SHORTHILL. I can not give you the figures to a cent, but I figured it up, and the figures that I have given you are substantially correct. The average price for 1916, Chicago market, for No. 2 hard winter wheat was $1.37½ a bushel.

Senator HUSTING. Have you been considering the price that farmers ought to receive for their 1917 crop, having in mind the desirability of including the maximum increased production, and, of course, a fair profit to the farmer on the one hand and, on the other hand, bearing in mind the labor conditions of the country and the limited ability of men to buy necessaries of life, including flour and bread and subsistence generally? Have you talked it over sufficiently so that you feel satisfied that a fair price can be agreed upon?

Mr. SHORTHILL. I think that a price can be agreed upon that will be satisfactory to the grain grower. Their communications to me indicate that providing that prices of all other things which he might buy did not continue to advance without limit.

Senator HUSTING. Do you believe that the price that you could agree upon would enable the flour manufacturer to sell flour to the laboring man at a much cheaper price than he has been paying of late?

Mr. SHORTHILL. Yes.

Senator HUSTING. Substantially so?

Mr. SHORTHILL. Yes. I know this: That we are all alike in this matter. I have said the same thing myself. I have said this flour is getting awful high; why, the average wheat crop last year sold for a price that would make flour cheaper than this. Now, I know that if wheat stays at $3 a bushel this year and comes down to $1.50 next year that I would be wanting to buy cheaper flour because the price of wheat was down. Now I am wanting to buy cheaper flour because the price used to be down. I believe that it is possible for the margin between the grower and the consumer of the flour to be materially reduced.

Mr. Shorthill says that the farmers do not object to having their produce put in the hands of the Government along the lines suggested by the bill as amended thus far, but he also says that the farmers do not like to be discriminated against; and I do not feel that they ought to be discriminated against. I believe the President should have power over any particular industry when, in his judgment, it becomes necessary to regulate it in the interest of the whole country.

These letters of Mr. Shorthill disclose a patriotic spirit on the part of the farmers. I want to say, so far as I am concerned, that I do not think I have received a dozen letters from farmers objecting to this bill as amended. If I have done so, I have forgotten it. I do not know of any, when I come to state the exact fact, but I want to make allowance for having possibly forgotten some such. I do not remember a single objection which has been made by any farmer to the bill.

I want, however, to say that I am sure the farmers in my State—and I take it for granted the farmers in the United States generally—are just as patriotic as any other class of citizens or individuals in the United States. I think they have the welfare of the country just as much at heart, and much more at heart, than have some other people of whom I know. The farmers are thinkers and readers, and they recognize that we are in the midst of an extraordinary situation in this country; they recognize full well that unless something is done to take care of it we are going to have trouble in this country, and that we may suffer disaster as a consequence thereof. But mark this: They say, "If you are going to regulate us, then we would like to have you regulate those from whom we have to buy our commodities." I think they are right about it.

That brings up this peculiar situation. There is good and there is bad in every man; there is generosity, unselfishness, chivalry, and nobility in all men, and so there is avarice, greed, selfishness, and pettiness in all men. When the country gets into trouble the highest as well as the lowest traits of human character come into play. The people are looking to see what kind of war this is going to be. They want to know whether it is going to be a case of grab, or whether it is going to be a case of give; whether it is going to be a mad scramble to see how much everybody can get out of the Government, or whether it is going to be an eager and willing patriotic rivalry to see who can best serve the Government.

This Congress has a chance to make the choice. If by the verdict of legislation it is going to be said that this is a mad scramble to see who can get the best and "the devil take the hindmost," we are going to have a scramble, with each man trying to see how much he can get out of it, not how much he wants to give. If, on the other hand, we are going to deliver a verdict in Congress, under which the test shall be how much each man can give to his country, we are going to have cooperation, we are going to have harmony, we are going to have patriotism, we are going to have self-sacrifice, and we are going to have service. That is why I am sorry provisions covering other commodities are going to be cut out of this bill. If a commodity is necessary for the preservation of the Government, why should it not be brought within the provisions of the bill, whether it grows in the North or in the South, in the East or in the West; whether it is the product of the mines or of the fields or of the factories? Why should not all of it be put at the disposition and service of the Government?

The President's letter of the other day tells the whole story.

I do not think any distinction ought to be made at all. I think that everybody ought to come to the center, I care not whether he is in Congress or out of it. I hope when the revenue bill comes before the Senate that a substantial tax will be levied on us so that we may have the privilege of sacrifice and service in that respect at least. The measure of aid that citizens give to the Government is merely relative. When you take all that one man has and take all another man has, if one has a million dollars and the other has only a hundred dollars, they are both making the same sacrifice, no more, no less, because you have taken all from both of them. I say that when the Government does not hesitate to conscript a young man's life, his earning capacity, his future, and when it taxes him on his income down to $30 a month, a soldier's pay, no man can awaken my sympathy when it is proposed that only a part of his enormous surplus profit is going to be taken. I do not care whether you take on the one end or the other, except that it has got to be done in such a way as not to disarrange our institutions and bring about disaster in the country.

So I say, no matter whether a man grows wheat or feed or cotton, or is engaged in the production of fuel, or mines iron ore or oil, he should not want to be called a sponger on his country in time of war. Most of these men have been strong for war. They were right, and I agreed with them—not for war's sake but because I saw what was coming, or, at least, I thought I did. I saw the menace, and thought it was time to prepare for it; but, after having taken that attitude, let us not be welchers and spongers and shrink from the consequences of our own act.

Do not let us declare war on Germany and then turn to the Commander in Chief and say "Defeat Germany," and when he asks for help, for the things necessary with which to carry on that big contract, that tremendous contract, that stupendous task which we have put on him, say "You may think you need this or that, but we do not think you need it, therefore we are not going to let you have it. You are just scared; that is all; and we are not going to give it to you. We have not any responsibility or obligation, that is true; if we are defeated by Germany you will have to stand the responsibility; nevertheless we are going to withhold from you the things which are absolutely necessary and vital for you to have to defeat Germany." I say we can not afford to put ourselves in that attitude. I have always believed that the American was game, at least I thought that he was when he put his heart and soul in a cause in which he believed, and I still think so. After the President has said, "We have got to have certain powers and your cooperation and assistance in order to make the world safe for democracy and to make safe that which lies so close to our hearts, our independence," let no one come and whine and beg and squeal to be left undisturbed in his mad chase to coin dollars out of the blood of those who must fight and die that our country may live. Let them rather come here and ask "How much do you need to carry on this war? Tell us what you want, and here it is." Let them come in a spirit of service. Let them not come as money changers instead of hewers of wood and drawers of water. That is the type of American I have in my mind—the one who will say, "I will help you." That is the expression that ought to come from every side of life in this great country in sustaining the President in this great war.

The farmer does not want to be left out. Gentlemen are defending the farmer. I want to say that while I do not think they hold a brief for him, he does not want to be left out, as I understand, where it is necessary, and when everybody else is included in the same way. If the Senate in its wisdom should cut out everything but food, feeds, and fuels, including oil, I am going to offer an amendment to insert the words "and such other commodities as the President from time to time may deem necessary and so promulgate by proclamation." I think such a provision is necessary; and when you once say it is necessary, argument ceases. There is no room for further argument about it. When once it is conceded and admitted that things are necessary, then they have got to be done; that is all. If there are any who fear the political consequences at home by reason of their vote when men are ready to be slaughtered on the battle field, I say they ought to be willing, in the interest of what they conceive to be their duty, to be among the politically dead or wounded or the missing from this Chamber. Let them make at least that sacrifice, if necessary. That is not bad; that does not compare with the sacrifice of the soldier who goes to the front and risks or loses his life in defense of his country. Shall he be afraid to risk his political existence in defense of his country when our brave boys at the front are ready and willing to die for our country. I say, I think a Senator is mistaken when he assumes that his vote in defense of his country will cut short his political career; but if that attitude is taken by anybody for fear of votes and political consequences, let him not deceive himself, in the first place; and, in the second place, let him not prove himself a coward, afraid to die a political death, when hundreds of thousands or millions are willing to die upon the battle fields of his country so that that country shall not perish from the earth.

There is another reason why this bill must pass. Everybody knows that wage earners can not make both ends meet at present. It is not a question of extravagance by any means. It is a question of brass tacks. He can not make both ends meet when he has got to pay 50 cents a pound for butter, 40 cents a pound for meat, four, five, six, or seven dollars a bushel for potatoes, fourteen to eighteen dollars a barrel for flour, six or seven dollars for a pair of shoes, and so forth. Nobody need get up here and say that the middleman gets it all, unless he will go further and say that if the middleman does get it all it is about time to choke him off. It is about time to choke off anybody who is exploiting this country at this time.

We had the middleman before this war started, did we not? We had just as many middlemen before the war started as we have now, and with all that, you could buy potatoes at 50 cents a bushel; you could buy flour for six or seven dollars a barrel; you could buy all of these other commodities, and we were not complaining of the middleman then. Somehow, somewhere, and all the time, some men are taking out of this pot more than belongs to them. They would like to take it all out if we would let them take it all. They will get it all if we do not stop them.

Who is really objecting to this bill in this great country of ours? The farmers are not doing it. The people are not doing it. The laboring element is not doing it. Where does it come from? Who is back of this opposition in the country if it is not the men directly and pecuniarily interested in not having certain things done? Who are these men who are so suspicious of the President and are so unsuspicious of the speculators on the boards of trade and all these fellows who deal in futures—the food manipulators, the coal barons, and so forth? Who are the men who reach over and put their hands in and take out what they want and fill their own pockets? Who has such bland and childlike confidence in the powers that are running the food situation now, and who so distrustful of the President and his appointee, Mr. Hoover, if it is not the men who are going to be hurt by it?

I am talking now of men outside of the Senate Chamber. I am not questioning the motives of anybody in this Chamber. I am trying to find out in my own mind who are the men interested in defeating this bill and delaying it for weeks and weeks.

We know what has been happening all over the country. It has happened before. There have been outbursts of rage against the extortionate food dealer, the manipulator, and all these fellows, and they have said: "Hang him! Hang him! Hang him!" Nobody has been hanged yet, but in place of hanging the culprits they have been pillorying innocent men who are not trying to rob us, but who ask only the privilege of serving us.

Instead of trying and executing the culprits who are responsible, in part at least, for the high cost of living, Senators want to try and execute the man whom the President called across the sea to serve the people. Braving the perils of the lurking submarine, Mr. Hoover came at his country's call to consecrate his talents and his service to his country's cause. He did not come here asking "How much do I get?" He came here with his hands outstretched, asking what he could do and how he could serve. His life and his record are his best shields against the assaults of his own countrymen. The world knows Hoover and trusts him, even though a few of his less appreciative and less discerning fellow citizens do not. This, however, is their misfortune, not Mr. Hoover's, and I have no doubt that the services that he is going to render in this supreme emergency will vindicate him and win the appreciation of those gentlemen who now attack and revile him.

But the same tactics have been directed against the President.

I tell you, Mr. President, that when the history of this war shall have been written, and when copious extracts shall have been taken from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the last two years, and those that come after us read this history and read the RECORD, they will wonder how one lone man could stand up against such incessant attacks and constantly interpose obstructions. Everything that has been given to the President has been given, grudgingly, hesitatingly, doubtfully, distrustfully. It has been the exception if it has ever been given cheerfully at all. Everything that has been asked for by the President has been handed over to him with an unwilling hand. Why, the President has been looked upon as a man to be distrusted. He has had to show cause. The burden of proof has always been on him, not only to show that these things were necessary, but to show that if he got them he would not murder us and rob us all overnight, such has been the suspicion that has grown apace, the distrust that has been shown in this Chamber against the President on the part of some Senators. And what a remarkable thing it is that notwithstanding all these assaults and attacks that have been made upon him he is the one man that commands the confidence of the whole country to-day.

Why, when we reflect upon this campaign that has been made against him, instead of killing the President in the minds of the people, instead of poisoning their minds against him, it has reacted against those who have attempted to poison the people's minds against the President. It is a boomerang. The shells that have been shot out of the big guns in this Chamber have rebounded back in their own faces, and to-day I make the statement, and I know that no one here will contradict me, that if there is one man in the United States that has the confidence of the people of the United States it is the President of the United States. There is not a bigger asset that this country has in this emergency than Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States. He is the one man around whom all the people are ready to rally. The people are willing to follow him; and if you have received the same kind of letters that I have received from my constituents and friends, the question has not been, "Why does not Mr. Wilson follow Congress and let them do what they please?"

They have all been of the same tenor: "Why does not the Congress give the President what he wants—what he asks?" That is the way the letters read. Read the papers, read the editorials, listen to the sermons from the pulpit; they are all of the same import: "Stand by the President; support him. Back him up, and if you back him up we will back you up; and if you do not back him up, why, look out for squalls; that is all."

The people are in no temper to be fooled with now. They want things done. They are wiser than we are. They sense it. Out in this great wide country of ours the thinker, the student, humble in occupation as he may be, senses the necessities of the hour; and instead of losing any sleep for fear that the President will get too much power, too much unconstitutional power, they are losing sleep because they are afraid that their representatives will not back up the President of the United States in what he ought to have and in what he is asking. That is the situation right here in this country.

Now, take the laboring man. Suppose the present high cost of living does not go down, and suppose the wages of the laboring man do not go up—what are you going to have here? Men will not starve themselves or their families and not complain. Nobody need question that at all. Men will not starve in a land of plenty and then give three cheers for the Stars and Stripes; no, sir! They will not tolerate it, and they ought not to tolerate it. I do not say that they have the right to take the law into their own hands, and I hope and I say, God forbid that they will ever do so; but I fear that some will; and when men are starving they have not much regard for conventions. They have got to have something to eat. They are either going to strike for higher wages or they are going to insist that the price of commodities shall come down.

This is not a one-sided affair. This is a reciprocal affair. No one of us can live for himself alone. Neither a farmer nor a manufacturer nor a professional man nor a Member of Congress can rightfully say: "We do not like this business of price fixing. We think it all humbug. We think it is unconstitutional. We think it is supererogation of power if the President takes it, and an undue delegation of power if we give it to him." That does not answer the question. The question is, What must be done to relieve a situation that exists. We do not like the situation, but it is here. Facts are stubborn things, and facts must be dealt with. It is abnormal that good, willing, competent men who work should not make enough to support their families. War is an abnormal situation; this the most abnormal war of all times. Abnormal ills require abnormal remedies. How are we going to keep starvation off the people? Had we not better keep in mind the fact that the man that works at the forge or in the mine or in the factory has a right to live? And shall any man say: "I want three or four dollars a bushel for my wheat, and I do not care if the whole country starves"? Shall the manufacturer say: "I do not care what I charge for machinery; it is my business, and I am going to charge what I want to, no matter how many people starve, if they do not want to buy it"? Shall the coal operators say, "Let them freeze if they can not afford to pay the price which we please to charge"? Shall everybody say this is the time to make money and I do not want my opportunity or my business interfered with? They and we do owe an obligation to see that people do not starve here, do not freeze here; and now, in a time of war like this, especially when men are called upon to make all kinds of sacrifices, why should not everybody in some way, some measure, somehow, make a little sacrifice, not by giving a few cents more than his neighbor, but by making some sacrifice of some kind that will put him on a par with his fellows in point of sacrifice and service?

So, if I understand the spirit of the American people correctly, I believe that that is the composite, crystallized sentiment of the people, if you want to take advantage of it; but, as I said before, if it is going to be a case of selfishness, of every man for himself, every man to see how much he can get out of it, you can have the other side of the picture, and you will get the consequences.

It does seem to me that now, when it becomes clearer and clearer every day that this war was inevitable, unescapable, not because of any fault of our own nor because of any cause or power within our control, and righteous, and in the interests of humanity and for the purpose of making the world safe for democracy, that this is the time for the people of the United States to get together. There have been differences among us, very deep-seated differences between the employer and the employee, between the lender and the borrower, and between the different classes and divisions of society. This is a fine opportunity to get them together by everybody being a comrade to everybody else and saying, "Come on; we will all work together in some way to help make this war a success." Then you will wipe out sectional differences; you will wipe out differences between the laborer and his employer; you will wipe out the prejudices of class, and everybody will see that his neighbor is just as good and patriotic a man as he is and even recognize that he is, if anything, just a little bit better than himself. But you can only do that by sounding the toesin of unity and harmony, teamwork, cooperation, and of sacrifice and unselfish service in this country; and you can not get it by one class trying to outmaneuver the other class and to get undue advantage over it. The thing that lands the pickpocket and every other malefactor in the penitentiary is his idea that he is smarter than everybody else, and that he can do things against his fellows and against fair play and good conscience and get away with it.

That is how he gets there; and any class of people that for any great length of time think that they can get the better of the 110,000,000 people of the United States are going to find themselves in a very bad and serious predicament. They can not fool them; and consequently the only way to do is to have fair play and mutual helpfulness and cooperation between everybody, and have everybody do his share. The time is here when every man should carry his part of the load—pull his own oar.

This is not a moneyed man's war. This is not a Wall Street war. This is not a munition makers' war nor a manufacturers' war. Oh, no! This is a war of the people of the United States, of all of the people of the United States; and being a war of all of the people of the United States, all of the people of the United States have got to stick together to bear and win it. If any great or substantial portion or class of the people of this country are going to say: "George, you go to the war; George, you pay; George, you must both fight and pay and I will help wave the flag at home and help in the cheering—and make the profit, incidentally—and I will stay home and put my hands into your pocket and into your treasury and take your job. I will take your business," you will discover that the man that is fighting at the front will not like it; the man at home, toiling and sacrificing in his own little way, will not like it; and you can not respect them if they do like it, because that is not the stuff of which American citizens are made. Fair play is what the American citizen wants, and he will get it if he has to fight for it.

The time for deceiving one another has gone by. People know their rights, and knowing them dare maintain them. So I say, here is the opportunity to demonstrate to one another and to all of us together what a real, united American citizenship means. And whether it is in this kind of a bill about foodstuffs or not, no man need think, "I do not care what happens with everybody else's business as long as it does not hurt mine," and thus bring on the old fights, similar to the tariff fights that you have gone through for years and years in the past, when many Members of Congress thought they were patriots if they could make one section pay more than a just share of the common expenses.

Do not let anybody think, "That is a good plan, if I can evade it and get out of it. It is all right if it does not touch me." No; we can not do that if we want to be fair and honest and candid with one another.

So that this bill, as far as this is concerned, ought to be on that plane. The revenue bill ought to be on that plane. It ought to be on a plane where every man carries his load and pulls his oar, someway and somehow. So right here and now I can not see how we can hesitate and pause and refrain from doing something that everybody knows and feels, right in his bones, is vital for the salvation of this country.

So I say, in the interest of this bill and bills that are coming after it, instead of fighting right here at home and wasting at least half our strength in defending ourselves from ourselves, the country ought to have its back clear at home, at least, and all thought, all energy, all purpose, ought to be concentrated on the business of the hour. It is the biggest business that any man here in the Senate or in public life will have, and the biggest piece of business that any manufacturer, farmer, miner, or anybody else will have in all his life. What does it profit a man if he gains the world and loses his own soul?

What does a man want with his property in this country if the country has to go down? So back of every mine and every mill and every farm and every home is the thought of the preservation of the Union, the perpetuation of the institutions of the country. I would not give a fig for the best farm or the best factory or the best mine or the best political office in the world if this country is going to go down, because I do not want to live in this country if it goes down. I do not even want to live in a world made safe only for German autocracy, for German frightfulness, for German militarism, and all that those words imply.

So I say that is the biggest piece of business we have got. When men complain about our Government interfering with their business I reply that Germany is interfering with our business, and it is your business, and you have not got any other business in the world at the present time more important than the defeat of Germany, so as to make the world a proper place for people to live in, so that you can make it safe for democracy, safe for the people of the world. The world for centuries has been fighting and working for the light of democracy. Now when the light shines and the dawn of the day of democracy is breaking, shall we falter and hesitate and procrastinate until the light goes out? At such a time shall we not discard every selfish consideration of personal business interests and concentrate and unify all the manhood, all the force, all the power that we possess to break down and overthrow once and for all the powers that make for darkness and not for light? Let these all be united in one blow to save the world from the curse of autocracy and the curse of slavery, from national, industrial, commercial, and spiritual slavery, the worst that the world has ever known.

Mr. KELLOGG. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I wish to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Without objection, the amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. POMERENE. I present an amendment relating to the subject of coal, coke, and petroleum. I ask that it be printed for the information of the Senate and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on July 17, 1917, approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) to relieve the owners of mining claims, who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the terms of such service.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Massachusetts Branch of the National Woman's Party, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which was referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Redlands Chapter of the Woman's Section of the Navy League of California, praying for universal military training and for an increase of the aviation forces of the United States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Redlands, Cal., praying for the construction of a road along the coast of Los Angeles and Ventura Counties and between Topanga Canyon and Hueneme for military purposes, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 2654) providing for the appointment of two additional district judges in the State of Illinois; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2655) to extend the penal laws of the States prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors to any lands within such States under jurisdiction of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 84) authorizing the drafting of aliens, except alien enemies, into the military service of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. PHELAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2445) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

SELECTIVE DRAFT.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table prepared by the Secretary of War relative to the apportionment of each State to be drafted under the act to increase the Military Establishment of the United States, approved May 13, 1917.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 12, 1917.

By virtue of the authority vested in him by an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 13, 1917, the President of the United States has ordered the aggregate number of 687,000 men to be raised by draft for the military service of the United States, in order to bring to full strength the organizations of the Regular Army and the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the military service of the United States and to create the National Army, and has caused said aggregate number to be apportioned to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia as set forth in the schedule hereto appended.

The governor of each State and Territory and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, acting for and by the direction of the President and in accordance with said act of Congress and rules and regulations prescribed pursuant thereto, shall apportion the quota so apportioned to such State, Territory, or District and shall communicate to each local board established in such State, Territory, or District notice of the net quota to be furnished by such board; and such net quotas shall thereupon be furnished by the respective local boards as required by said act of Congress and rules and regulations prescribed pursuant thereto.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Wednesday, July 18, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, July 19, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 18, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we pray with all the strength and fervor of soul that Thy kingdom may speedily come in the hearts of all Thy children.

That the widespread unrest, contentions, strife, and the terrible war, which involves all the world in its wide desolation, may cease.

The world is large enough, fruitful enough for all, if selfishness should give way to generosity, hate to love, revenge to kindness.

So many gods, so many creeds, so many paths that wind and wind,
But all that the sad world needs is just the art of being kind.

Hear us, O Lord, and out of Thy great mercy answer our petition. To the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 14, 1917, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that on July 17, 1917, the President approved a bill and joint resolution of the following numbers and titles:

H. R. 5405. An act making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives; and

S. J. Res. 33. Joint resolution to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 646) for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins.

Also, that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 4892) authorizing the President to take possession, on behalf of the United States, for use as sites for permanent aviation stations for the Army and Navy and for aviation-school purposes, of the whole of North Island, in the harbor of San Diego, Cal., and for other purposes, in which amendment the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution by the Farmers' Union of Colorado against some of the provisions of the food-control bill.

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement that was entered into with great particularity the last day we met nothing is to be done here to-day except to adjourn.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. I did not know that applied.

The SPEAKER. That was settled after it was thrashed out thoroughly.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a 15-minute talk in reference to the shipbuilding situation and controversy between Gen. Goethals and Mr. Denman.

The SPEAKER. No; under that agreement no one can talk here to-day.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That agreement was entered into on the objection of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that the former agreement was not lived up to.

Mr. HARDY. It will be no use to have these contracts all let, to lock the door after the horse is stolen.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is simply carrying out the order of the House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Would it be in order for me to say that I did not object the last time we met. I simply asked two questions of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and he made the statement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not reflecting at all upon the gentleman from Wisconsin. He was stating what happened here.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state for the information of the House——

Mr. MANN. That is not in order.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman desires to object, I shall not proceed further.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Saturday, July 21, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the United States Public Health Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918 (H. zones about all military camps in the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. RANDALL: Petition of Woodlawn Missionary Society, of Los Angeles, Cal., favoring the prohibition of the liquor business as a war measure; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, memorial of Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Pomona, Cal., protesting against the waste of enormous quantities of food in the manufacture of beer and wine, and refusing to sign or indorse any compact to cut down the bread for our families while this enormous waste is countenanced by Congress and the President; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 19, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, July 18, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, lest we forget, I rise to recall to our minds a resolution that was passed by the Continental Congress on the 27th day of February, 1777. Indeed, judging from the votes that were cast in this Chamber on the 7th day of this month, I fear it had slipped the minds of many of us.

It will come as a distinct surprise to some Congressmen that the question of food conservation, which we have hitherto prided ourselves upon as the very most recent invention, demanded attention in 1777. And it will certainly startle some to be reminded that in that connection the Congress went its limit, without presidential interference or correspondence with the Antisaloon League, for bone-dry conservation of foodstuffs.

BONE-DRY IN 1777.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the several legislatures of the United States immediately to pass laws the most effectual for putting an immediate stop to the pernicious practice of distilling grain, by which the most extensive evils are likely to be derived if not quickly prevented.

That was passed 140 years ago. Nobody had ever seen a kerosene lamp, or a cookstove, or a steamboat, or a locomotive, or a postage stamp, or dreamed of a telephone, automobile, flying machine, or submarine. Those were slow and dreamy days, but Congress passed a more sensible and more effective conservation bill—within its limitations—in five minutes than this Senate, living in these days of enlightened progress, has been able to pass in five weeks. And incidentally, to the boundaries of its limitations, it passed a more statesmanlike bone-dry law than this Senate seems to be willing to enact.

But they had some distinct advantages—that was before the adoption of the Constitution and before the unconstitutional ghost was stalked at every legislative feast. And they had some disadvantages—unfortunately they could not enact any law binding upon anybody, and their resolution met in the legislatures the fate that great things often meet at the hands of small men.

BEER HAD NOT YET DISCOVERED AMERICA.

Some critic may urge that the measure was not bone-dry, since it did not mention brewing. At that date beer had not discovered America. The Government has no record of the beer industry prior to 1840—63 years after the adoption of this resolution—and then the per capita consumption was but 1.36 gallons, or less than one-twelfth the per capita consumption of last year.

CLEAR-VISIONED MEN.

This was the urgent and heartfelt appeal of earnest men for immediate action forbidding the transformation of their strength-giving grains into a poison which was certain to bring a flood of social and domestic disorders. They were without the modern knowledge of the physical effect of alcohol upon the human system and the physical economy. They were without the guidance of the experience of charitable, correctional, and penal institutions. They did not have the testimony of judges of every court, of peace officers of every grade, and of cities and States of every section all witnessing the destructive and corrosive civic and social effects of drink. And sir, it was before the advent of the saloon; it was before drunkenness was looked upon as a weakness; it was before the ministers of Christ either shunned it or looked upon it with marked disfavor; it was before the employer of labor discriminated against the drinker; it was before insurance companies frowned upon alcohol; it was before the church demanded total abstinence; it was before the school taught the effects of the poison; it was before there was a square inch of prohibition territory in the Anglo-Saxon world. That Congress was a world-renowned gathering that is remembered to-day with more veneration, respect, and love than many, perhaps than any, of its successors. Are they remembered for their wisdom? For their time they were wise men, but wisdom accumulates with the years. There is not a man in this Chamber that does not know more of electricity than Franklin, who knew more of it then than any other of his time. But, sir, they are not remembered for their learning. Are they remembered for their oratory? There were but few orators among them, and this Chamber holds the equal of their best. Are they remembered for their literary attainments? Their literary men, though great, were few.

MEN OF COURAGE.

There is one characteristic that elevates that Congress to an eminence of fame approached by no other; it is the sublime courage with which they faced the vexing problems of their day.

> In face of death they dared to fling
> Defiance to a tyrant king!

But that was the small beginning of their courage. They dared open-mindedly to face the revered traditions, customs, usages, and precedents of the awesome past and bend submissive knee to naught but truth. If in facing the pregnant issues of this hour this Senate will emulate them in that, its fame will be as glorious and endure as long.

THEY LABORED FOR THEIR FELLOW MEN.

One trait alone commends them to the lasting love of a forgetful world—they loved and labored for their fellow men. And this resolution I have read is but a single incident in proof of it. To distill grain took food from the hungry. Enough! Let it stop immediately. Let the laws be effectual. Again, from it extensive evils are likely to be derived. Enough! Let it be quickly prevented. In a single sentence of 46 words 3 of them denote speed and action and 2 indicate thoroughness; had the various legislatures heeded their appeal, this Nation would have escaped the "extensive evils that have been derived from the traffic" which our fathers of that Congress so clearly foresaw, and its illustrious glory, beauty, strength, and position would have reached heights of grandure, service, and leadership now only shadowed in our fond, ambitious dreams. Doubtless cupidity on the one hand and cowardice on the other joined to balk this purpose of the gods and thwart the hope our patriotic fathers bore. For cupidity and cowardice ever join against the onward march of man—cupidity of those who get gain from the vices, misfortunes, and inequities which civilization seeks to cure, and the cowardice of those who fear to set the gauge of battle against intrenched wrong, and for a new-born struggling right. Sir, read that resolution again; it demands the conservation of the grain from every form of intoxicants that then consumed it. Dares this Senate pass its equal now?

THE ROLL CALL OF THE PAST.

Benjamin Franklin and Robert Morris then occupied the Pennsylvania seats. The Adamses and Howard Treat Payne were worthy representatives of the character as well as the culture of the old Bay State. Patrick Henry, Benjamin Harrison, and Peyton Randolph spoke for Old Dominion, while Stephen Hopkins, of Rhode Island, and John Jay and Philip Livingstone, of New York, clothed with solemn dignity and perfumed with moral worth the honor of the seats that they filled with such lofty purpose and distinguished patriotism. May we commend ourselves to the honor and love of posterity by courage as lofty and aspirations as holy as moved our illustrious predecessors.

THEY BLAZED THE TRAIL OF HUMAN PROGRESS.

They cut new highways for the better day to come. They asked no counsel of the murky past, but lifted their eyes to the dawn and strove on. We, their successors, now stand in the noontide of the day whose gray morning they helped to usher in by the light of their new concept of the purpose of government—to guarantee the "life, liberty, and happiness" of the people. And the liquor traffic stands repugnant to and destructive of life, the protection of which is the first sacred purpose of government; and of liberty, that sweet heritage so dear that brave men have ever counted it a duty and a joy to give their lives and fortunes to advance its cause; and happiness, without which both life and liberty rest as empty burdens upon the human soul. And, sir, Benjamin Franklin and Samuel Adams and Patrick Henry and their compatriots who adopted that marvelously patriotic resolution, every word of which is weighted with significance and force, saw, even in the dusk of that dawning, the wanton waste of needed food "and the extensive evils likely to be derived," and, though there were few abstainers in the group, had the courage that this pampered age seems hardly to possess to act with clear-eyed statesmanship and with purpose single to the Nation's good.

LIBERTY ENLIGHTENING THE WORLD.

Nor has the divinely planted zeal that this Nation shall light the world to liberty's shrine and free all peoples from the galling chains of the maudlin god of wine ever left the bosoms of some of her most gifted and patriotic sons.

Abraham Lincoln, 65 years after the historic resolution which I have read was adopted in Congress, gave utterance to that lofty aspiration. He compared the political bondage suffered under King George III, which could trammel only the body or the outward shell of men, to the slavery of the soul inflicted by that "invisible spirit of wine" for which Shakespeare, viewing its hellish work, could find no proper name but "devil." I quote with reverence from the words of the martyred emancipator, who towers above most of his illustrious compatriots as the Matterhorn lifts its lofty head into the sun-lit blue above the shadowed foothills and the copse below. Before him lay in clear perspective the tyranny of monarchial oppression and the servitude of domestic slaves. Liberty was his passion, and he spoke in well-weighed words, with values thoughtfully compared:

A PROPHET'S VOICE.

Turn now to the temperance revolution. In it we shall find a stronger bondage broken, a viler slavery manumitted, a greater tyrant deposed; in it more of want supplied, more of disease healed, more sorrow assuaged. By it no orphans starving, no widows weeping; by it none wounded in feeling, none injured in interest; even the dram maker and dramseller will have glided into other occupations and stand ready to join all others in the universal song of gladness. And what a noble ally this to the cause of political freedom; with such an aid its march can not fail to be on and on, till every son of earth shall drink in rich fruition the sorrow-quenching draughts of perfect liberty.

And when the victory shall be complete—when there shall be neither a slave nor a drunkard on the earth—how proud the title of that land which may truly claim to be the birthplace and the cradle of both those revolutions that shall have ended in victory! How nobly distinguished that people who shall have planted and nurtured to maturity both the political and moral freedom of their species!

This was delivered by Abraham Lincoln before the Washingtonians at Springfield, Ill., February 22, 1842.

Sir, we can not honor Lincoln nor our patriot fathers of the first Congress by prating their praise. If we would do them homage we must do bravely as they by fearless word and courageous deed have taught. When confronted, as we now are, by a national foe of such pernicious power as to lay threat to the citadel of our national liberty and honor and to menace and destroy the sacred purposes for which governments are instituted among men, we must act with a courage and patriotism worthy of such sires. I can not more appropriately close than with other words from Lincoln's lips:

WE SHALL NOT FAIL.

If ever I feel the soul within me elevate and expand to those dimensions not wholly unworthy of its Almighty Architect, it is when I contemplate the cause of my country, deserted by all the world beside, and I standing up boldly and alone and hurling defiance at her victorious oppressors. Here, without contemplating consequences, before high heaven, and in the face of the world, I swear eternal fidelity to the just cause, as I deem it, of the land of my life, my liberty, and my love.

And who that thinks with me will not fearlessly adopt the oath that I take?

Let none falter who thinks he is right, and we may succeed. But if, after all, we shall fail, be it so, we still shall have the proud consolation of saying to our consciences and to the departed shade of our country's freedom that the cause approved of our judgment, and adored of our hearts, in disaster, in chains, in torture, in death, we never faltered in defending. And we shall not fail—if we stand firm, we shall not fail.

This was delivered by Abraham Lincoln in the statehouse at Springfield, Ill., in December, 1839.

OVERTAKE THE PAST.

Senators, why not catch up with our ancestors? Why not enact into law the advice of the Congress of 1777 for food conservation, and attain for the Nation the vision of glory that charmed the prophetic eyes of Abraham Lincoln?

CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced Senate resolution 106. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] objected to its consideration because he thought it would lead to discussion. I understand now that he has withdrawn his objection, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. It was read yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 106, submitted yesterday by Mr. SMOOT, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he hereby is, requested to transmit to the Senate such information as may be in the hands of the Shipping Board to show what contracts have been let or are pending for the construction of ships under the authority of that board, the names of the contractors, the location and capacity of their yards, the price per ton to be paid to them, the nature and amount of any advances to be made to them from Government funds, together with any other information which will indicate the disposition of appropriations already made for the uses of the Shipping Board or which will assist the Senate in the consideration of requests from the said board for further appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has just come in. Is the resolution before the Senate now?

Mr. SMOOT. I have just asked unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

CENSUS FOR MILITARY DRAFT (S. DOC. NO. 64).

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th instant, information relative to the estimates of population based upon the results of the registration of June 5, 1917, furnished by the Bureau of the Census in accordance with the request of the Provost Marshal General of the War Department. It seems to be a public document, and the Chair will order it, with the accompanying paper, to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Pennsylvania praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Suffrage League of Fairfield County and of the National Woman's Party in the State of Connecticut praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution granting the right of suffrage to women, which were referred to the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of the Robert Emmett Literary Club, of Torrington, Conn., praying for the independence of Ireland, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Hartford Section of the Council of Jewish Women, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to protect the morals of soldiers and to prohibit vice at Army posts, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the Central Labor Union of Baltic, of organized labor of Danbury, of the Hartford Central Labor Union, and of the Norwich Central Labor Union, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the passage of the pending food-control bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

BILL INTRODUCED.

A bill was introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WEEKS:

A bill (S. 2656) to establish a staff war corps of the United States Navy, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill H. R. 4960, an act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have three amendments to the pending bill, one of which I should like to have printed in the RECORD; and I ask that they may remain on the table.

There being no objection, the first amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In section 12, page 22, line 21, strike out the figures "$1.75" and the word "one" and insert the figures "$2" and the word "two," so that the line shall read "shall be $2 per bushel for No. 2 northern"; also, in the same section and on the same page, at the commencement of line 22, insert the words "based on Chicago market," so that the proviso, commencing with line 18, will read as follows:

"Provided, however, That the minimum price of wheat from the passage of this act to the 1st day of January, 1919, shall be $2 per bushel for No. 2 northern, based on Chicago market, and the board of food administration shall establish rules and regulations as to difference in price for the standard grades and as to places and conditions of delivery."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, at this point in the procedure, deems it appropriate to call attention to that part of the unanimous-consent agreement which reads:

That no amendment shall be proposed to the bill from and after the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. of the calendar day of Friday, July 20, 1917, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is why I present the amendments now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But I do not think you have done so in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement. That is why I am making this statement. Ordinarily there can be only one amendment to a bill pending at one time. That amendment must be disposed of in some way before another can be offered to the bill. The presentation of an amendment to have it printed and lie on the table is not the presentation of an amendment to the bill at all. It is simply printed for the information of Senators, and must subsequently be offered by the Senator at some appropriate time when no other amendment is pending. But the Chair thinks that a fair interpretation of the unanimous-consent agreement is to waive this rule, and that prior to the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. of the calendar day of Friday, July 20, any Senator may present an amendment with a notice that he expects to have it a pending amendment to be voted upon under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement, and that such action will entitle him to have a vote upon such amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is the construction I gave the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator asked to have the amendments lie on the table. The Chair understands that the Senator expects to have them voted on.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But some time before the bill is disposed of.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. GRONNA. I introduce the following amendment. I should like to have it read. I ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the proviso on page 22 of the amendment and insert:

The United States hereby guarantees and agrees to pay from the date this act becomes a law to the 30th day of June, 1919, for all wheat raised in the continental United States and tendered to it at any of the five principal interior primary markets, to be designated by the board, not less than $2 per bushel for standard contract grades in such markets. The grades shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, as by law provided. The price for other grades to be based upon the said standard grades. The board shall make rules specifying the conditions of delivery and for the proper carrying out of the provisions of this paragraph.

The provisions of this act for the execution of the guaranty by the Government of minimum prices of wheat shall apply to the minimum prices covered by this paragraph.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GRONNA. Just a moment. I think I made a mistake in asking to have the amendment printed and lie on the table. I mean to have the amendment pending to the bill so that it may be offered in accordance with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not want to have any misunderstanding. I desire to have my amendments pending. I do not want to be shut out from offering them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendments tendered by the Senator from Kansas and the amendment tendered by the Senator from North Dakota are to be voted upon some time by the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Oregon will permit me, I desire to have three amendments, which I send to the desk, considered as pending. They have already been read, and I think it is not necessary to formally read them, but I should like to have them considered as pending.

While I have the floor I desire to have considered as pending the following two amendments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That we may have an orderly procedure, may I suggest that the bill be taken up section by section, beginning with section 1, and that amendments to the sections as we reach them be disposed of? I think that procedure would be more orderly than if we would undertake to consider amendments to different sections throughout the bill. I hope that that order may be followed unless there is some objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not any power to say how amendments may be considered. When the Senator from Oregon, in charge of the bill, gets through with the committee amendments, the bill is open to amendments. The Chair can not fix the order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I shall not insist on it. I was merely expressing the hope that that might be done. Then I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the construction of the unanimous-consent agreement by the Chair I offer the following amendment and ask that it may be considered as pending. It has already been read, and it is not necessary to read it again.

Mr. KELLOGG. Before taking the recess last evening I offered an amendment to be printed. I give notice that I desire to have the amendment voted upon.

Mr. POMERENE. I present the following amendment, which was ordered printed on yesterday. I ask that it be regarded as pending.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk the following amendment and ask that it be regarded as a pending amendment. I should like to have the proposed amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 9 of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to section 1.

Mr. KENYON. I offer the following amendment to the amendment: Insert after the word "gasoline"—I do not know the line; the Secretary will ascertain that—the words "iron ore and its products, farm implements, and farm tools."

I shall not take any particular time to discuss the amendment to the amendment. It simply enlarges the definition of necessaries so as to cover iron and steel and their products, also farm implements and farm tools. I think this is due to the farmers. I offer it merely on the theory that everything the farmer produces is subject to this act, and the act ought to be broadened to cover those things which he is compelled to buy. This is merely asking a square deal for the farmer. That he is entitled to; more he does not ask. No one need worry as to the farmer doing his part to help win this war. For the good of the Nation I beg of you to do nothing to discourage the farmers of the country and thus injure production. I have not covered binding twine, which, possibly, should be included. I realize that if this definition of necessaries should be unduly enlarged it perhaps would make difficult the passage of the bill, but I do feel that iron and steel and farm implements ought to be included in the bill. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to take just a few minutes of the time of the Senate to give Members of the Senate some information as to the increased cost of producing grain. During this year it will cost the farmers of the United States for binding twine alone more than $33,000,000 above the normal cost. I now invite the attention of Senators from the South. I ask if they know that we are paying them for cotton in the use of canvases for our binders more than $2,000,000? We buy from you more than that amount of cotton cloth for our binders. This season that price has increased to us more than five and a half million dollars; in other words, we are paying a premium to the cotton farmers of the South of more than three and a half million dollars merely for binder canvases. I am not saying that you are getting too much for your cotton, but I believe, when you understand the situation, that you will wish to be fair and to treat the farmers who produce grain the same as you would treat them if they lived in your own section of the country.

Let me tell you another thing with which the farmers of the United States have to contend, and I am sorry to say that the United States has been a party to this robbery. In ordinary times the cost of transportation of hemp or twine from Manila to New York is 30 cents a hundred, while to-day it is $5.60. This indefensible freight rate has, I understand, been approved by the Shipping Board.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator give us this information: Can he state just how much that would add to the cost of a bushel of wheat?

Mr. GRONNA. I can only tell the Senator what it would add to the total cost to the farmers of the United States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What I desire to know is what it would add to the cost per bushel of wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. We use in a single year 250,000,000 pounds of binder twine; we use probably 50,000,000 pounds more for cordage; in round numbers, we use 300,000,000 pounds of all sorts of hemp. The principal part of that comes from Yucatan, and consists of sisal fiber, and the price has in the last year been increased from 6 cents to 19 cents per pound; but the people of Yucatan say, "We are basing our prices upon the prices of manila."

Yet the United States Government is a party to raising the price of binder twine to the American farmer in ocean freight rates from 30 cents a hundred to $5.60.

Senators, these are facts which can not be contradicted. I think it is fair to presume that there are 20,000,000 women on the farms in the United States, and the farmers are not so cruel but that they want to give their wives at least one or two Mother Hubbards or wrappers during the year. We know that it takes about 10 yards of cotton to make a cheap calico dress. We used to buy cotton at 5 cents a yard, the material costing the women 50 cents, while to-day it is costing them $1.20; in other words, these 20,000,000 women are paying to you people of the South $12,000,000 more for one dress for each woman in the United States beyond what they paid before the war.

Every man upon the farm has to have a few pairs of overalls, and he has to have at least one new pair for Sunday. Suppose we say that the farmer uses four pairs of overalls during the year. No one will contradict the statement that the price of the overalls to the farmer before the war was about, or on an average, 75 cents, and the overalls which he could buy for 75 cents at that time are to-day costing $1.50.

There are at least 20,000,000 men living upon farms. Multiply that by 4, add 100 per cent, and see what the additional tribute the farmer on the grain-producing farms is paying to the cotton manufacturer of the South. I want to say to you it is unfair to take out of this bill all the products which necessarily must be consumed and used by the farmer.

I want to refer to the price of steel and I see before me the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who, I am sure, knows a great deal more about steel than do I; but I have been told by men who ought to know that a reasonable price for steel in normal times is a cent and a half a pound, or $30 a ton. To-day the price of steel is from 4½ cents a pound to 5 cents a pound. I do not know how many million pounds of steel are being used by the farmers of the United States, but I know that there are millions of tons being used in the manufacture of their farm implements. Necessarily, if you compel them to pay this tremendous price for steel, the men who are manufacturing farming implements must add this increased cost to the cost of the machinery. We can not expect the manufacturers of farming implements in these times, when they are paying 4½ to 5 cents a pound for steel, to sell farming machinery as cheaply as they have done in normal times, when they were only paying $30 a ton. So the farmer, the man who uses farm implements, self-binders, plows, harrows, thrashing machines, and everything else that is necessary to carry on farming operations, is the very man who ultimately pays the increased price.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand the proposition is to fix a minimum price of $2 a bushel for wheat?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If we are going to fix a minimum price on these things, relatively that would be about 20 cents a pound, as I suppose, for cotton; and I should be very glad to make that arrangement with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I should be very glad to vote for a minimum price of 20 cents a pound for cotton; I should have no objection to that at all. I do not believe that the cotton farmer is receiving any too much for his cotton, but I believe it is unfair to simply say that you are going to control the prices of our products and then let your own products be uncontrolled. That is my objection to this legislation. I have just offered an amendment which provides that the minimum price in all these various interior terminal markets shall not be less than $2 a bushel for wheat to the farmer. Let me tell you that there is not a thing on earth that the farmer buys that has not increased in cost at least 100 per cent to him, and in the matter of steel the price has increased 400 or 500 per cent. I do not think it is fair that men who come from other sections of the country should try to eliminate their own products from this bill, and that they should say to the farmer who produces grain, "Your product must be controlled." We have no objection to letting you control our products; we want the Government to control our products in times of war, if necessary; but we also want the Government to control your products. We want to give the President of the United States the right to control the products of steel which are so important in the manufacture of farm machinery.

I do not think that the steel manufacturers deserve any better treatment than the grain farmers of the West and of the United States generally. I observe that the profits of the Steel Trust during the last year were $282,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he include binder twine in his amendment.

Mr. KENYON. I will be very glad to accept that suggestion, and include "binder twine." I ask that those words be inserted in the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment now and have it pending, so that I will not be cut off to-morrow. I offer the amendment and desire to have it treated as pending.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] will be adopted. If this bill is to apply to the necessaries produced by the farmer, it should also apply to the necessaries which the farmer must have. It is well known to members of the Senate that a foreign organization, backed by money furnished by bankers in this country, increased the price of binding twine last year to the farmers. The increase cost to the farmers of the United States on the amount used for binding twine was more than $19,000,000 last year. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is adopted, including the suggestion of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], the foreign producers of binding twine who want to take advantage of our market can be controlled by the provisions of this bill.

It is also known to Senators that the price of farm machinery was greatly advanced last year. I am told this morning by the president of a leading farmers' organization in the State of Kansas that notice has been served on the farmers that they may expect an increase of 33⅓ per cent on farm machinery during the coming year. If that is so—and this gentleman is a reputable farmer of my State, and says that the notice has come direct—then the farm machinery which the farmers must buy should be included within the provisions of this bill. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, before the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is voted upon, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, if I understand the purpose of this bill, it is to encourage production. The reason why I have advocated wheat being included and made the principal article subject to the provisions of this bill is because we need bread in this country, and because in 1915, when we made 1,025,000,000 bushels of wheat the average price to the farmer was 87 cents a bushel, while in 1916, with a crop of 525,000,000 bushels short, almost a half production, the price then went to $3 a bushel. In order to make as secure as possible a maximum production of wheat it is necessary to guarantee the wheat farmer against the disastrous experience of 1915.

What we are attempting to do here, as I understand, is to increase the food supply of this country without regard to other articles which may have been affected by the extraordinary conditions of the war. We want to guarantee the food producers of this country against the disaster that always comes with overproduction. We are inviting them to increase their acreage in foodstuffs, and we are attempting now to fix a price below which the market will not go. We have said nothing about a maximum price. There is a maximum yield of steel because prices are high; there is a maximum yield of war munitions because prices are high; but when there was a maximum yield of wheat in 1915, the prices broke to where it hardly paid the farmer the cost of production. He is not called upon to sacrifice everything he has in the world; and out in the West wheat is the principal standard crop. We are trying to encourage the farmer to fill the elevators of this country to supply America and our allies, and it is wisdom on our part in this emergency to depart from the ordinary rule and fix a minimum price, so that he will not be subject to the disaster of a break in price from overproduction.

Then why do we desire to lug in steel? Steel is not indicated as a national necessity along the line of sustaining life. The prices already guarantee a maximum yield of steel. The prices of all the articles which have soared are guaranteeing maximum production now. We ought to guarantee the farmer, who is going to furnish the food, a price which will take care of the expense incurred in the production plus a profit. That is the reason why I am lending my support to this bill and trying to confine it to the one idea of guaranteeing the producers of food supplies against the disaster that always follows a maximum crop.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief interruption?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. The market price of wheat to-day is $2.80 a bushel. If you guarantee the wheat farmer $2, are you not taking 80 cents away from him?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In answer to the query of the Senator, I will say that that $2.80 is predicated upon the disastrous yield of last year. Now, the Senator would hardly think that $2.80 would be a fair price for a maximum yield. I do not know anything about the cost of the production of wheat, but, taking the average price for the last 10 or 15 years from the Statistical Abstract, it did not average over $1.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I want to inform him that in the spring-wheat belt, especially in my State and Montana, wheat is practically a failure this year.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, Mr. President, that helps the argument that I am attempting to make. Whenever there is a failure in the crop, the law of supply and demand will take care of the price. We are trying to encourage the farmer this fall, winter, and spring to put in a maximum wheat acreage, so that a maximum yield of wheat may be made. We must guarantee him against the disaster of another billion and a quarter bushel wheat crop, because in 1915, when the war was a year old, we made the largest wheat production this country ever saw, and the price broke to 87 cents a bushel.

The year following, as I said a moment ago, the wheat crop dropped down to 600,000,000 bushels and the price soared. Now, if you want to encourage the production of foodstuffs you have got to guarantee the producers against the disaster that comes when there is a production above the ordinary. Just guarantee him a reasonable profit. If you were to fix the price at $1.50 or $2 a bushel, and the year 1918 witnessed a failure of the wheat crop, there is no law under God's heaven that could keep the price from soaring again; and if you should make a billion and a half bushels of wheat in 1918, outside of the Treasury of the United States guaranteeing that it shall not go below a certain price, it would break to 87 cents again and every man who produces a raw material knows that to be so.

The question has been asked here, Why do we desire to eliminate cotton and steel? If the Government wanted 20,000,000 bales of cotton, I, as a cotton producer, would say, "Well, in 1914 we made 16,000,000 bales of cotton and the price broke to a point where there was no market for it at all. Now, if you want 20,000,000 bales of cotton, you guarantee the cotton-growing States a reasonable profit and you will get your 20,000,000 bales." That is all we are doing in this bill, and, as the Senator from Georgia suggests, we would be satisfied with a much less price for a 20,000,000-bale crop than it is bringing now with an 11,000,000-bale crop. We must take into consideration the fact that there is a law greater than the power of Congress; there is the law of supply and demand and human necessity, and it is going to have its sanction despite anything we can do. Now, the thing for us to do is to encourage the production of wheat.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss at all the question of fixing a minimum price on wheat. That is a separate proposition, and it comes later in the bill.

This first section to which the amendment is proposed is the defining clause as to what shall be included. It includes everything that is in the title of the bill as sent over from the House. It is confining the operation of the bill to foods, feeds, and fuels, including kerosene and gasoline.

Mr. President, if we begin to add other subjects, and put all the metals of the country in the control of the food administrator, and everything that can be remotely attached to farming interests, we open the bill to the same flood of additions that we put in at an earlier stage; and in my judgment it would jeopardize the passage of the bill, which I should greatly deplore.

It seems to me that those who have spoken overlook the fact that in section 5 of the amendments we provide specifically for a license by any person operating a factory which produces farm implements or machinery and any person engaged in producing, storing, or handling fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients. The control given by the license is much better and more restraining than the general control which would be implied in the first section. If we put on iron and steel, we open the door to everything and we should find ourselves in the same place that we were in before.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. A large part of the fertilizer employed in this country, I understand, comes from outside of the United States. How can we, by license, control the price of that?

Mr. LODGE. We can license those who deal in fertilizers in this country.

Mr. REED. Yes; we might say to them, "You can not charge more than a certain amount," but we can not control the world price. We can simply shut out the fertilizer.

Mr. LODGE. No; and nothing you can do will control the world price.

Mr. REED. Certainly; that is true. But that brings us back to the question of how the farmer is going to be left if you take away his world market and then make him pay the world prices.

Mr. LODGE. We do not make him pay the world prices. He gets most of his fertilizer at home, and that is amply controlled in section 5; but if we go to work and enlarge this again we endanger the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I do not desire to take any time in discussing this bill, but I do not wish to cast my vote with a misapprehension on anybody's part as to what my vote means. I want the record of the Senate to show that I do not believe in the Congress of the United States going into the business of fixing prices. Now, there are exceptions to the rule. The only exception that I am willing to agree to is when the Government of the United States itself disturbs the prices of great commodities in this country; then I think we are justified in protecting the people who produce those commodities against the disturbance that was created by the Government itself. I am willing to vote to fix prices under those conditions for the same reason that I would vote to pay a man for his property if the Government proposed to take his property away from him.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the Senator not to interrupt me. I only have 10 minutes.

The proposal is made in this bill to fix a minimum price for wheat; in other words, that the Government of the United States shall guarantee to the producers of wheat in this country that wheat shall not go below a stated figure. Now, Senators who come from wheat-growing sections discuss this bill as if this were an attack upon the wheat producers. If they feel that way about it and desire to strike the provision from the bill, I am willing to vote with them to strike it out, because I do not want it there if they do not want it there. But if they do want it in the bill, and want this $2 minimum price fixed, I am willing to fix the price at $2 and vote for it and put it in the bill, because I think the Government itself has brought about the disturbance that is affecting the wheat market. I am not willing, however, to vote for it under the condition that they have to be paid for the privilege of receiving a boon from the Government of the United States. If they do not want it in the bill, let us strike it out. If they do not want $150,000,000 in this bill to purchase the surplus supply of wheat for this year, let us strike it out if it is not going to be of benefit to the wheat producers of this country.

I expect to vote for those provisions, but I am not voting for them on the idea that we are thereby shackling the hands of the wheat producer or enacting legislation that is hurtful to him. I am voting for them on the idea that we are doing something of benefit to the producer of wheat, because the Government of the United States has established or is about to establish an embargo against the shipment of wheat to foreign countries, thereby destroying the market for the American producer of wheat. If I am casting my vote under a misapprehension and the men who represent the great wheat belt on this floor think that this legislation is hurtful to them and not helpful to them, why, let us strike it out of the bill.

I do not know that there is anything in this bill affecting the price of wheat or destroying the price of wheat. If it is in the bill I do not know it. The thing that is affecting the price of wheat is the provision that we adopted in another bill authorizing the President of the United States to establish an embargo against the shipment of wheat out of this country, in order to protect our allies and control the distribution of wheat in the future; and I can readily see that if that is done it is temporarily going to result in a surplus production of wheat. There is nobody in this country to take care of it, and unless the Government goes out and buys it at a fixed price and a fair price and carries it over until the hour of distribution comes it will seriously injure the producer of wheat in the United States; and it is in that view that I am willing to vote for these provisions. But if Senators who represent the great wheat belts of this country think it is injurious to their people to pass this legislation, I feel that in all candor they should stand here and say that they want it to go out of the bill, and if they do they will have my vote to strike it out; but if they want it in the bill for the protection of their own people—a protection to which I think they are entitled—I do not think they ought to come here baring their arms to the swords of a battle that they have not fought.

A few years ago agriculture in the South was flat on its back because of conditions that grew out of this war. Members of Congress from the South—and I was not one of them—insisted that the Congress of the United States should take care of the situation by fixing a minimum price for cotton or by the Government taking care of the surplus crop until the conditions could pass by. Now, the only difference in the situation is this: When that condition happened it grew out of the condition of war; it grew out of the disturbed condition of shipping; it grew out of an embargo placed by one of the nations of the world that is now our ally on other countries of Europe, but it was not chargeable directly to the Government of the United States—a very marked distinction, in fact, as to our responsibility, but not a marked distinction in effect. Yet when that condition was presented to the Congress of the United States gentlemen from the great Northwest were prepared to laugh out of the Congress of the Unittd States the men who proposed that that situation should be taken care of by the Congress of the United States.

Now we have paid our price, we have borne our burden, and we are prepared to do it in the future; but when it comes to the question of casting my vote to help other sections of this country bear their burden by Government aid, I am not willing to do so when men from those sections of the country come here charging that we are not liberal, but that we are forcing an unwilling burden on the producers of those sections of the country, when, in fact, we are not doing so. I challenge Senators on that side of the Chamber, if they mean what they say about this provision of the bill being an attack on the wheat farmers of this country, to offer their amendment to strike it out of the bill; and if they do, so far as I am concerned, I will attempt to rally my colleagues from the Southern States to aid them. But if they want our help, if they think it is a protection to the farmer of the Northwest to keep these provisions in this bill, that it is a matter of justice to him, as I believe, because of the condition in which the Government of the United States has placed him, then do not put the blame on us, but accept our aid in the spirit in which we are willing to give it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have not been so much concerned in regard to who shall administer the food-control bill when it becomes a law, whether it be administered by one man or by a board of three men or by a board of five men; but I have been tremendously interested in the nature and extent of the powers proposed to be conferred by this bill, and especially as those powers relate to the farming industry.

Mr. President, there are two provisions in this bill to which I am opposed. I am opposed to the powers conferred upon the President by section 9 of the bill, as it is now; and I am opposed to the minimum price provided for in what is known as section 12 of the bill, and as I now view it, am opposed to conferring power upon the President to fix a minimum price. But, Mr. President, as long as section 9 and section 12 remain undisposed of, and may, when they come to a vote, be enacted by the Senate, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa extending the list of necessaries.

Mr. President, the two sections—section 9 and section 12—especially relate to farm products. Section 9 is as follows:

That the President is authorized from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices—fuel, wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes.

What?—

According to the last amendment now proposed by the Senator from Oregon, with the exception of one in this list, all of these products are products produced on the farm.

How about section 12? It relates to a minimum price for wheat; and, as the amendment now stands, it provides for a minimum price of $1.75 per bushel for wheat. If you are going to give the President the power to purchase at reasonable prices these staple products of the farm for the purpose of storing them and then doling them out to the consumers at reasonable prices as provided for in this bill, why should not the farmer be afforded the same opportunities to secure at reasonable prices the farm machinery and implements that he uses in producing these feed and food products?

Mr. President, it seems to me there is nothing more reasonable than the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, that these few articles be added to the list of necessaries as articles which the President shall be empowered to buy at reasonable prices and sell at reasonable prices under the terms of this bill. They are intimately, they are inseparably, connected with the production of food and feeds which otherwise you attempt to regulate by the provisions of this bill, and it would be an injustice to say that the prices of the binders, thrashing machines, corn planters, or the cultivators may soar away beyond what they have been, and yet the President shall not have the power to purchase and dispose of to the farmer—that great part of the consuming public—these articles essential for the production of the food supply which we are so anxious to increase.

Mr. President, we are trying to do too much by this bill by enacting or seeking to enact sections 9 and 12. I refer here to an article from the Washington Post of some days ago:

"Given powers never dreamed of."

It seemed to me as I read this article that it was inspired. The first portion of it reads:

Whether the farmer protest causes delay or not, the farmer can not be charged with the overloading of the bill with all sorts of amendments increasing the powers of the President.

The farmers are not demanding a minimum price of $1.75 a bushel nor $2 a bushel nor any other minimum price. The farmers, I think, realize that fixing a minimum price may have its psychological effect, and the tendency will be in fixing a minimum price to depress the price of wheat to that minimum price in the market at a time when all the conditions would warrant a higher price. We may say of any given minimum price, it is enough and not enough—enough to-day, but not enough to-morrow or three or six months hence. So I think the farmer will be quite content to leave the matter of prices to conditions as they will be found to exist.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that with the war continuing, and with the shortage of the last two years, with an extraordinary demand never equaled in the world, the farmer will be able to get a reasonable price for all the farm products, at least those staple products that he has to dispose of, and which are contemplated by this bill. And this is all he asks.

I call attention to a clipping from the Post of this morning and which reads:

[From the Washington Post, July 19, 1917.]

FARMERS OPPOSE WHEAT AT $1.75—RESOLUTIONS SAY SENATE FOOD AMENDMENTS ARE UNWORKABLE.

Representatives of 15 farmers' organizations, including the National Farmers' Union, conferred with members of the food administration yesterday and adopted resolutions protesting against the plan of Senate leaders to fix a price of $1.75 a bushel for wheat in the food-control bill. Enactment of the measure as it passed the House was urged, the proposed Senate amendments being declared unworkable.

The price-fixing section as proposed, the resolutions declared, would permit "gambling, speculation, and exportation to proceed without restriction."

"We are strongly opposed to the fixing of the exact amount of a minimum price of wheat by law," they continued, "because we recognize that it is an expert question to be settled after such consideration as Congress can not possibly give it and in a manner which will give the producer a full voice. The food administration should be vested with power to deal with this question."

Whether it is advisable to leave the fixing of price to the food administration or not, there is no question, I think, but that the farmers are opposed to the naming of a fixed price now and by Congress.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the pending question is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment. I read a few lines from the fifth chapter of Exodus:

And afterwards Moses and Aaron went in, and told Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness.

And Pharaoh said, Who is the Lord, that I should obey His voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go.

And they said, The God of the Hebrews hath met with us; let us go, we pray thee, three days' journey into the desert, and sacrifice unto the Lord our God; lest He fall upon us with pestilence, or with the sword.

And the king of Egypt said unto them, Wherefore do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works? get you unto your burdens.

And Pharaoh said, Behold, the people of the land now are many, and ye make them rest from their burdens.

And Pharaoh commanded the same day the taskmasters of the people, and their officers, saying,

Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves.

And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon them; ye shall not diminish aught thereof: for they be idle; therefore they cry, saying, let us go and sacrifice to our God.

Let there more work be laid upon the men, that they may labor therein; and let them not regard vain words.

And the taskmasters of the people went out, and their officers, and they spake to the people, saying, Thus saith Pharaoh, I will not give you straw.

Go ye, get you straw where ye can find it: yet not aught of your work shall be diminished.

So the people were scattered abroad throughout all the land of Egypt to gather stubble instead of straw.

And the taskmasters hasted them, saying, Fulfill your works, your daily tasks, as when there was straw.

Mr. President, this bill is now being organized to put into effect this scriptural decree—the farmer is to be told to make brick without straw—to raise crops regardless of what he may himself have to pay for everything with which he is to produce crops.

It is conceded that upon the farmers of this country, their energy and their extraordinary efforts, depends in a very large measure the success of this world conflict. Their increased acreage and their renewed efforts are the surest guaranty of success. And yet we are proposing now, Mr. President, to regulate and control the market of the farmer and to leave open and uncontrolled and unregulated everything which the farmer buys and that enters into his daily life as a means by which he produces food. The one class of men who have no monopoly, who are not in a position to organize a monopoly, who are not in a position to control prices, are to be regulated and controlled and the great monopolistic powers of the United States are to go unregulated and uncontrolled. In other words, the farmer is advised to go forth with his task and produce his crop, to extend his acreage. We will, however, take your market from you and give you such market as we see fit. In the meantime you shall share as best you may and do the best you can with those who have an uncontrolled market and a price-fixing power of their own. It was apparent from the beginning that that was precisely where this measure would land. It was clear to all who know the power of certain interests here that they would escape all regulation.

Let me call attention to the fact that before the war steel sold for $30. It now sells for $130, and all the different things which enter into the production on the part of the farmer from the steel has increased in price accordingly.

Coal has advanced from 100 to 200 and 250 per cent.

Wire has advanced 100 per cent.

Wagons have advanced 40 per cent.

Prepared feeds have advanced 100 per cent.

Tankage costs 100 per cent more now.

Fertilizers have advanced 600 per cent.

Binder twine has advanced from 8 cents to 18 cents.

Plow shovels that were bought for $2.50 before the war now cost $7.

Cultivators sold at $28 before the war and now sell for from $50 to $55.

And so on, Mr. President, all the different things which the farmer must buy have thus increased in price.

As I now understand the proposition, it is to leave that entire industrial field uncontrolled and unregulated, while the one upon whom you depend to produce sufficient to feed the world and to feed the Army is to have his market taken away from him, in the first place, by the laws which you have passed and which you are to pass, and, in the second place, to dole out to him just such figure as you see fit.

Now, in my humble judgment that will not have the effect of bringing about the activity and the energy which the farmer is supposed to put forth from this time on; but it will have the very opposite effect.

There is no reason under the sun or among men why we should control the one class of people who can not combine, who can not monopolize, and leave the others uncontrolled. If you propose to encourage the farmer, at least arrange to protect him against exorbitant prices which are now being charged him by unconscionable and lawless combinations. If you would encourage and inspire him forward, give him a fair chance and equal treatment. He will do his full duty under just and equal laws and with fair and impartial treatment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I have studied the bill with much care, and I have tried to find some basis for the argument presented that we are undertaking to control the price of wheat the farmer produces. That is not so. There is not a line or syllable in the bill that controls the price for farm products. All that is controlled is the profits that may be charged by the middleman and the storage charges and commissions that may be charged after the farm products get out of the hands of the farmer.

I have asked to have some part of the bill pointed out to me where prices which are paid to the farmer are controlled under the bill. No one has pointed out a place in the bill, and it is not in the bill. The bill merely seeks to take the product after it gets out of the hands of the farmer, and controls it and guards it until it gets into the hands of the retailer. It seeks to regulate the profit that may be charged by the middleman, the elevator man, and the commission man, but not to control the prices in the hands of the farmers.

I believe in Government control of all prices myself. I have believed in it for years, in times of peace as well as in times of war. I shall be glad if the price of steel and iron and every necessity in the country could be controlled, but this is a food and fuel control bill. If you start in by putting on steel and iron or farm implements or fertilizers, there is no logical place to stop, and we will get the bill in a shape where it can not be passed in the Senate.

I can not give any reason why food and fuel should be controlled, and why steel should not be. There is no reason, except the reason of expediency.

This amendment will be voted for by two classes of Senators. It will be voted for by those who wish to help the farmer more than the bill does as it stands, and by those who want to kill the bill altogether. The danger is that those two extremes, those who are most friendly to the farmer and those who are most hostile to him, may have votes enough to defeat those who want to do something practical and substantial in the bill.

I hope that section 5 of the bill, the licensing provision, will be amended so that it will include not only food and fuel, but the manufacture of farm implements and farm machinery, and will control those who manufacture and deal in fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients.

I also hope that section 12 may be amended so that there will be a guaranteed price for wheat No. 1 northern at the principal interior primary markets at $2 a bushel from the passage of the act of January 1, 1919. I think that ought to be done because wheat occupies a peculiar position. Wheat is the one food product that they need more than any other in Europe, and it is the one which needs stimulation in its production.

So, Mr. President, I hope the friends of the bill, those who really want to get the bill passed, will limit the articles upon which it acts to real food and fuel.

Mr. President, I offer an amendment to be pending so that it may be voted upon when the proper time comes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the pending question, I believe, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to section 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I was mistaken.

The amendment of the Senator from Oregon adds to the commodities covered by the House bill petroleum and gasoline, thus covering foods, feed, fuel, petroleum, and gasoline.

Mr. President, individually I favor adding to those commodities aluminum, copper, iron, and steel, because they are basic commodities, which enter into almost all the industries and they are essential to the successful prosecution of the war, as they are largely used in munitions.

I trust that our action will be so shaped as to include these additional commodities. I regret that other commodities have been inserted in the bill by amendments on the floor in such a way as to imperil its passage, and I shall regret to see any attempt to enlarge the included commodities beyond those to which I have referred.

Mr. President, the reason why I urge that these commodities should be included is that they are under quasi monopolistic control. We all know that the control of copper, aluminum, iron, and steel is in great corporations, which practically, though not perhaps in a legal sense, monopolize these industries, and such an extraordinary demand has been imposed upon these products as to enable the producers to secure skyrocket prices, the height of which can hardly be measured.

The necessity for their use is so great, the operation of a great demand upon a limited supply is so great, as to enable producers to charge almost what they choose. If, therefore, there ever was a condition which would justify the intervention of governmental power it is this, for these things are absolutely necessary, and they are in quasi monopolistic control.

Mr. President, I was in hopes that these great industries which have been practically mobilized under the direction of the Government, through the organization of the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission, and have been able by reason of this sanction of the law to gather and confer together, which they have feared to do heretofore because of the restrictions of the Sherman antitrust law. I was in hopes, inasmuch as the terrors of the Sherman antitrust law had practically been removed by our action, in this condition of peril when they were summoned en masse to appear here and to mobilize their industries, and to act practically regarding them, that they would make such reasonable and just proposals to the Government as would insure the prosecution of the war with moderate cost and the highest efficiency, so far as their materials were concerned.

I regret to say, Mr. President, that these gentlemen, these captains of industry, men of great capacity, have failed to meet the issue of the hour. Some of them have partially met it. The aluminum industry, built up by the most arduous process, and securing a practical monopoly by the industry and the capacity of its promoters, able to command almost any price, offered the Government aluminum, the market price of which was something like 90 cents, at, I believe, 27 cents. That was a wise and just thing; and had it been accompanied also by a reasonable concession to the general public that industry would have deserved the gratitude of the country.

The copper industry also in dealing with the Government in reference to a limited amount—40,000,000 pounds, I believe—when the prevailing price was 30 cents a pound, offered it to the Government at 18 cents a pound. That was a commendable thing; but it would have been more commendable if this highly profitable price of 18 cents a pound, or perhaps a price somewhat in excess of that, had been extended to the general public.

The steel industry has made no compromise. It is the most powerful industry in the country and is most intelligently directed from the industrial point of view. It is directed by men of whom we have a right to expect more breadth of vision. They failed, for they offered no price. On the contrary, we understand that they expect to exact from the Government at least double the normal price and that they expect to exact from the public whatever price they can get.

Mr. President, it is said that we have only to deal with the Government's wants. I insist that a virile war can only be conducted by a virile nation; that not only must your Army be strong, but that your people must be strong; that your Army must not only be well fed and well equipped, but that your people also must be well fed and well equipped; and that it is folly to attempt, in the emergency of war, to make a distinction between the treatment that should be accorded to the Army and that accorded to the people at large. Big men ought to see that.

These men who are big enough to conduct the copper, the steel, and the aluminum industries of the country ought to be able to see this. Besides this, as economists they ought to realize the fact that they themselves are inaugurating a price level which will provoke a constantly increasing wage level, and that the end of the war will find us, as a result of the struggle between the wage earners on the one hand and the producers on the other, with a wage level raised to some correspondence with the price level. We will find at the end of this war a wage level far above that of any other country in the world; and just then, when competition will again come between nations for the commerce of the world, we shall find the United States at a disadvantage, a disadvantage which will involve a struggle between the wage earners and the producers and lock up the entire industries and energies of the country.

Mr. President, I should be glad to speak longer on this subject, but time will not permit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The time of the Senator from Nevada has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia obtained the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to occupy only a few moments in the discussion of this amendment. Like the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], I voted, when the original bill was pending before the Senate, to add to the provisions which the House bill contained a number of commodities or necessaries which should be subject to governmental control; but it developed in the discussion of the bill that those who were opposed to the bill fundamentally, and those who opposed the limiting of control to the products of the farm, including fuel, were likely to defeat the very purpose of the bill as well as any legislation at all. In an attempt to reach a compromise in this matter Senators who entertained different views upon the whole subject undertook, by consultation, to reconcile these differences, so that the measure would carry out the purposes the administration originally had in view, viz, to control foods, feeds, and fuel.

I still think, Mr. President, that the time must come, and that in the near future, when all of these things—steel, iron and its products, and many other commodities—must be subjected to governmental control; but I have reached the conclusion that it is impossible to put any food-control measure through the Senate at this time, and possibly not through Congress at all, unless it is limited to the original purposes of the administration.

Mr. President, I think we all realize the necessity for food control in this emergency. The example of other countries has vindicated the position which this Government is taking in respect to the food situation. Therefore I think that something ought to be done promptly; we must discuss it from the patriotic standpoint rather than from the selfish and the purely local point of view. If it be conceded that there ought to be control of the food situation, we must not forget that the Liverpool market fixes the price of wheat always, and that the Liverpool market has practically been destroyed by a measure which all will admit was a perfectly proper war power exercised by the President. I refer to the embargo recently declared.

The embargo was proclaimed by the President on the 9th of July and includes in its provisions the following articles: Coal, coke, fuel oils, kerosene and gasoline, including bunkers; food grains, flour and meal therefrom; fodder and feeds, meat and fats, pig iron, steel billets, ship plates and structural shapes, scrap iron and scrap steels, ferromanganese, fertilizers, arms, ammunitions, and explosives.

I am inclined to believe that the effect of this embargo will be to reduce the price of some of the articles mentioned; but, whether it affects all of them or not, we do know that it is certain to reduce the price of wheat and foodstuffs generally. So that this bill, as was very ably stated by the Senator from Alabama, will in effect be for the protection of the farmer rather than to his injury. I venture to say that there is not a Senator but will admit that if the farmer could have been guaranteed a price of $1.75 per bushel for wheat during the past 10 years, or if he is guaranteed a price of $1.75 a bushel for the next 10 years, there will not be a single year when he will not make a profit from its production.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa may be voted down, and that the amendment proposed by me may be adopted. In that event some hope may be entertained that a measure for the control of food, feed, and fuel will be finally adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope we may be able to yield somewhat our individual views and give support to the substitute for section 1 offered by the Senator in charge of the bill.

Some of us would have been glad to have five commissioners; some preferred only one director.

The substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon meets the views of both, in a measure. It provides for three commissioners; it gives an opportunity for freedom from single control, and yet the number is sufficiently small to insure forceful action.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon strikes out all commodities named in section 1 except foods, feeds, and fuel. Mr. President, if we undertake to add to foods, feeds, and fuel all the other items named in the section as it now stands we will compass the entire industries of this country, and no ten men, no hundred men will be able to handle so gigantic a task. The bill would break down by the very length to which it would seek to reach.

The original purpose as disclosed to the public was to affect food and fuel, and yet from the first the bills presented went very much further, going even to the length of fixing for foodstuff maximum prices. I would have opposed the bills as first presented. The most objectionable features have been stricken out, and now the substitute of the Senator from Oregon strikes out all other commodities and leaves in simply foods, feeds, and fuel. I hope we will stand by that provision and support the substitute as it is written.

Why do foods and fuels stand entirely upon a different basis from other commodities? Take clothes, as an illustration: I am not obliged to have new clothes to-morrow or next month; I may wear old clothes and patch them, perchance; but I must have something to eat to-morrow; and in cold weather I must have coal with which to keep warm. They are necessaries required day by day, distinguished entirely from the other numerous commodities proposed to be inserted in this bill. They are commodities to which the Government can attach its control with the justification of necessity not applicable to anything else.

Mr. President, we all understand that the burden is upon the United States largely to see to it that France, England, and Italy have food. The food problem lies at the very foundation of success. The moment it is known in Europe that submarines can not stop foods going to France, England, and Italy, and that foods will be raised to go there, then will the pressure against Prussianism and against pan-Germanism, even in Germany itself, grow with increased strength.

Of the foodstuffs, wheat stands preeminently important. Bread is the staff of life, and wheat is the only cereal from which an abundance of bread may be prepared to last days and even weeks after it is baked. It is bread that must sustain the troops at the front.

If the friends of the wheat grower desire no legislation with reference to minimum prices, I do not wish to force it on them. I favor the provision in the last print of the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, somewhat enlarged and broadened, because I think it is only justice to the wheat grower. Why? The market of the wheat grower has had a terrible blow from the embargo placed upon the exportation of his wheat. His foreign market is cut off, and it is proposed—and properly so as a war necessity—that one agency shall buy for our Government and buy for England, France, and Italy, thereby eliminating all competition, thereby taking from the wheat grower a situation which otherwise would give him numerous competitors for his product. This is only excusable upon the ground of war necessity.

That is not all that the bill does. It lays its hand upon the stock exchange; it lays its hand upon the granaries; it lays its hand upon the elevator companies. By the system of licensing authorized in section 5, the President is given authority to control all the profits made out of wheat from the time the wheat leaves the farmer until it reaches the retail merchant. All this opportunity for the sale of wheat and for the increase in the speculative price of wheat is taken away by this bill. I believe it is right; I believe a condition of war confronting us justifies our Government in enacting such legislation as a war measure; but, believing that, I also think it only fair to encourage wheat production next year and to see that the farmer does not bear the burden alone.

As his markets are taken from him for the general welfare, so the general public can afford, as this bill provides, to bear part of his losses, and to say to him, "The Government, having taken your markets from you or greatly curtailed them, says to you you shall not bear the burden alone, but your Government will see to it that you receive a price for your wheat commensurate with the value of your labor." It is going a great distance to do this, but we go a great distance when we take the markets so completely or so largely from the wheat grower. I believe that certainly this year, and unless the crop is largely increased next year, the demand for wheat will cause the price to go above the minimum which we may fix, even if we fix a liberal minimum, but we should not leave the wheat grower any uncertainty. The Government has and will curtail his markets and should guarantee him a fair price.

The Senator from North Dakota said that he could see no difference between wheat and cotton. I see a vast difference. We need, we must have, the wheat for food. We can do without, nationally, an immediate great supply of cotton. I wish to say to the Senator that if you would guarantee to the cotton grower next year a price for his cotton midway between the average price the three years before the war and the present price it might cost the National Government, in my judgment, $500,000,000, for he would probably raise 20,000,000 bales. It is now selling for 27 cents. It sold for 13 cents before the war. You guarantee him 20 cents for his cotton, and he would probably raise 20,000,000 bales next year. The demand would not consume the supply, and the normal price might drop much below that figure.

I would not object to action by the Government placing regulations around cotton, coupled with a guarantee of such an increase in price to the producer. But this would involve a risk to the Government of hundreds of millions of dollars—a risk which the exigency of the situation, so far as cotton is concerned, does not require.

Let me urge Senators to yield somewhat their individual views and join an earnest effort to pass this bill in the wisest form upon which we may, by mutual yielding, agree. Our enemies understand well the importance of furnishing foodstuffs to England, France, and Italy, and to our troops. Let us show to our enemies how united we are, how determined we are to meet pan-Germanism, and the purpose which now seems to be controlling that Empire. Let us prepare to insure their inevitable defeat and thereby not only accomplish the result but help to accomplish it by producing the internal disintegration among our enemies which will come with a knowledge that defeat is certain.

Everything we do to win this war will help by its effect in Germany, as well as on the sea and in the trenches.

Let us, without dissent, determine to mobolize every resource of this country to crush the war party of Prussia. We will certainly triumph and we will help bring an earlier peace.

We must and will succeed. Let us hasten the day when success will crown our efforts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Georgia has expired.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have been very much surprised to find Senators who represent agricultural States criticize this bill. I have examined the bill very carefully, to ascertain whether there is any justification for such criticism. Of course, when attempt is made to regulate prices in the selling market you have a very big undertaking on hand, but the Senators who should not complain of this bill are those who represent the agricultural States.

My home State is one which now produces in agricultural products four times as much as it does in minerals; and I suppose, while formerly known as a mineral State, as a producer of ores, it might now properly be classed as an agricultural State. It seems to me, Mr. President, when that one clause is written into this bill, stating that there shall be a certain fixed guaranty for the price of wheat, that is all the agricultural States should ask.

Mr. President, this bill is not intended to do away with the fundamental principle of supply and demand. The object is to stimulate production, so that the price of wheat will not be $3.25 a bushel, but will be maintained at a level that will be fairly remunerative to the farmer—in fact, liberally so—and that is the intent and purpose of the bill. The Agricultural Committee, composed of Senators who represent agricultural States, have the very deepest interest in the farmer and in the maintenance of fair prices for products which are raised upon the farm. For that reason the talk that has been indulged in, that everything else is getting high and it is not wise to legislate in any way with respect to the farmer, it seems to me is not wise, nor to the point.

The very argument that is advanced consists of contrasting prices of articles the farmer buys which Senators complain of as being exorbitant, and then insisting that those same outrageous prices form part of the basis for determining the minimum price of wheat. They then insist that the exorbitant prices of the articles be lowered. We are going to fix a minimum price, and that is all there is any certainty about with relation to the price to be fixed in this bill. That price as now guaranteed is $1.75 per bushel, which will induce farmers to increase the wheat crop of next year. The object is to stimulate the production and let the law of supply and demand and not any requirement of Congress bring the price of wheat to a reasonable level, so that it will give the farmer a good price, a remunerative price, and yet not be such a price as to impair the financial condition of the Government in this great crisis.

Now, Mr. President, when it comes to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, another thought suggests itself. If we are going to include everything in this bill, it will mean the Government will undertake to operate the entire industrial processes of the country. We can not do that. This legislation is an experiment. It seems to me we ought to confine it to such a limited number of subjects as the Government can reasonably handle. When the Government goes beyond that point it embarks upon uncharted and dangerous waters. On that account, Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to limit this measure to the necessaries of our war-time conditions; we ought to provide for food, feed, and fuel. These are absolute necessaries in our conduct of the war.

It is true that steel does enter to some extent into all war operations, and I should be very glad, indeed, if I thought that the Government could exercise the power with effect so as to include steel, copper, and all other things that could have an influence to produce a lowering of these high prices. But this is an experiment. We do not know whether we will succeed or not. I can readily see that one part of this bill is very easy, and that is where you guarantee the minimum price. There is not any question but that there will be stimulation of wheat production by guaranteeing the price at $1.75 a bushel. But when it comes to fixing the maximum price you will encounter the greatest difficulty. We had better confine the scope of the bill to those things that might be considered absolute necessities for the conduct of the war, in order to be sure that we can handle them successfully.

If, after trial, our experiment proves a success, it will be found that this body will be nearly unanimously in favor of extending control to other lines. It is unwise to attempt to put into this bill all of these industries without the machinery to administer the same.

But I am certain that if now you attempt to include all the other lines of production you are going to be faced with the query: "Well, why not guarantee other industries a minimum price?" Why should we not say that the price of lead shall be fixed at at least 8 cents a pound? Why should we not say that copper shall bring at least 20 cents a pound? If you do that you are going to find this war debt which we have contracted a very small and insignificant item, compared with the vast amount that it will be necessary to raise to enable the Government to place all these businesses under its control.

On that account, it seems to me, we ought to adhere to the bill as it was originally intended that it should be, and should confine our efforts in that direction; and when we do that I think we will meet with success. If we fail to do that, I am afraid we will fail in the passage of this bill; and even if we enact the bill with all of the provisions in it we will find that it will not be a success.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which I desire to have regarded as a pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator desires to bring it up at a later time?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just a word on the subject of the pending amendment.

I realize the force of the argument that has been made that it is important to have some sort of control of the exorbitant prices now being charged the farmer for the implements that he must buy in order to raise his crop and for the supplies which he needs. Among those supplies, fertilizer is an important item. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] read a statement this morning to the effect that the price of fertilizer had increased 600 per cent. In a large portion of the country, perhaps in more than half of the country, perhaps more than two-thirds, fertilizer is essential to the production of crops. It is utterly impossible in those sections to produce crops without the use of commercial fertilizers or fertilizers in some form. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa does not include fertilizers. It is just as important, it seems to me——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator consent to being interrupted for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On page 8 of the bill the Senator will see that farm implements and fertilizers are each brought within the licensing control of the President, and in that way the farmer will be protected as to the prices of fertilizers.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that. I am much obliged to the Senator, however, for alluding to it. The same thing applies, I believe, to the other items mentioned in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. They are required to be licensed, too. At any rate, that scarcely meets the situation, but I am not going to dwell upon that.

I should be glad if I could see my way clear to support the amendment of the Senator from Iowa upon the proposition that I believe these people who produce the Nation's food by the hardest kind of toil—the farmer who has to run all the chances of seasons and of enemies of his product, the pests and the insects and droughts and too much rain, and everything else, and who toils day in and day out for 365 days of the year, and usually more than 12 hours a day—is entitled to consideration. He is entitled to respect, and he is entitled to the incidental benefits that may grow out of wise legislation in this country. I propose to stand by that man here and elsewhere as far as I can. My own judgment is that this is not so much a problem of production; it is not so much a question of whether we are going to produce enough wheat or corn or meat, or whether we can do it; it is a question of economic distribution.

If we could institute some sort of agency in this country which could regulate this matter of distribution so that, for instance—as an insignificant illustration, perhaps, but to show the point I am trying to make—instead of the consumer paying 40 cents a pound for peanuts and the farmer getting 3½ cents a pound, if some sort of a plan could be arranged whereby the farmer could get 7 cents a pound for peanuts and the consumer could pay 7 or 8 cents a pound for them, or even 17 or 18, there would be some benefit to both the consumer and the producer.

That is just one illustration, but it is so all along the line. In the case of all the products the farmer is not getting, ordinarily, the benefit of these excessive prices. The man who produces these food products is not the man who is being benefited by these exhorbitant prices in any way, or getting that profit out of his enterprise. It is to bridge this chasm between the man who produces these foodstuffs and the breakfast table that we ought to direct our chief energies, it seems to me. Some agency ought to be established whereby this tremendous loss or waste or unnecessary expenditure and tax upon the consumers of the country, amounting probably to $6,000,000,000 every year, could be saved to the benefit of both the producer and the consumer.

It is estimated, I believe, that the farm products of the country amount annually in value on the farm to over $9,000,000,000. Assuming that the farmers themselves consume one-third, or $3,000,000,000, you have $6,000,000,000 worth of farm products going to market for which the consumers of the country pay over $13,000,000,000. Now, there is a tremendous amount of money, a tremendous burden upon the consumers, between the farm and the dinner table; and it is to reach that situation, in my judgment, that energies ought to be directed by those who are endeavoring to solve these problems.

I just want to have go in the RECORD, Mr. President, with the consent of the Senate, an editorial published in the Florida Times-Union, entitled "Production of food," showing where food is produced in this country and some other facts upon that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PRODUCTION OF FOOD.

Dr. Thomas Jesse Jones, a specialist of the Bureau of Education, has made a report of 50 years of educational effort among the negroes of the South. This was well-meant work, and if the investigation was thorough and the results accurately stated the effect would be good. Of the report a story from Washington says:

"The report says three-fourths of the 8,500,000 negroes in the South live in rural communities, and that there are 3,000,000 negroes engaged in agricultural pursuits, cultivating fully 100,000,000 acres. As owners and renters of land, they are cultivating 41,500,000 acres. This acreage is twice that under cultivation either in Virginia or in New England, according to the report. Nevertheless, the South does not produce enough food to feed itself, drawing on the rest of the country annually for farm products recently estimated as worth $750,000,000."

It is the last statement in this paragraph that attracts our attention. A specialist connected with the Bureau of Education should not have accepted with apparent credence an estimate that the South lacked three-quarters of a billion dollars of feeding herself. This statement sounds like some of Karl Vrooman's scare stuff. It is palpably absurd.

The Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture shows the following production of foodstuffs for 1916 expressed in value instead of in bulk:

	South.	Balance of country.
Corn	$925,796,000	$1,369,987,000
Wheat	215,359,000	810,496,000
Oats	111,317,000	544,832,000
Barley	1,133,000	179,744,000
Rye	3,830,000	54,037,000
Buckwheat	1,674,000	11,690,000
Rice	33,642,000	2,545,000
Irish potatoes	82,610,000	334,451,000
Sweet potatoes	53,742,000	6,399,000
Apples	18,697,000	43,190,000
Peaches	20,428,000	21,683,000
Total	1,468,268,000	3,378,796,000

The butter, egg, and poultry product, which is common to all parts of the United States, is not given by States and we have no right to guess it is unevenly distributed. The value of vegetables is not given except as shown above. There is no reason to guess it is unevenly distributed except that early in the year the South has to supply the whole country. The value of sugar by States is not given, but the South produces its share. Nothing is said about pears and oranges or pineapples and grapefruit—the last two produced only in the South. Taking the average of these products there is no reason to think the South doesn't produce its part.

The food value of the cotton crop grown only in the South is fully $200,000,000. Cotton seed go into many products eaten by men. Peanuts are now extensively raised in the South. The greater portion of the crop is not gathered at all, but is left in the ground for the hogs. A not inconsiderable part of it is used for human food. The value of this crop is probably $100,000,000, and it is peculiar to the South. Sirup and molasses are almost exclusively southern products. Of these the South makes at least $100,000,000 a year more than its share.

Add this $400,000,000 to the $1,468,268,000 worth of food produced by the South and we have $1,868,268,000 worth of food produced by the South as compared with $3,378,796,000 produced by the balance of the country, or $5,247,064,000 for the entire country. As the South has only one-third of the population of the country its proportion would be $1,749,021,000, which it exceeds by $119,247,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there are two things going on now that are attracting the attention of the world—talk in the Senate and war in Europe. In connection with them and their comparative importance, I should like to have read an editorial from the Washington Post of yesterday.

There being no objection, the Secretary read the editorial, as follows:

THE AVIATION FLEET.

The House set an example of patriotism in passing the $640,000,000 aviation bill in record-breaking time. It will be a complete answer to criticism of delay in war matters if the Senate, dispensing with unnecessary committee hearings, should make a similar record and pass the bill even before straightening out the tangle over the food bill.

The leaders can easily determine whether there is to be any insistence upon debate on the aviation bill. If any Senators should insist upon their right to discuss this war measure at length, it would, of course, be impracticable to displace the food-control bill. To do so in such circumstances would be to play into the hands of those who want to confuse all legislative action and delay American victory.

If, however, the Senate generally is of the same mind as the House and feels with the American public that no useful purpose can be served by talk, the aviation bill can be given the right of way without embarrassing or delaying the food measure.

A recent dispatch from Germany indicates that no more Zeppelins are being constructed at Friedrichshafen. Thousands of workmen who hitherto have been employed in building the balloon type of airship are now building the plane type. The Germans act quickly. They have sneered at the American aviation program, but they are already at work to overmatch it.

Time is the essence of the problem. A fleet three months from now may bring the war to a successful end. Postponement even by a few days in beginning the work may give Germany the advantage which she will be prompt to seize.

The American program should be put under way at once.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is one word, I think, in the minds of all Americans and of all right-thinking people everywhere when an emergency arises to be met, which arouses more contempt than any other one word in the world, and that is the word "slacker." The slackers are not only composed of those who are resorting to lying and marrying and various other devices in order to avoid service, but it likewise applies to legislators who are forgetful of their duty, and who are taking up time needlessly and uselessly for the purpose of exploiting themselves or some local interest rather than paying due regard to a great—I started to say national, but international emergency.

I picked up a little piece of poetry the other day, which was written by Harold Begbie, and was published in the Boston Transcript, entitled "Fall in!" It ought to be entitled "An admonition to the slacker":

FALL IN!

[Harold Begbie in the Boston Transcript.]

What will you lack, sonny, what will you lack,
When the girls line up the street,
Shouting their love to the lads come back
From the foe they rushed to beat?
Will you send a strangled cheer to the sky
And grin till your cheeks are red?
But what will you lack when your mate goes by
With a girl who cuts you dead?

Where will you look, sonny, where will you look
When your children yet to be Clamor to learn of the part you took
In the war that kept men free?
Will you say it was naught to you if France
Stood up to her foe or bunked?
But where will you look when they give the glance
That tells you they know you funked?

How will you fare, sonny, how will you fare,
In the far-off winter night,
When you sit by the fire in an old man's chair
And your neighbors talk of the fight?
Will you slink away, as it were from a blow,
Your old head shamed and bent?
Or say, "I was not with the first to go,
But I went, thank God, I went"?

Why do they call, sonny, why do they call,
For men who are brave and strong?
Is it naught to you if your country fall,
And right is shamed by wrong?
Is it football still and the picture show,
The bar, and the betting odds,
When your brothers stand to the tyrant's blow
And country's call is God's?

Can not the Senate take a little bit of encouragement to do something rather than talk quite so much from this utterance, and things like it, which are uppermost right now in the minds of the American people?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I probably would not have referred to the so-called "hold up" of the aviation bill but for the remarks of the Senator who has just addressed the Senate. Some of the newspapers, notably the one mentioned by the Senator, have, I think, been guilty of gross injustice to Members of this body, an injustice that the circumstances neither warranted nor palliated.

At about 11 o'clock yesterday morning the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] presented the aviation bill. With the main purpose of that bill no Senator on either side of this Chamber is in more ardent sympathy than I am, as I stated to the Senate at the time. But yet it has come to a pretty pass in the Senate if Senators can not present important amendments to any proposition that is offered, speak on them a reasonable time, and do no more than ask, what they are entitled to as a matter of constitutional right as long as this remains a free country, the judgment of this body on the merits of the proposition they have presented.

Both the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], who is absent, and myself on yesterday did that, and no more. I do not recall how long the Senator from Oklahoma spoke. I probably addressed the Senate something like 8 or 10 minutes and offered one amendment. I had no desire then, and I have none now, to delay the bill. I simply wished to perfect it. It was perfectly agreeable to me then, as it is now, to proceed with it then or at any other time.

I merely insisted then, as I shall insist whenever the bill comes before the Senate, on my right to present the amendment, and if that right is to be denied in this body, either by bulldozing newspapers or Members, or if it can not be exercised unless Members of this body who exercise it are to be criticized, abused, and misrepresented, then we are pretty nearly at the end of free constitutional government in this country.

I am not excited about this matter. I know that some of these newspapers, and some of the people who sympathize with them, are excited. I endeavor to make all reasonable allowance for that frame or state of mind. I am perfectly willing that the Senate shall vote whenever it pleases on the aviation bill, but whenever it does I expect to exercise my constitutional rights as a Member of this body, no matter who shall be displeased.

On yesterday I occupied about 8 minutes of the Senate's time—8 or 10 at the outside—in presenting an amendment, as I had a right to present it; and if I am to be abused or criticized for doing that, by the newspapers or by any Member of this body or anybody else in this country, we will be at the end of freedom of thought, freedom of speech, and freedom of action in the Senate of the United States, and it will be useless for this body to continue to attempt to exercise its constitutional functions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. KENYON. On the amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Harding	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Hardwick	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Norris	Sterling
Broussard	Hollis	Overman	Thompson
Calder	James	Owen	Tillman
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Trammell
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Poindexter	Underwood
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Curtis	Kendrick	Reed	Warren
Dillingham	Kenyon	Saulsbury	Williams
Fletcher	King	Shafroth	Wolcott
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Sheppard
Gore	Lodge	Shields
Gronna	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained on important business. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is absent on public business. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Iowa requests the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REED. Let the amendment to the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Insert, after the word "gasoline," where it appears in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the words "iron ore and its products, farm implements, farm tools, and binding twine."

Mr. GRONNA. May I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he change the words "binding twine" to "hemp"? The Senator knows that there is no binding twine imported; that it is the raw material which is imported.

Mr. KENYON. I would have no objection if it would not complicate the matter.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator insert the word "hemp" before the words "binding twine"?

Mr. KENYON. I will insert the word "hemp," as it relates to binding twine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa modifies the amendment to the amendment. The modification will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert the word "hemp" before the words "binding twine," so as to read:

farm tools, hemp, and binding twine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa requests the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. On this question I am at liberty to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). The general pair I have with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] does not apply to matters contained in this bill. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan] and his pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I have already voted, but I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is not present, and not knowing how he would vote I withdraw my vote, having a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and let my vote stand.

While I am on my feet I desire to state that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been called from the Senate on official business, and he is paired with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY].

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Borah	Johnson, Cal.	McNary	Sherman
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Myers	Shields
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
France	Kellogg	Owen	Sutherland
Gore	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Gronna	La Follette	Reed	Townsend
Hitchcock	McCumber	Sheppard	Trammell

NAYS—43.

Ashurst	Hardwick	Newlands	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Overman	Swanson
Brandegee	James	Page	Tillman
Broussard	Kendrick	Pomerene	Underwood
Calder	King	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Chamberlain	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Culberson	Lodge	Shafroth	Watson
Fletcher	McKellar	Simmons	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	McLean	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Hale	Martin	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Harding	New	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—25.

Bankhead	Gerry	Nelson	Stone
Brady	Goff	Penrose	Thomas
Colt	Hughes	Phelan	Vardaman
Dillingham	Husting	Pittman	Walsh
Fall	Jones, N. Mex.	Robinson
Fernald	Kirby	Smith, Md.
Gallinger	Knox	Smith, Mich.

So Mr. KENYON's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. REED. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the language:

He is further authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, at an annual salary of $7,500 each, payable monthly, who shall constitute a board of food administration, and who shall perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. One of said commissioners shall be a farmer actually engaged at the time of his appointment in the cultivation of the soil. The President shall designate the chairman of said board. Said commissioners shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war.

And inserting in lieu thereof what I send to the desk. I ask to have read the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of the amendment after the word "act" and the period, and insert:

A board of food and fuel administration is hereby established. Said board shall consist of five members. The Secretary of Agriculture shall be ex officio a member of said board, and shall act as chairman thereof. The other four members of said board shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. All of the members of said board shall be bona fide residents of the United States and qualified electors thereof. At least one of said members shall be a practical farmer. At least two of said members shall be presidents of land-grant colleges under the act approved July 2, 1862, and commonly known as the Morrill Act. Said presidents shall be selected from colleges located in the principal wheat-producing States. Not more than three of said five members shall belong to the same political party: Provided, That the presidents of the two colleges designated shall be entitled to receive the difference between the salary received as such president and the $10,000, with a reasonable allowance for traveling expenses, to be approved and paid by the board. When the five members herein authorized have been duly commissioned by the President they shall organize for business. A majority of the board shall constitute a quorum to transact business: Provided, however, That whenever the minimum price authorized in this act is fixed the two presidents of the land-grant colleges herein referred to shall be present.

That the president is authorized temporarily to transfer and assign to said board such duties now devolved upon other departments, bureaus, divisions, and commissions.

Mr. REED. I ask the acting chairman of the committee if he can not accept this amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not feel that I have any authority to accept the amendment. I will say to the Senator that I differ from the provisions which I have myself offered; I believe that the whole food control ought to be under one person, one food controller, one management; but in order to try to arrange a bill that we might agree upon, I have consented, so far as I am concerned, to the substitute that I have offered for the original section.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is not in order. We are now considering a motion to strike out the first section and to insert. Under the practice of the Senate not more than one motion to strike out and insert can be in order at the same time. That is for this reason: Whenever a motion to strike out and insert is entertained, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted are privileged to be considered as separate questions and as subject to amendment. If the second motion to strike out and insert should be entertained, it is in effect a motion to strike out a certain part and to insert another part, just as is the Chamberlain motion is to strike out a certain part of the bill and to insert another part. If a motion to strike out and insert can be superimposed one on another in that way, we should never come to any end, and we should have amendments offered in the sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth degrees.

We had this matter up the other day when we were considering the prohibition section; it was then debated, and it was then ruled by the occupant of the chair at that time—I have forgotten who it was—that a second motion to strike out and insert could not be superimposed on an original motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, either I greatly misunderstand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from New Hampshire does. Of course, you can not superimpose a motion to strike out and insert on another motion to strike out and insert; that is quite true; but as I understand, the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is simply a perfecting amendment to the substitute, which is open as a separate question. It is not a proposition to strike out and insert, but the Senator proposes to change certain words of the substitute. I can not see that he has not an absolute right to do so. There are two separate questions—the original text and the substitute. If the Senator moves to strike out and insert, I entirely agree he can not properly do that.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the motion can not be anything else, because the motion is to substitute for certain language in the bill certain other language. That is the original motion of the Senator from Oregon—to substitute certain language for certain other language that is now in section 1, to wit, the whole section. Now, the motion to substitute certain language for other language is a motion to strike out language not desired, and to insert language that is desired. The motion to substitute has invariably, under the practice of the Senate, been considered a motion to strike out and insert. That was so when we had the Federal-reserve act under consideration for determination. We then had exactly this situation presented. The original bill, the Owen substitute, and the Hitchcock amendment. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] offered the first section of his amendment for the first section of the original House bill. That was first entertained, and entertained just as the motion of the Senator from Oregon is entertained here. Now the Senator from Oregon moves to substitute one section for another by moving to strike out and insert.

Mr. LODGE. No doubt that is perfectly true.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator from Missouri can move to substitute his amendment by moving to strike out and insert——

Mr. LODGE. That is not the point; nobody is denying that it is a motion to strike out a portion of the text of the first section and to insert something else. Under our Rule XVIII every bill is subject to perfecting amendments. I may have misunderstood the Senator from Missouri, and if I have, I hope he will correct me; but I understood him to move to amend a portion of the offered substitute.

Mr. REED. By striking out certain words and inserting others.

Mr. LODGE. By striking out certain words in the offered substitute. To move to strike out and insert anything to perfect an amendment or to substitute has been held over and over again to be in order.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me, let me make this suggestion: Suppose that the rule is accepted as advocated by the Senator from New Hampshire, let us see where we would come out. Assume that this bill had certain numerals in it, as, for instance, $10,000, and it was desired to change them to $5,000. The only way in the world we could make an amendment would be to move to strike out "$10,000" and to insert "$5,000." The Senator from New Hampshire has set up a rule here that would make it impossible in any way to change the text of a proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] as yet has no status in the bill. The motion made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is not to strike anything out of the bill, but merely to change the language of the proposed amendment. His motion is much in the nature of a perfecting amendment. The present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that the Senate rules can not be so construed as to prevent the Senate from perfecting a pending amendment. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order raised by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to beg the attention of the Senate to this amendment. We have proceeded to a point where it must be agreed that there ought to be a commission to execute the powers contained in the bill. The question now is whether we shall have a commission of three or a commission of five, and also what shall be the qualifications of the members of that commission.

Ordinarily in the Senate, when it is proposed to confer powers upon the Secretary of Agriculture, it is taken for granted that that is a thing that ought to be done if it relates in any way to agriculture. It now seems to be almost settled, from the last vote, that this bill is to deal only with agricultural products and fuel. Under those circumstances, I can not see how we can justify ourselves to the country for refusing to place upon this board as one of its members the man who is at the head of the Agricultural Department of the United States, who has placed under him a very large corps of salaried assistants, who has those men already located in every county and almost in every village in the United States, who is possessed of a vast and potential working machinery, and who is not only himself supposed to be an expert but whose army of helpers are supposed to be experts. To throw aside this machinery, to ignore it, to set it at naught, and to refuse to employ it can not be justified by any sound argument, and will not be justified upon this floor.

In addition to that, my amendment proposes that there shall be named upon this commission the presidents of two agricultural colleges located in the great wheat belt of the United States. If that provision thus put into the amendment is carried out, we shall have two of the great experts connected with agricultural education upon the board, and who are consequently in touch with the agricultural conditions from those parts of the country that are to be especially affected by this bill.

The amendment then proposes that one member of the board shall be a practical farmer. The amendment further proposes that all of the members of the board shall be qualified electors of the United States who have lived in the United States for at least 12 months.

Mr. President, I want this bill that is to control the American market to be controlled by Americans, by men whose every interest is united to America and who have no interest elsewhere sufficient to control their judgment. I put into the RECORD a day or two ago the authorities showing that Mr. Hoover's entire manhood life has been spent outside of the United States; that his connection to-day is with a large number of English, Belgian, Chinese, and Russian companies; and that, so far as I was able to learn, he is connected with but one American company. I put it upon the conscience of this Senate whether, in administering our foods and our fuels, we ought to turn that matter over to a man whose every interest is with some other country than our own, who for many years has made only a few trips to the United States, and then, according to one of his eulogists, has taken the fastest boat here and the fastest boat away.

We may ignore this if we please, but I say to the Senate and I say to the country that there are one or two distinguished Englishmen here now who are engaged in the task of endeavoring to secure for the English Government the same prices which our Government secures from its American producers. They are also engaged in the task of trying to secure the same prices for American food for the people of Europe that are charged to our people. I do not blame these agents of foreign Governments for endeavoring to accomplish that; but I do say that our own Government should see to it that our own markets and our own people are represented by those who have no interest save in America. If the Senate does not pause to listen now, I predict that the country will listen. I call your attention to the following article recently published in a newspaper:

EMBARGO HASTENS END, SAYS RHONDDA—BRITISH FOOD CONTROLLER DECLARES IT ALSO WILL HELP SOLVE ALLIES' FOOD PROBLEM.

LONDON, July 10.

Lord Rhondda, the food controller, in a statement to the Associated Press to-day on the embargo proclamation of President Wilson, said:

"The comprehensive and effective character of the President's latest action is typical of the way the United States has thrown itself heart and soul into the war. It seems to me that the additional pressure which thereby will be brought to bear upon our enemies should go far toward bringing this struggle to an earlier termination, especially in view of the fact that in applying an embargo on provisions the President will have the advantages of Mr. Hoover's unequaled knowledge of conditions in the neutral countries.

"The embargo, by diverting supplies from neutral destinations, also should help to solve the food problem of the European allies. But while our difficulties as regards supply are appreciably eased by this embargo, we can not really effectively deal with the vital and pressing question of price until Congress passes the food bill. So long as there is no control over the principal market, so long obviously must the prices of the allies' staple food remain variable, and, as a rule, dangerously high.

I put that in, in answer to those who state they do not have to pay high prices in England. I continue reading:

I hope soon to announce measures for the control of our own home-grown crops. This should help to equalize distribution and reduce prices. But it will, of course, be infinitesimal as compared with the world-wide effect of the present food discussion in Congress, the result of which we await with natural anxiety.

You may be assured that England will give the control of her food prices to a great Englishman, who will get the best prices he can for England. I want to put the control of American foods and food prices in a board of American citizens who have no alliances abroad, and I call your attention to the fact that, reading between the lines, we all must know that it is not in the terms of this food bill Lord Rhonda finds his solace and content and hope; it is in the administrator of the bill, for there is nothing in the terms of the bill to give him such hope.

Mr. HOLLIS and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire is recognized, having first risen.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is very frankly aimed at Mr. Hoover. It is no secret to the Senate, nor to the country, that the junior Senator from Missouri is very bitterly opposed to Mr. Hoover, and we are to have a chance on this amendment to vote whether we want Mr. Hoover kicked out of a very important position, or whether we do not. If the Senate sympathize with the views so often and so forcibly expressed by the Senator from Missouri on the floor of the Senate for the last fortnight, I assume that they will vote his amendment into the bill and thereby vote Mr. Hoover out.

I do not know Mr. Hoover; I have never met him; I have seen him only twice, and that was twice on the same day, when he was mercilessly cross-examined by the Senator from Missouri, very much as he would have been examined if he had been on trial for some crime in a police court.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not yield. I have not the time to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I simply want to challenge that statement, and say that it is absolutely untrue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator——

Mr. REED. And the record will show it is untrue.

Mr. HOLLIS. The record will speak for itself.

Mr. REED. It will.

Mr. HOLLIS. It has been published; the Senator has referred to it many times; he has attacked Mr. Hoover mercilessly on many occasions, and I say the record shows that he attacked him mercilessly on that occasion, as if he had been up before a police court for stealing chickens in Kansas City. I repeat that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I refuse to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HOLLIS. All the Senators have heard the Senator from Missouri; they have listened to the Senator from Missouri going on day after day. I have not interrupted him, and I refuse to be interrupted now.

Another reason why I object to this amendment is that five members on a commission of this sort would make it unwieldy. It should be smaller. There should not be more than three. I do not know of any other variance between the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri and the one offered by the Senator from Oregon, but I believe, and I hope, that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon may be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri rises to a question of personal privilege. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. I say that the statement just made by the Senator that I mistreated Mr. Hoover in any respect in examining him and that I made any attack upon him in examining him is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. And that the printed record——

Mr. HOLLIS. I think I ought to call the Senator to order. This is no place to indulge in words of that kind——

Mr. REED. The printed record will show——

Mr. HOLLIS. Or in fisticuffs or in altercations of any sort. The record will speak for itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. REED. The question of personal privilege is just what I have said, that the statement made by the Senator is untrue, and that the record——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator is subject to being called to order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not a question of personal privilege. It is not a question of personal privilege to arise for the purpose of calling another Senator a liar on the floor of this body.

Mr. REED. I have not employed any such language. It remained for the Senator from Mississippi to employ it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator said "totally untrue and absolutely false." That amounts to what I said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not see any distinction. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri was stating his question of personal privilege. The Chair warns the Senator from Missouri to use different language than he has been using.

Mr. REED. I am endeavoring to state it. The Senator has asserted that I mistreated Mr. Hoover when examining him; that I treated him as a chicken thief, and he employed similar expressions. I say, as a question of personal privilege, that that statement is a reflection upon me. Now, I say, in reply to the statement, that the record is printed; every word that I said to Mr. Hoover appears in the record, every word that he said in reply appears in the record, and no candid man can read it and find in it the slightest justification for the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire. That is what I say as a matter of personal privilege, and I say to the Senator—I say to the Senate, not to the Senator from New Hampshire—that I invite every man who is fair and decent and honest to read my questions to Mr. Hoover and to read his answers.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, notwithstanding what the Senator from Missouri has just said, it is plain, palpable, and obvious to every Member of the Senate who has been listening to him for some days—many days—that he has been engaged in the business of prosecuting Mr. Hoover.

Now, Mr. President, the object of the Senator from Missouri, if I understand it, is to prevent the President from appointing a man of his choice to this place, or else, if the President does appoint a man of his choice, to so handicap the man that he may be helpless.

Mr. President, if I had my way about this bill I would appoint one man to take charge of this matter and I would name him in the bill, and I would name Hoover. I would name him especially because of the absolutely uncalled for, unprovoked, and unjustified attacks that have been made upon him.

The Senator from Missouri says we may "rest assured that England will appoint a great Englishman" for this sort of position. If America appoints Hoover, she will appoint a great American for this position, one of the greatest in this country. The Bible was not false when it said that "a prophet is not without honor save in his own country." This particular prophet has been honored everywhere except right here. He is a virile American of both the self-made and college-made type. He is a man all over, every fiber of him—intellectual, physical, and moral. He is not a volunteer for any Government "job." He was called upon to perform a public duty; he answered the call; and he has been prosecuted upon this floor as if he were a criminal, or a suspect at any rate. The line of argument pursued concerning him has been such as to arraign him as un-American and possibly dishonest. I repeat, Mr. President, that if I had my way I would name him in this bill, and I would name him for the purpose of answering these attacks, unprovoked, uncalled for, unjustified in every possible sense.

The Senator from New Hampshire says he does not know Mr. Hoover. I do. Mr. Hoover is head and shoulders above the average man. His Americanism can not be challenged. He is as loyal as man can be. Thomas Jefferson once said of old John Adams, "He is as honest as the God who made him." I will not say that about Hoover; I think it was a little sacrilegious to have been said about John Adams, even by Mr. Jefferson, but Mr. Hoover is as honest as God makes men. He has not merited a particle of the abuse which has been showered upon his head merely because he has answered a call to duty by the President of the United States.

The more men there are upon this commission the less efficiently it is going to work. This is a war commission to meet a war emergency, and it ought to be a one-man power, and that man held to strict responsibility, and that man ought to be the choice of the President of the United States, who is the Chief Magistrate of this country.

The Senator says he wants a man who has no interest save for America. I do not. We have got a number of allies in this fight, and it is a great fight. It includes nearly the whole world, and I should dislike to see America appoint a man to run any part of this job who had no eye and no ear save for America. I want an eye and an ear for France and Belgium. I want a man who has been identified to some extent with poor, stricken Belgium; a man whose heart is overflowing with sympathy and mercy and benevolence, and whose deeds will overflow with beneficence for her. I do not want any mere selfish Chauvinist in this position.

If there is a position in the world that does demand widespread sympathy for all the world, and especially for our allies, it is this position. I would not like the little provincial president of a State agricultural college to handle a great international question like this. In nine cases out of ten he would be incompetent for the job. I regard the utterance of the desire to have a man who is an American, "nothing but an American," and solely American in his sympathies, as shameful.

Mr. President, I repeat, I wish I had the opportunity to vote to put the name of Hoover in this bill. "A prophet," as I have said, "is not without honor save in his own country." Hoover was not without honor in Belgium; he has not been without honor in France—lovely, amiable, sweet France, suffering as never people suffered before, fighting as people never fought before, our ally in this great war for the liberty of the entire world. I am glad, if it be true, that Hoover permits his Americanism not entirely to monopolize him; but that he has sympathy for the French and the Belgians and the other peoples, and will to some extent adapt his conduct to their needs and necessities. I say I am glad if that be true, as is charged.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I beg to offer a suggestion to the Senate respecting this provision in the bill. The suggestion is merely an expression of my feeling as to what will be the final effect of the operations of the particular method prescribed in the proposed substituted measure.

Mr. President, I do not rise to enter into the controversy as to the fitness or unfitness of any particular gentleman for the position designated. The measure provides that whoever may be named shall be named by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I tendered such an amendment myself while in executive session here, it being my theory then, as it is my opinion now, that no one should be appointed to administer great trusts over the people and upon them without the people's representatives having in some wise a supervision of them. If the Secretary of War himself, the Secretary of State himself, and the Secretaries of the Cabinet, generally, can not enter upon their duties, as responsible as they are, without being submitted to this body for confirmation, surely no other officer having only contemporaneous powers should be permitted to exercise them without the same constitutional supervision as is applied to the members of the Cabinet.

To that extent, therefore, I approve the section, in that it calls for the confirmation of the appointee, whoever he is, by the people's representatives, the Senate. But, Mr. President, I can not approve, as I view the situation, this board as substituting the place of the one who should be the head of the food-control agency. When the time comes to name that officer he should be a man who has the ability to create a board or a bureau. He himself should be the head; the members of the bureau should be his subordinates, subject to his employment and to his dismissal. He should have authority, full and complete.

Mr. President, if we name a board constituted of a large number, I warn you now, sir, we will have another repetition of that inexcusable situation which confronts America touching the Shipping Board and the Shipping Corporation. If the matter of the construction of ships had been placed in a single responsible head, which person had been subject to the confirmation of this body, there would have been no such exhibition as that to-day of a contest for epaulets between commanding heads of contesting agencies for the gratification of their ambition, while the opportunities of America are being wasted and her need is passing by without being served at a critical hour. America observes that at a time when there should be the ringing of the hammer, the buzz of the saw, and the employment of hundreds of thousands of men in building ships in order that our men may be quickly transported and our food soon conveyed, we have instead a conflict between boards and members of boards as to which shall dominate, who shall be captain, which shall be general, who shall have the power before the country and be recognized as king of the enterprise. Surely we will not duplicate that sort of thing, I trust, in this essential and serious matter of distribution of the foods and the control of them.

Therefore, Mr. President, as I would be opposed to a war board of many of equal authority, lest in a conflict between them we come to confusion; as I will oppose the war board proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] because of the reasons which I now urge; because I would oppose a board to run the State Department or a board to run the War Department or a board to run the Department of Justice, I respectfully urge that what should be done is simply that there should be one responsible head, whose qualifications should be submitted to the Senate in the person himself and should there be canvassed and investigated, and, if found competent, in the single authority should be vested the full and complete power, for, sir, all else will be distraction.

The Holy Scripture admonishes us that in the multitude of counselors there is security; but we are likewise informed that in the number of captains there is confusion.

Sir, with the exhibition we have had in this Government up to this time, I am unable to give my approval to a section that, to my thinking, will complicate the situation with too many who will contest between themselves for power. I favor one substantial head, appointed by the President, and submitted to this body for confirmation.

Because of these views, sir, I can not give my favor to the section, and I am unable to give my indorsement to a measure that calls for many instead of one.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, it is to have a commission of five. It is true, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has just said, that as to matters which in times of peace ought to be considered very carefully, numbers of counselors are generally better in deliberating as to the wisest course to follow; and in peace times I have not any doubt that a commission of some kind would probably be better than a one-man power. But, Mr. President, I do not subscribe to the view that there is going to be any usurpation of power by one man. I have heard a good deal of discussion upon the subject and the fear expressed that usurpation of power might result; and, of course, if these were normal times there is no question that a bill of this kind would produce a condition which would be serious. But, Mr. President, these are not normal times; they are war times; and as quick as we realize that we must know that we must have a concentration of power in order to get effective work. You might as well say that we could have a commission of five to determine and direct what an army should do on the field of battle. That is probably an extreme illustration, but no one would suggest any such thing as that. It is true that sometimes conferences are had, but the one man that has the power to direct is the man that must be supreme in his control. This is an executive function to be performed. We do not have three Secretaries of War nor three Secretaries of the Navy nor three Presidents. If we did, we would have less efficient government.

I have no fear as to usurpation of power, since we have in this bill a limitation of all of these powers to the duration of the war. That is the safeguard. If we did not have that in this bill, there would not be a Senator who would vote for it, because there would be danger of power being usurped after the war. But when we consider that in times of war concentration of power is absolutely necessary, and we take into consideration the fact that under divided authority this power becomes weak and ineffective and contentions occur that impair the efficiency of the very object we wish to attain, it seems to me we ought not to consider such division of responsibility.

I am opposed to the amendment providing for five members. I would rather have a commission of three, or a board of three, than a board of five; but I would rather have one man to direct this whole administration of affairs than to have a commission of three. I should not want to do that in time of peace, but I think it is eminently proper that we should do it in time of war.

If there is one thing that history has demonstrated it is that democracies can not conduct war until they give autocratic power. There is no way of conducting a war successfully without vesting the power in a centralized form, practically in one man; and every time a republic engages in war you find that legislation of that kind always takes place. If it is not done there will be dissensions, there will be differences of opinion, you will have in your ranks dissenters, and the inevitable result is that you will not wage a successful war.

I have no doubt that the action of one man in supreme authority will be direct, it will be specific, it will be to the point. There is here a great problem to be solved and much valuable time will be lost if we have a commission or a board. The inevitable result, to my mind, will be a detrimental effect on the administration of this measure.

The illustration which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has just given demonstrates to my mind that it would be far better to have this shipbuilding program in the hands of either Mr. Denman or Gen. Goethals. Either one of them would do the work better and would produce better results, and the very fact that they jangle, and that they dispute, and that they are continually seeking to have their particular scheme adopted demonstrates to my mind that in division there is want of proper administrative power.

Mr. President, these are the principles that it seems to me ought to control this body. We ought to have, in my judgment, one man, and I am convinced that we will get better administration in that way. No one here is trying to do an injury. Some have talked as if the President might crush industry or might do something that is detrimental to the people. Why, the interest of the President and the interest of Mr. Hoover are identical with the general interest of the Nation. It can not be that any man holding a high or responsible position intends to do anything but what is good for the general public, and for that reason we have no danger of any action by either Mr. Hoover or the President that will work injury to the Nation at large. In this bill it is expected that if any commandeering takes place it will be done upon an equitable basis, and that no injury will be done to the persons that have to yield up the things that are required by the President. On that account I can not conceive why we should expect or why we should want anything but this concentration of power either in the President or somebody that he shall designate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I should like to ask the Senator if it is his understanding that the war powers in Great Britain have been vested in one man or in a war council consisting of several members?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not know what has been the action in Great Britain. Perhaps they have the system of a commission. I do not know. I think a commission is a very desirable thing to advise with, but there ought to be one man to determine these matters, and you will find that all the successful campaigns were made under either one-man power or, if it was not a direct power, it was an implied power in the person.

Why, take the German Government to-day: The will of the Emperor is supreme in all of the central powers. Why is it that they have made such an effective resistance to such great powers as the entente allies? It is because one man directs them. The other central nations are willing that the control should be turned over to him. They no doubt consult with him; they no doubt advise him, and perhaps their advice may be taken by him; but the effective operation of their work is in the concentration of that power in the German Emperor himself.

I have not any doubt that Napoleon's wars were successful because the will of Napoleon was supreme, because whatever he said, if he did not have the constitutional power to do it, it was the will of the legislative power, or the will of the cabinet, or the will of those intrusted with the power to let him handle it, and his word was just as good as if he had been vested with the power itself. These are matters which are necessary in war. They are intolerable in peace. There is no excuse for them in peace. For that reason, if we are going to fight this war to a successful issue, we must have an exercise of those powers that have proved to be successful in other wars. When we find that this is generally conceded to be the one proper step, I do not think we need fear usurpation of power in determining what our action should be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment:

Add, after the word "soil," the words: "The members of said board shall, at the time of their appointment, be qualified electors of the United States."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Missouri looks to me. I do not know whether he expects me——

Mr. REED. I thought perhaps the Senator would accept the proposition that a man could not serve on this American board unless he was a qualified elector.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, and so far as I am able, I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I should like to hear the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "soil," in the proposed amendment of the Senator from Oregon, it is proposed to insert the words:

The members of said board shall, at the time of their appointment, be qualified electors of the United States.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think it ought rather to be "citizens of the United States." I remember hearing a very distinguished admiral, a man who had been in command of a fleet at Santiago, say that he had not been an elector, but that he had fought for his country all his life. He had not had a residence, even, because he was at sea. I can conceive of a case where a man might not be an elector—that is, he might not have the right to vote—and yet he would be a citizen of the United States. If it is limited to citizenship, I have no objection to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it does seem to me that using the word "elector" might put us in a situation that would not be pleasant. Suppose a man failed to be in his town at the last election, and failed to vote, he is not a qualified elector. Consequently, it might catch any number of people in the United States; but if the word "citizen" is used, I can see no objection to it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that it ought to be "a qualified elector in the State in which he resides," or "in the State of his residence," because there is no such thing as a qualified elector of the United States, suffrage being a local matter, regulated by State law.

Mr. REED rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Missouri on the assumption that he desires the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I rose to answer the interrogatory or suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma. I do not want my time to be running while I am looking for this.

Mr. GORE. The Senator can answer in my time, if that is satisfactory to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will permit it on this occasion, without counting the time in which the Senator is looking for a reference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the definition given by Bouvier of an elector, which I call to the attention of the Senator from Oregon, is as follows:

One who has the right to make choice of public officers; one who has a right to vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator believe that because a man failed to vote at a civic election he should be denied the right to hold this office?

Mr. GORE. I do not think the qualifications of a voter depend on the actual fact that he voted.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that the use of the word "elector" means that he is qualified to cast a vote at each election.

Mr. GORE. Oh, no. It does mean that he must be qualified to cast a vote, but he need not necessarily have cast a vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The word "citizen," it seems to me, would be a much better word. Suppose, for instance, that Mr. Hoover was in Belgium at this time in the interest of the Government or in the interest of the Red Cross, doing the very kind of work which it is expected he will do under this bill. Because he may not have been here at the time of the election in November last, is it possible that anybody would think he ought to be deprived of the power of appointment, solely and purely because he was in that foreign country doing good?

Mr. GORE. Why, Mr. President, I will say, if the Senator is addressing that to me as a question, that nobody would reach such a conclusion as that, nor would that be the effect of this amendment. For my own part, I was in Phoenix, Ariz., when the election occurred last November. That in no sense disqualifies me as an elector in the State of Oklahoma. The exercise of the right to vote, and being qualified to exercise the right, are two entirely different questions.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator recognizes the fact, does he not, that in order to be an elector you have to be registered?

Mr. GORE. In some States that is true. In some States it is not true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, that may be, but in most of the States I think in order to be a qualified elector you have to be registered, and if you miss the election one time in my State your name goes off the roll, and the result is you have to reregister before you become an elector again.

Mr. GORE. My suggestion is that there is really no such thing as a qualified voter or elector of the United States. I think the word "inhabitant," perhaps, would be a better word. The expression was used, though, by the Senator from Missouri, and, of course, I am not responsible for the phrase.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, answering the Senator, there can be no question about the proposition that the word "elector," as employed here, would simply mean one who possesses the qualifications of an elector; it would mean a person living within the United States who has the right to go to the polls and vote. It would not turn at all upon the question of whether he happened to be registered.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator why, in this particular case, he uses language which has never been used in any statute of this kind before? Why not use the words "citizen of the United States"? Nobody can object to that.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator accept "citizen and inhabitant of the United States for 12 months"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator has very frankly stated what his purpose is here. His purpose is, as he has frankly stated, to take it out of the power of the President to appoint Mr. Hoover. Now, I do not see why the Senator should insist for that purpose upon having something inserted in the law that would carry out that purpose. I do not know that it would, but he is varying the language that all the statutes use when he uses the words "elector of the United States."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am utterly amazed that the Senator from Oregon should have asked my learned friend, the Senator from Missouri, why he resorts to this technical, subtle, ingenious amendment. The Senator ought to know that this great lawyer, the Senator from Missouri, is using this amendment as an ingenious and subtle way of excluding Mr. Hoover. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] does not want Mr. Hoover, under any circumstances, to be appointed, and the Senator from Oregon wasted the Senate's time when he asked that question, because we all knew what it meant—a dirk in the belt ready to be thrust at Mr. Hoover in some way, any way, to prevent Hoover from being appointed on this board.

Now, there is no such thing as a national voter or national elector. There may be such a thing as a national citizen, but there is no "national voter," and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], great constitutional lawyer that he is, is willing now to transcend the bounds of the Constitution, which he has invoked so many times in this debate, in order to do what? To do a disservice to his country.

Mr. KENYON and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not willing to vote for an amendment to exclude Mr. Hoover from this board. At the same time I think a man who serves on this board ought to be a citizen of the United States, and I believe Mr. Hoover is. Everybody knows that Mr. Hoover was absent from this country for a number of years while engaged in some wonderfully splendid humanitarian work. That ought not to count against him.

I ask the Senator from Oregon if he will not accept an amendment providing that the members of this board shall be citizens of the United States, and I ask the Senator from Missouri if he is not willing to accept that amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator, I thought I had expressed a willingness to have the words "citizen of the United States" inserted in the bill. I think they ought to be there. If I did not make myself clearly understood, I say now that I am perfectly willing to have the language inserted that is usually placed in statutes of this kind; that is, that these men shall be citizens of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. I did not understand that the Senator had made that clear. That is fair and right, and I hope the Senator from Missouri will accept that amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I shall object to the motion made by the Senator from Missouri for this reason: Every qualification that is added to the text offered by the Senator from Oregon is a limit tying the hands of the Executive just so much. Now, the President of the United States may be safely trusted to appoint proper persons to these places. I do not know whether Mr. Hoover is even a citizen or not; but if the President of the United States, on looking up the matter, finds that he is not a citizen, but still wants to appoint him on this board, I believe he should have the right to do it. Then, when the matter comes before the Senate for confirmation, if the majority of the Senators think that the men who have been nominated by the President should not hold the offices, they will fail of confirmation.

The country is behind the President of the United States on this matter of food control, as it is behind him on all other matters. The country is impatient of delay. The country is impatient of the technical questions that have been raised. The country will be impatient that this attack is made in this side way on Mr. Hoover, in the hope that a majority of the Senators will not dare to vote against a proposition of this kind. Now, I am not afraid to vote against it. I hope a majority of the Senators are not afraid to vote against it. The President will see whether Mr. Hoover is a citizen of the United States. Whether he is a citizen of the United States or not, the President will then decide whether he wants to put him on the board, and then the Senate will have a right to pass upon his qualifications when the matter comes to the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to remind the Senator from Missouri that he has spoken once.

Mr. REED. I call the Chair's attention to the fact that I distinctly said I was answering in the time of the Senator from Oklahoma and I sat down without saying what I wanted to say. I hope the Chair did not misunderstand my position. I have tried to make it very plain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes upon reflection that the Senator from Missouri is correct.

Mr. REED. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the burning blast that comes from the sterile Arizona and the frigid wave that blows from New Hampshire, I venture to say there is nothing subtle and there is nothing concealed in this amendment. I openly proclaim my desire to have the Senate of the United States say what the qualifications shall be of the men who are to compose this board that is to have power to dictate the prices of all that the people consume in the shape of food and fuel, and to dictate the prices that shall be paid to the 45,000,000 people engaged in agricultural pursuits. It seemed to me that it was a very modest request that the men appointed should be "qualified electors of the United States." The term as thus employed means nothing more than that a man shall not be selected unless he is possessed of that character of citizenship which entitles him to vote. It does not mean that he technically shall have registered but he must be a man who is entitled to register. It does not mean that he shall have voted at the last election or that he must vote at the next election, but it means that he must be a man who possesses qualifications that will enable him to vote at the next election.

If that be treason or heresy, if that be wickedness, then let my friends and enemies alike regard it as suits them best. I say that Congress does still have some duties to perform, and that one of these duties is to see that those placed in positions of great power over citizens of the United States shall themselves be citizens of the United States. I reply further that I will answer to my own constituency, and am not alarmed though I am warned by a man who has probably never been in my State that the people are impatient. And I will answer to them as I answer now in due sobriety and not out of the dregs of intoxication.

I am reminded this morning of the fact that history repeats itself. I read:

> His personal influence—
> That is, Jefferson's—
> prevailed in everything. Members of Congress knew very well how sorely the bill would pinch, but they never dreamed of disobeying. "All our surplus produce will rot on our hands!" cried a Member of the House. "God knows what all this means! I can not understand it. I see effects, but I can trace them to no cause. * * * Darkness and mystery overshadow this House and the whole Nation. We know nothing; we are permitted to know nothing. We sit here as mere automata; we legislate without knowing; nay, sir, without wishing to know why or wherefore." The embargo was to be tried because Mr. Jefferson believed in its efficacy.
> The closing year of his Presidency was darkened and distressed by its effects.

So wrote Woodrow Wilson, the historian, of Mr. Jefferson, the President, and the Congress of that time. So will the future historian write of Woodrow Wilson, the President, and the Congress of this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to offer an amendment to that, and I ask the Secretary to read it as I have indicated it there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the proposed amendment of the Senator from Oregon strike out, in line 18, after the word "appoint," the words "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners"; in line 21, strike out the word "each," and, in the same line, strike out the words "who shall constitute a board"; in line 22, strike out the word "administration" and insert the word "administrator," and, after the word "administration," strike out the words "and who shall" and insert the word "to"; in lines 24 and 25 of the proposed amendment as printed in the committee print strike out the words "One of said commissioners shall be a farmer actually engaged at the time of his appointment in the cultivation of the soil. The President shall designate the chairman of said board"; and in line 3, page 3 of the printed amendment, strike out the word "commissioners" and insert the words "food administrator," so that it will read:

> He is further authorized and directed to appoint Herbert C. Hoover, at an annual salary of $7,500, payable monthly, food administrator to perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. Said food administrator shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, this controversy seems to very largely revolve around Mr. Hoover, and it seems to me that the Senate should declare definitely whether or not it wants Mr. Hoover to act as food commissioner. It seems to be generally understood that the President wants to appoint Mr. Hoover commissioner. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that if we are going to have a commission we ought to have, for the purposes of this act, a commission composed of one person, a person who can act decidedly, definitely, and promptly in these matters.

I know but very little about Mr. Hoover, except what I have heard. I have met him twice. I will say that I was very favorably impressed with him. I believe that he is about as competent a man as we could get to discharge the responsibilities that we intend to repose in some commission by the terms of this act, and if we have to have some one to do these things, I would as soon see Mr. Hoover appointed to do them as anybody I know of.

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. VARDAMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Washington that his amendment, in my judgment, is excellent, except in naming a man. Mr. Hoover may die even before this bill becomes operative or he may die at any time during the war, and consequently it ought to read "an administrator to be appointed by the President." It seems to me, when you name one man you are doing that which might make the bill totally inoperative. I agree with the Senator that there ought to be a one-man power in exercising the powers that are vested under the bill, and I agree heartily with every syllable of his amendment except putting in the name of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to yield first to the Senator from Mississippi who rose.

Mr. GORE. I hope the Senator from Washington will permit me to say to the Senator from Colorado that if by any mischance or misfortune Mr. Hoover should shuffle off this mortal coil the American people would be helpless and hopeless. They would be sorrowing as those without hope.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I now yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I rose to make the same inquiry which is suggested by the Senator from Colorado. It seems to me that it is needless to put in the name of Mr. Hoover. Everybody knows that the President would appoint him to perform the functions of this office. As the Senator from Colorado has suggested, suppose he should die or decline to accept the place, what would become of the country? Can we afford to take any chances on it?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that under the Constitution we would be infringing upon the functions of the President if we undertook to name the officer in this act. The Senate has no function to perform in respect to the appointment of officers. The Constitution provides that the President shall nominate and, by and with the consent of the Senate, appoint officers created by law. So it would be futile, as far as the President is concerned, to name Herbert C. Hoover in this act. He could appoint John Jones in spite of the fact that the act contained such a provision.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is right, and, in view of the fact that the Constitution would prevent us from naming Mr. Hoover, I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now wish, if it is in order, to present the amendment which I presented yesterday and have it acted upon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not think this question has been disposed of.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GORE. I simply desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the Constitution obtains in time of war?

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand there is no amendment before the Senate at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not wish to speak on that, and I shall not seek the floor until it has been disposed of.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and I insisted on the floor of the Senate the other day upon it. I believe that one man on this commission would be better than three.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana took the floor this morning, when the amendment of the Senator from Oregon was the pending amendment.

Mr. MYERS. I did not speak upon this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Upon this pending amendment. The Chair has no way of telling what a Senator is going to talk upon. The amendment to the amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. MYERS. What is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment, which has been pending all day, is the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon to insert as section 1 what has been read.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it again.

The SECRETARY. Strike out section 1 and insert the following:

That, by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement, of foods, feeds, and fuel, including kerosene and gasoline, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, or manipulations, affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem advisable to carry out the provisions of this act. He is furtner authorized and directed to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, three commissioners, at an annual salary of $7,500 each, payable monthly, who shall constitute a board of food administration, and who shall perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. One of said commissioners shall be a farmer actually engaged at the time of his appointment in the cultivation of the soil. The President shall designate the chairman of said board. Said commissioners shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to renew the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington, leaving out the name of Mr. Hoover.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of the proposed amendment after the word "appoint" and insert:

A food administrator at an annual salary of $7,500, payable monthly, to perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. Said food administrator shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I believe that the administration of this bill will be greatly aided and assisted by having one administrator. I believe a commission even of three will not produce any result as expeditiously as the one administrator charged with the responsibility of the performance of this duty.

I have said that I believe three would be preferable to five commissioners, but I believe that one in time of war is the proper number to have, and I am confident if you incorporate the amendment I have offered into the bill it will greatly improve the measure.

The fear of usurpation, it seems to me, is visionary. One-man power in war is necessary. Division of counsel produces delay. The inevitable result when you have commissions is that disagreements occur between the commissioners and that evidently would work to the inefficiency of the service.

For these reasons, Mr. President, it seems to me that we ought to take the bill as it was originally introduced in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is that very thing going on in the Shipping Board.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As the Senator from Mississippi has just said, we are having that very thing occurring in the Shipping Board.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think that the advice and counsel of a practical, intelligent farmer on the board would be productive of friction? Does not the Senator think that really it would be very helpful in the solution of the various problems which will come up for the consideration of the board? I think the advice and counsel of a sensible, patriotic, honest farmer would be helpful in discharging the duties of any office. Of all the vocations of man none is so calculated to develop all the latent qualities of mind and body and soul as that of the well-to-do farmer.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have not any doubt that advice of the farmer would be good and no doubt it would be taken, but to say that he shall have a voice in voting as to whether his policy shall be pursued will simply produce wrangling. I have not any doubt that Gen. Goethals and Mr. Denman are both excellent men, but they have radically different ideas concerning what is necessary to be done. It is a clear illustration of the saying that divided responsibility produces confusion and delay, and if there is one thing that is fatal in war it is hesitation. On that account it seems to me it is wise to have one executive officer.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would just like to ask the Senator if he does not think, in view of the fact that the farming interests are to be vitally affected, it would go largely to reassure the great mass of the producers of this country to know that there was a member of the board who was to pass upon the matters under consideration here, at least officially, who was one of their own class?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I do not think it will produce harmony. I believe it will produce dissension. I know that farmers are human.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Just like the representatives of the agricultural States here; they will want something in the bill that may be extreme, just like some of the Senators would like to have $2.80 named in the bill as a minimum price for wheat. But when you have one person who feels he must represent all classes and who is not connected with any industry, his judgment is likely to be better. Under any circumstances it produces discord, it produces delay, it produces an inefficiency of administration. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator talks as other Senators have talked about dissension in the Shipping Board. Does not the Senator know that the Shipping Board is an absolute unit; that there is not any dispute between them; that the dispute is between a general manager appointed by the Shipping Board and the board itself?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know what the dispute is in the Shipping Board, but I do know there are two elements, as it were, one represented by Gen. Goethals and the other represented by the chairman of the board. I know that when you have two people to pass upon measures you can not always have concord; men's minds are so constructed that they do not believe alike, though both are honest. When you have one man then you have one mind to control. Though that mind may not be as good as three, it will produce better effect in the end, because it will produce effectiveness.

Mr. President, I believe that as we are in war we ought to have an administration by one man, just like we have one general upon the field of battle. If you were going to have three men or five men to direct the Army you would have disputes as to what is the best course to pursue. We never provide for three governors or three sheriffs. We should never provide for more than one executive officer, especially in times of war. If you have farmers and men representing other industries upon this board you are going to have the farmers' side magnified by the farmer, you are going to have the coal industry's side magnified by the coal magnate, you are going to have some other industry's side magnified as to that member's industry. Under those circumstances either one of them charged with the duty of representing all would be better than to have all three, because the very disputes that will occur will cause delay in the determination of matters.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator puts himself in antagonism to the whole scheme of the management of national affairs in time of war.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not see that I am in antagonism with it.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think, in view of the fact that the farmer is the goat of this legislation, you would supplement it and make it perfect to exclude him from the board?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think so. I do not think the farmer is made the goat; I think the farmer is made the beneficiary. I think when you fix the minimum price at $1.75 a bushel for wheat he has a cinch. That is what I think, and it can not but produce great results in the way of stimulating that industry.

The inevitable result will be that supply and demand will control the price of wheat. In my judgment, when you attempt to regulate the maximum price, which this bill does not do, but even if it should attempt to do it, you will find great difficulty. You can not easily overcome the law of supply and demand that is recognized throughout the world as to controlling prices. You can modify it to some extent. But I am in favor of this bill even if it were to include fixing maximum prices, because I believe where exorbitant profits are extorted by certain industries the representatives thereof will yield to some extent in fear if nothing else of some punishment that might be inflicted upon them.

Mr. President, it does seem to me we should put this executive office in the hands of one man, such as the President has selected, but even if some one else should be selected it is better in time of war that we should have an administrator without a board.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am very much inclined to agree with the Senator from Colorado. I think even if we should have a commission of five we would, in fact, have but one member of the board. The others would draw their salaries, but there would be but one real executor. The only effect of a commission is to provide more salaries, more expense, and less efficiency. But the reason why I hesitate to support the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is because it does not seem to me exactly respectful toward our leaders. They have agreed upon this bill and have arranged what should go in and what should stay out, and among the other compromises was this, that some farmer should be appointed. That, of course, was to placate the farmer for having taken largely everything out of the bill except what the farmer produces. I do not think it is exactly square to our leaders on the Republican side, some of whom are present, some of whom are absent. I see one or two of the leaders who framed the bill on the other side. Some of them are absent.

I think before this is finally determined the Senator from Colorado ought to consult with the leaders who framed the bill. We ought to deal fairly with one another. We ought to deal honestly. How can the Senator from Colorado display such want of obedience to things after they have been fixed for us. These leaders of ours with great unselfishness, these sacrificing and noble leaders, representing great manufacturing States, great iron and steel and cotton States, have sacrificed their time, put forth their efforts and so framed the bill that it affects the producer alone. Could anything be more magnanimous than that? Shall we display our ungratefulness by rejecting their labors and their unselfish skill? I hesitate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are the leaders the Senator refers to members of the Agricultural Committee, or have they charge of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. No; they are the leaders of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. When did they have a meeting to consider this measure?

Mr. BORAH. Now, the Senator is getting into details. [Laughter.] It hardly seems proper in war times to reveal these secrets.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like very much to know who are the members of this self-constituted committee of leaders, if the Senator can give me the names.

Mr. BORAH. Men are not elected leaders; they are born leaders. [Laughter.] This bill has been framed by them. We ought not to attempt or assume for a moment to change it. I hope the Senator from Colorado can assure the Senator from Idaho that he has consulted with the leaders as to the privilege of offering this amendment. Do not lead us into dangerous paths, into a political cul de sac.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state that I do not know who are the persons referred to by the Senator from Idaho. I do believe that it is a good amendment to be made. I have not been informed that any particular number of men said we will frame a measure and put it through the Senate. They have their individual views, but the views of each Senator must be consulted. I would not consider myself bound by them if they had made the agreement, but it is like everything else in the way of a compromise. Men who have deep interest in this bill no doubt have conferred, and they have come to an agreement as to the differences among themselves, and they no doubt feel that it is best to put the measure in this shape. I feel that we ought to have an opportunity to determine the matter for ourselves on this particular amendment at least.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt they feel just as the Senator says they feel. I have seen evidences of that this morning by their votes. For some two or three weeks we spent time here putting different things in the bill which ought to be regulated and controlled. I heard some of the most intense and powerful arguments I have ever heard for putting this and that in the bill, but there came a change in the spirit of the dream, and the bill was reframed and reorganized. As we had framed the bill the things which the farmer must buy—farm implements, binder twine, fertilizers, and such things—were included, included after long debate. Now our leaders get together and, with a spirit of unselfishness seldom witnessed in legislative halls, take out of the bill everything in their States and leave in the products of the farm. I hesitate to record a disapproval of such magnanimous leadership.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the man who will fill this position will have as great responsibility as any Cabinet officer. In my opinion the Secretary of War will have no greater duty, no greater responsibility than the man who fills this position. It will be equal in importance and responsibility to that of any Cabinet officer. In fact, he will be a Cabinet officer in all but the name during the continuance of the war.

Suppose during the war we had three Secretaries of War, three Secretaries of the Navy, three Secretaries of Commerce, and three men filling positions at the head of each other executive department. Does anyone believe that the war would be prosecuted as speedily, effectively, decisively as it will be with one man at the head of each one of those departments?

I can not see but that there will be just as great responsibility resting upon the man who will fill this position as will rest upon any Cabinet officer most intimately connected with the war. It is of just as great importance and responsibility to provide food and supplies at home and for the Army as it is to raise an army and put it into the field to fight. An army in the field without food is of no more benefit than an army in the field without munitions would be. Food is just as essential to success in war as munitions, and the supply must come from the people who are working at home to support the troops in the field.

As I said the other day, I do not believe there is any doubt that one man, a man of action, decision, experience, skill, knowledge, executive ability, in this position would act more effectively, efficiently, promptly, and decisively than three men, for it is certain there would be more wrangling and delay with three than with one.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Before the Senator takes his seat, if he will permit me, I wish to ask him, since he has illustrated the point he is making by using the Secretary of War, have we not a Council of National Defense, consisting of more than one person, which we have to advise the Secretary of War?

Mr. MYERS. Yes; to advise the Secretary of War, and the food commissioner or administrator may have advisors.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Secretary of War is the chairman of the Council of National Defense.

Mr. MYERS. I do not so understand; but, anyway, we have only one head of the War Department, the Secretary of War. We should have one man at the head of the food administration, and he should be Mr. Hoover. He may have numerous assistants and advisors, but there should be one head and his word should be decisive.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We have the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Trade Commission, we have the different commissions that have been appointed in the wisdom of this body. We have distributed them so as to avoid one-man power, and we did it in the Council of National Defense.

While I am on my feet I wish to call attention to the fact that in the Council of National Defense every industry represented is represented by a personal interest.

Here we come to the conservation of food, and I heartily agree with the proposition incorporated in this amendment that there shall be a commission of three, one of whom shall be a representative of the class that produces those things which are to be administered; that that class shall be officially represented, just as the steel people are represented as to the steel supplies of this Government, just as the textile producers are represented on the board by those who are interested in textile work.

I am surprised that men in a democratic Government in this hour of our travail shall say that democracy is not competent to take care of and provide for its own perpetuation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, before the Senator from South Carolina takes his seat I desire to ask him a question. He has referred to the fact that we have an Interstate Commerce Commission and a Federal Trade Commission. Does not the Senator recognize that those commissions were framed for peace times? Does he not recognize that deliberation and judgment and time are necessary to solve the problems with which they deal?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Those commissions are operating in times of war, and their composition has not been changed. They operate during the war as officials, as they have done in times of peace.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but they operate as to matters which require discussion and judgment and hearing. You have got to give a hearing in such cases. The commission sits as a court, and you can not have such a form of administration to be effective in time of war.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that, even in our Council of National Defense, when the question arose as to the purchases of coal, I think it was, for the benefit of the people of America we had more than one commissioner. One man would not do. A price of $3.50 a ton for coal was asked, and it was refused because there had been contracts made for about half that price. That was one instance where having more than one man on a board saved the American people quite a nice sum of money. I took occasion to congratulate the man who stood by his guns and got the coal at a reasonable price. I believe that if we have more than one man on this board the people of America will be better satisfied, for it will be a nearer approach to democracy.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I had risen for the purpose of offering an amendment when the Senator from Colorado rose to offer his amendment. I am in favor of the amendment not only for the reasons which have already been given, and which I shall not repeat, but for the further reason that if this amendment is adopted the act, when it is passed, will be put into effect very promptly; but if we provide for a commission of three there is no telling when that commission will be organized. Judging from the past it will be quite a while. After the Federal reserve act was passed it was nearly a year before the board provided for therein was appointed. After the shipping law was passed it was several months before the Shipping Board was appointed. So if we provide for a commission of three in this bill, there is no telling when this act will be put into effect. It seems to be generally accepted that the President has the man selected whom he wants to administer this act. So if we provide for a commission with just one administrator the act will be put into effect promptly. That is what we want.

It has been urged that it is very important to have this act passed promptly. So we have said; and so, when we are going to vote on it, I think we ought not to put anything into it which is likely to delay putting it into effect.

The controversy between the Shipping Board and the management, and so forth, has been referred to in this debate, and I want to refer to a matter with reference to that. I think it is very unfortunate that we have this conflict; but the real injury that has come to the country has come not by reason of the controversy between Mr. Denman and Gen. Goethals, but the injury has come because of the failure on the part of the President to do promptly the things which we authorized him to do.

Over a month ago we authorized the President as follows:

> The President is hereby authorized and empowered, within the limits of the amounts herein authorized, to purchase, requisition, or take over the possession of for use or operation by the United States any ship now constructed or in the process of construction or hereafter constructed or any portion thereof or charter of such ship.

We gave that power to the President. The President could have exercised it, but he has not done so. We saw by the papers this morning or yesterday that ships under construction for foreign countries in our shipyards have not been commandeered. Why not? The President has the power to do it. I learned from reliable information a few days ago that within two or three weeks four large 8,000-ton steel ships, which were being constructed in the yards at Seattle, had been allowed to pass into the hands of a foreign country; and I saw in the papers two or three days ago that two 8,000-ton steel ships at Seattle had been allowed to pass under the Japanese flag. Mr. President, those ships ought to be under the American flag. They ought to have been put there under the authority given to the President over a month ago.

I am satisfied that the President has made up his mind as to whom he wants to appoint to carry out this act. I doubt if he has in mind a commission of three; he has not been considering that. So I am in favor of giving him the power to appoint one man, in the hope that he will do it the very next day after this act is passed and is put into effect.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Washington that I do not think the President deserves criticism for failing to do what the Senator has called attention to. If those ships are going to be used by the allies, I think it is a matter of prudence to permit some other nation to own and use them and thereby let some other nation than our own run the risk of having them sunk at sea. I do not see any ground for complaint or cause of censure of the President's failure to take them over. On the contrary, I think the President's conduct in the matter is highly commendable. These ships are going to serve the same purpose that they would serve if they were taken over by the United States, and the Government that takes them over will assume the risk of having them sunk. So I do not think the criticism of the President of the United States by the able and patriotic Senator from Washington is deserved in this instance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think there should be a commission of three to direct the handling and control of the commodities of this country, as provided in this amendment. The difference of time required by the President to appoint one man or three men to enforce the provisions of this bill will not delay the operation of the bill a day. Before the bill reaches the President it will have to go to conference, when it passes the Senate, and the conference report will have to be agreed to. Between now and until the bill reaches the President he will make up his mind whom he intends to appoint. I do not believe it will be 24 hours after he signs the bill before he sends the nominations of three persons to fill the positions provided for in this bill to the Senate of the United States for confirmation.

Mr. President, the labors involved in administering this bill will be so great that no one man can carry them into operation quickly. I have no doubt that the President will appoint Mr. Hoover as the chairman of the proposed commission. The bill authorizes him to appoint the chairman. I want to say that

Mr. Hoover will need all the assistance that he can possibly get. There will have to be an organization from one end of the country to the other, in every State, in every city, and in every little hamlet. I might say, Mr. President, that I think part of that organization is already effected; that I believe many of the men selected are in the different States to carry on the work as soon as the bill becomes a law. In fact, Mr. President, I think some work is being done now by a number of people in different States of the Union, and it can not help but be an advantage to Mr. Hoover to allow the President to select two persons who are qualified to assist him in carrying out the provisions of this bill.

I believe, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] said, that the board ought to have on it one farmer, who knows all about the details of the raising of wheat, its cost, and mode of handling, to assist in every way in looking out for the interests of the farmers of this country.

Mr. President, I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon will be adopted by the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the author of the amendment and to the Senator from Oregon that we ought not to attempt to determine the question presented by the amendment at this time. Whether the power should be administered by one man or by a body of men must depend upon the power which we grant. There are some things that are eminently fit to be intrusted to a single person; there are other things which are just as manifestly proper to be committed to more than one person.

If the power of the original bill is to continue, the man who would propose to give that power to one person is either uncomprehending of the character of the task or he is indifferent to the welfare of his country—one or the other. To say that we should give the power to one man to fix the price of every commodity known to the industry of America is so alarming that it ought not to be considered for a single moment. To say that one man should determine the distribution of a single commodity is quite a different thing, but this bill as it is now would commit to the administrator the duty of fixing the price of everything that is known to American life; and to me even a suggestion that we should give a power of that kind to one man is abhorrent, and the people of this country will never tolerate it.

I suggest these things because we have lately carried on an investigation before a committee of which I am a member with regard to coal. I consider coal as more important than food in the present situation. If it is proposed to give one man the authority to fix the price of all the coal in this country, I would not only oppose it so long as I had a voice with which to oppose it, but, if it were adopted, it would require me to vote against the bill. I can not think of it with any kind of complacency. Therefore, I suggest to the Senator from Colorado and to the Senator from Oregon that we ought to pass through this bill and determine, first, what powers we are intending to grant and then select the tribunal with reference to the power rather than with reference to any preconceived notions we may have about administration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator take into consideration the fact that whether we have a commission or whether we have one man to administer this bill it is all subject to the power of the President of the United States? There is, therefore, a safeguard whether it is placed in the hands of a commission or in the hands of an individual.

Mr. CUMMINS. I would be no more willing, Mr. President, to give the administration of these questions to the President of the United States than I would to Mr. Hoover. There are powers here that ought not to be conferred upon any man, for no man is capable of executing these powers.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator think, then, that there are powers in this bill that ought not to be given to any three men?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, there are some powers that I think ought not to be conferred upon anybody; but there are a great many powers that I am entirely willing to see conferred upon a body of men, indeed powers which I shall insist upon being conferred upon a body of men when the time comes for the offering of amendments upon the floor. But that is not the question. We have not yet determined the character of the bill itself, the quality of the powers or the extent of the powers. Is it not reasonable to defer the decision with regard to the commission until we know what the President is to do through a single person or through a commission? If called upon to vote at this time, I shall vote in favor of the commission, although I desire to suggest to the Senators who composed the amendment that it keeps the promise to the ear and may break it to the hope.

The President is not required to assign to this commission a single duty. He can select other agencies for the administration of the entire bill. I rather look upon the introduction of the commission as simply a tub to the whale, simply a sop to those who have been insisting upon divided authority, for there is not attached to the commission a single duty, a single authority, by virtue of the law itself. The language of the proposed amendment is that the commission "shall perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct." If he does not care to direct the commission to carry out the purposes of the act or to administer any part of it, he need not do so; and he may select another and entirely different agency for that purpose. I think, if we are to have a commission, it ought to be attached to the authority we here convey in some more direct and inseparable manner than is provided in the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I was entertained by the argument of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], as I usually am by his arguments, especially with that part of it wherein he appealed for three commissioners, and stated that there ought to be at least one farmer on the commission. Now, as I understand, the bill comprehends both food and fuel and is limited to them. The Senator from South Carolina suggests that a farmer be placed on the commission because the bill includes food. I wonder if he would apply the same argument and say that we should also make a member of the commission a coal operator or some one interested in fuel. I am inclined to think he would not.

However much we may object to arbitrary power, which necessity seems to compel, it hardly seems possible to me that anyone who favors an administration of these subjects in the most effective manner can argue that that effectiveness will not be greater through one man than through a commission, and certainly if we were to compose that commission of interested parties we could not possibly hope to accomplish the object desired. The advice and knowledge of practical farmers and of coal operators should be obtained before any drastic action is taken either by one man or by a commission. Personally I am disturbed by doubts as to the wisdom of this proposed legislation, but if we must legislate, as I know we will, I want the most efficient law possible, and already too much time has been occupied in its discussion.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is more than one way to destroy a man's influence and break him down. Since the days of the ancient Greeks one of the favorite methods has been to heap honors upon a man and praise his virtues. Aristides was finally weakened and his influence destroyed by his enemies when they adopted the method of always referring to him as "Aristides the Just."

I myself feel that Mr. Hoover has been injured from the outset of the work that he has undertaken by too much praise. I have no doubt that some of the objection to Mr. Hoover that has been shown on the floor of the Senate has come from the fact that he has been placed by unwise friends in too exalted an atmosphere. It will be a protection to Mr. Hoover to be one of a commission of three. If he is the food administrator, he will be called the "food dictator." If he is one of three commissioners, no one can properly call him the "dictator," because the others can outvote him. I think it would be a protection to him, and I hope his friends will vote for a commission consisting of three.

There is an excellent reason why there should be a commission of three at least, and that is so that different interests may be fairly represented on the board. I understand that Mr. Hoover is himself a mining engineer of distinction. He will know something about coal. There is no doubt that the farmers should be represented, so that they will have more confidence in the board than they would otherwise have, not that they will be able to influence the board for the benefit of the farmer, but they will have a direct means of knowing what is going on, so that nothing will be concealed from them; and I myself think, since the bill deals mainly with food, that the third member of this commission should be a woman, for woman has more to do with the actual preparation of food and with the consumer than has anyone else. So I hope that the compromise that has been offered by the Senator from Oregon will receive the sanction of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to have the amendment to the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the words "he is further authorized and directed to appoint," in line 18, page 2, of the amendment, and insert:

a food administrator at an annual salary of $7,500, payable monthly, to perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. Said food administrator shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. We have arranged that the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from New Mexico may stand paired, allowing the Senator from Wyoming and myself to vote. This announcement may stand for the day. I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general paid with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and vote "yea."

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], but I am at liberty to vote on all matters connected with this bill. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I am advised that, if present, the Senator would vote "nay" on this question, and I therefore permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness. I will permit this statement to stand for the day.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 63, as follows:

So Mr. SHAFROTH'S amendment to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk,

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "gasoline" it is proposed to insert "iron, steel, copper, and aluminum."

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I believe that the original bill, as amended, included too many products. I believe that the amendment now offered by the Senator from Oregon as a substitute does not include enough, and I think it should include iron, steel, aluminum, and copper.

When I had the floor before I presented the fact that these industries of copper, iron, steel, and aluminum were practical monopolies—not, perhaps, monopolies in the legal sense, but practical monopolies in the sense that these large industries were conducted by a very few great corporations that practically controlled the industry, and whose voice in the industry was omnipotent. I called attention to the fact that these products were essential to the successful prosecution of the war; that they all entered into the make-up of munitions of war. I also pointed out the fact that they are basic materials, related to almost every other form of production, and without which few forms of production can be successfully conducted. I also pointed out the fact that, though these great industries had been mobilized at Washington under the sanction of the law which provides for the Council of National Defense and the advisory commission, and although they are represented by the great chiefs of industry who ought to have breadth of vision, they have failed to realize their opportunity in making a reasonable price for the Government and a reasonable price for the public, and that in pursuing these skyrocket prices they were raising the price level so high that an effort would be made to raise the wage level throughout the country in order to correspond with it, and that that would mean continual unrest, contention, and strife—civil war—whilst we are engaged in the supreme contention abroad.

I contend, Mr. President, that in view of these facts it is essential that the heavy hand of the Government should be laid upon these industries; that if there are industries which in time of stress can be called public necessities and which require public regulation, these are the industries. I have called attention to the fact that the control of these industries is in a few hands, that there need not be a confusion of counsels, that they have the ability to survey the situation and the power to meet it, and that they have failed of their opportunity.

Mr. President, they are even more culpable than the coal producers of the country; for we know that the production of bituminous coal is in the hands of myriad men, unable to have a common mind upon any subject, whereas these men are so thoroughly bound together and so few in number that it is easy for them to reach a conclusion. The coal industry lost its opportunity, in my judgment; for whilst ostensibly it lowered the price from $5.50 to $3 a ton, the operators ignored the fact that that was doubling the price of less than $1.50 a ton a year ago; and so they failed to meet their opportunity, though they met it in better form than the chiefs of these other industries.

Mr. President, I do not wish to load down this bill, but I do insist that if there are necessaries, these are necessaries; that if there is need of Government intervention anywhere, it is necessary here; that not only the wants of the Government and of the public require it, but the safety of our country at the conclusion of the war. If, as the result of skyrocket prices to which we surrender these industries now, wage levels are raised throughout the country, we will find at the end of the war that we will have a wage level far beyond that of any other competing country, and that in the world's markets our products, produced by higher-paid labor, can not meet the products of other countries, and that upon our own soil the products of cheaper labor from abroad will displace the products of our own country.

Any economist ought to view this condition with apprehension and alarm, and particularly the intelligent men who control these great industries, and who ought to have sufficient breadth of vision and sufficient knowledge of economic laws to realize that this is no time to impose either upon the Government or upon the country exaggerated prices for the products which they control; and that a wise statesmanship, not only in the interest of the country, but in the interest of the commodities themselves, demands that there should be an immediate naming of a fair and reasonable price for their commodities, both to the Government and to the public.

Mr. President, I think it essential that the prices to the public should be the same as they are to the Government. It is just as necessary, as I stated this morning, that we should have a strong Nation as it is that we should have a strong Army. We must have our people well fed and well clothed and well equipped if we wish to sustain a well-fed and well-clothed and well-equipped Army, and monopoly should not be allowed to impress its power either upon the public or upon the Government itself.

Mr. President, the captains of industry in this country have it in their power to so adjust their prices as to avoid the application of the governmental forces which are now being summoned to regulate them. They deplore the tendency to State socialism, but if State socialism comes it will be because they have failed to meet the issue of the hour by a wise and statesmanlike maintenance of reasonable price levels. I ask for the yeas and nays upon the amendment, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before regarding my pair and vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. As he is absent, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

So Mr. NEWLANDS'S amendment to Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, after the words "kerosene and gasoline," it is proposed to insert the following:

And, upon a finding by the President that a necessity exists therefor, such other things of whatever kind, nature, or description as the President from time to time shall include by proclamation.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I fully appreciate that the situation as to food, fuel, and feed is the most acute, and yet there is no question in my mind that before long many other things will have to be, and some now ought to be, included which will appear just as immediately necessary as these things designated in the bill.

I do not know whether we are going to have a recess of Congress or not; but we may have a recess, and emergencies may arise when it will be entirely essential—yes, indispensable—that this law shall apply to other commodities besides the things mentioned in the bill. I went into this matter yesterday at some length, and I do not propose to repeat what I said then; but I want to say that for the reasons there stated, and for the reasons I now state, it seems to me that this amendment ought to be adopted, so that at least during the recess and until another bill can be enacted in place of it designating other commodities that shall be put within the control of the Government in the same manner and to the same effect as these others we shall have some power in the hands of the President whereby we can regulate things that we may need to have regulated before Congress meets again, or, after it does meet, before we must put in five or six weeks in discussing another bill.

This does not touch anything that is in this substitute already, but it leaves the things not mentioned in the bill entirely in the hands of the President when the need is presented.

I hope that the amendment may be adopted, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, although much might be said in support of the same. Because of the extortionate prices alleged to have been charged by middlemen and speculators in foodstuffs, a demand was made upon Congress to enact a food-control bill. The view seemed to be that prices could be fixed by a commission created by Congress that would reduce the prices of food products to the consumer. The contention is now made that it is improper to control the products of the farm, unless the Government shall regulate the commodities which the farmer requires, and it is suggested that steel and farm implements, as well as a great variety of commodities, shall be subjected to governmental control and regulation.

I have never been an advocate of the theory of price fixing upon the part of the Government. It has proven unsatisfactory and futile whenever practiced and is reminiscent of outworn forms of legislation. The law of supply and demand and legitimate and proper competition have been the accepted formula in the economic world for more than 100 years. It is possible that great concentration of capital and the development of monopoly, not only in production but in transportation, may in part nullify the beneficent law of competition and lead to governmental regulation, which in the end will terminate in State socialism. I believe this bill, if enacted into law, will prove a disappointment and will fail to realize the expectations of its proponents. I was interested in the contention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who called attention to the exorbitant and extortionate prices being charged by the steel companies, the coal, aluminum, and other organizations producing things which are necessities in our civilization. He called attention to their failure to respond to the needs of the people and to measure up to the standards of patriotic duty. I did not vote for the Senator's amendment, although there is much to be said in favor of the proposition that if you control the products of the farm by governmental legislation there should be regulation of other commodities required by the farmer as well as by the public generally. But I am so averse to governmental regulation and the intrusion of the Government of its power into private enterprises that I felt constrained to vote against the motion. It may be, before this war is over, that the Government will be compelled to lay its heavy hand upon many activities and control the business of many corporations and individuals. However, I think I speak the sentiments of some Senators when I say that the corporations referred to by the Senator from Nevada and which were included within his amendment and those referred to in the committee's original amended bill need not conclude that their extortionate prices and their unjustifiable profiteering will be condoned or approved. They will be remembered when the revenue bill comes up for consideration. And, speaking for myself, if not for others, there will be a disposition to require them to put into the Treasury of the United States the gigantic sums which they have wrongfully extorted from the people. It is to be regretted that, in this war period, there should be a purpose upon the part of so many to exact from the Government, our allies, and our people prices that are not only abnormally high but such as can be properly denominated extortionate.

This bill is in the nature of a compromise, as I understand it, and, while I do not approve of many of its provisions and am not satisfied with its general plan, I shall support it in the end.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. HUSTING. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ASHURST, and he answered in the negative.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll call has begun, and a response has been made.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as before, and I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the former vote of the transfer of my pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr.

HUGHES] to the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important business.

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 15, nays 58, as follows:

So Mr. HUSTING's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I move as an amendment to insert after the word "gasoline" the words "fertilizers and fertilizer ingredients."

Mr. President, this amendment is not of extreme interest to the agriculturists in my part of the country, our soil is still young and very fertile; but it is of great importance to the older soil of the South. I hope it will be adopted. I do not think it is wise to undertake to regulate the products of the soil without taking care of those things which enter into the soil and cause its productiveness. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as before, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I wish to ask if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. HARDING. I withdraw my vote, being paired with that Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is detained on important business.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 50, as follows:

So Mr. BORAH's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we have now reached the point I presume where we are going to vote on the substitute offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to section 1 of the bill. For several days the Senate gave attention to section 1 of the bill. It is quite an important section. As it came from the House it referred to foods, feeds, and fuel, and articles required for their production. The Senate Committee on Agriculture, after a great deal of deliberation added several things to the articles enumerated by the House. The Senate again after two or three days' debate and consideration of the section added several more provisions. All these were added after unlimited debate, after full consideration, and, I think, without exception upon a roll call of the Senate, at least many of them were put on by a yea-and-nay vote, until when the Senate got through with the section the Senate had added petroleum and its products, steel and iron and their products, copper and its products; hemp, jute, sisal, and their products; lead, timber, lumber, farm implements and machinery, and fertilizers. These things were added, as will be disclosed by an examination of the RECORD giving the debates, on the theory that if we were going to control the products of the farm we ought to give to the same authority in the same law the control of the things that the farmer has to buy.

I call your attention, Mr. President, to the fact that if a minimum price is fixed in accordance with this or any other law on any of the products of the farm one of the considerations that ought to be and undoubtedly will be taken into account in fixing that price will be the cost of the things that the farmer has to buy. It was therefore the theory of the Senate, it was the deliberate judgment of the Senate, it was the conclusion of the Senate that those things the farmer had to buy in order to produce should be included with his products in the regulation.

But, Mr. President, for two days, perhaps three days, we have noticed in the papers that all this was going to be changed because it was announced in the morning paper day after day that the leaders of the Senate had made up their minds to overrule the Senate on these things, that the leaders were in consultation and they had prepared a bill in fact and in due time they were going to put it across. I only noticed that in the Washington Post, and having no corroborative evidence, of course I did not believe it, but later on when I came to the Senate I saw the program being carried out just as it had been announced; and I now find the Senate, after unlimited debate having fixed certain things in the bill, on a limited debate with a cloture undoing what they did and obeying the mandate of the wise men and cutting out from control all the things the farmer has to buy.

I am amazed at Senators arguing in favor of this proposition when they say, one after another, as several of them have done, "I am in favor of having these things controlled, but we do not control them in this bill. I am in favor of controlling these things and having them controlled by law, but I am going to vote to take them out of control in this bill." Some Senators argue, and perhaps have made themselves believe, that the bill is going to be defeated if that is not done. I want to say to you, Mr. President, that the bill will lose more supporters by confining the bill to a control of what the farmer produces and not including in the same bill and in the same law the things that he has to buy than it will by any other feature of the bill. As a matter of economy, for the minimum price which I presume will be fixed on one or more of the products of the farm we ought to control the things that those who produce those articles have to buy. We ought to regulate them. We ought not to submit the farmer to control with his product and compel him to pay what may be asked for what he has to produce. Mark you, Mr. President, if we do, the men who fix the minimum price will have to fix it higher, and it will mean a great deal of possible expenditure of public funds, in my judgment, if that course is pursued.

First, it seems to me to be a matter of common justice that if we are going to control the output of the farm we ought in the same way, by the same machinery, under the same law, by the same power, control the things that the farmer has to buy, to see that he is not fleeced in that direction; and then as a matter of economy we ought all to be interested in having a minimum price that will be fair, that will not be too high, because under the regulations of this bill that will probably become the real price. If we do not take any control of the products that the farmer must buy, knowing that he is going to pay, as has already been shown to-day, from 100 to 600 per cent advance for those things, we must know that that means an increased minimum price, if we want to stimulate production, because the object of fixing a minimum price is to stimulate production.

The world is short of food and we all concede that we want to increase the yield particularly of wheat, perhaps in time other things, and if we fix a minimum price with a view of stimulating production it must be so high that it will be profitable. That profit is affected by what it costs to produce the crop. It is affected by what the farmer pays for his farm machinery. That you have taken out from regulation. It is affected by what the farmer in some localities—not in mine, but in a great many localities—has to pay for fertilizers. That has increased 600 per cent in cost. That is now excluded by this proposed amendment of the leaders, and so on through everything that the farmer has to buy.

But, Mr. President, if we fix a minimum price that is remunerative—and none other will be any good—if we fix a minimum price that is profitable—and none other will accomplish any increase of production—we must take all these things into consideration. It is not necessary to say, as has been said by one Senator, that when we come to the revenue bill we shall increase the taxes on the steel men and on the fertilizer men, for that will not affect the minimum price which we will have to fix for the farmer to regulate the production of food in this country.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, since we come to this test between the substitute, that takes all the things that the farmer has to buy out of the bill, and the bill as we once fixed it after deliberate and candid consideration and judgment, that Senators ought to hesitate before they vote now in accordance with the demands of these leaders who have, wisely or unwisely, as the case may be, taken all these things out from the control of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The Senator from Nebraska will pardon the Chair. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question, and he can answer it in my time. It has been suggested to me, by, I suppose, some of the leaders, that this matter is largely taken care of in another amendment which these leaders have prepared, and which I suppose they expect to submit, but which they have not referred to apparently in this debate. That is found on page 7. It proposes to strike out all of section 5 and to insert in lieu thereof a provision with reference to licensing all kinds of business. Under this they provide that "the President is hereby authorized to give a license," and so forth, "to any person operating an elevator"——

Mr. NORRIS. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. JONES of Washington. From page 8 of the committee print, which embodies all of the amendments which our leaders have prepared.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not a committee print.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; it is a committee print. That is what it is called.

Mr. NORRIS. Those amendments are not reported by the committee, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; but they have got the committee to have them printed.

Mr. NORRIS. They had to use some committee stationery, then, to print them?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They have had access evidently to the committee room, although I understand they are not members of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Some of them probably are members of the committee. It would not do to say that there are no leaders on the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, well, I thought the place of the committee itself had been taken by these Senators.

Mr. NORRIS. That is probably true; but I suppose that in some way they got some of the committee stationery, printed the proposed amendments on that stationery, and headed it "Committee Print."

Mr. JONES of Washington. On page 8 they provide for a license, and in line 17 it reads:

Fourth. Any person operating a factory which produces farm implements or machinery which enter into interstate or foreign commerce.

Then—

Sixth. Any person engaged in producing, selling, or handling fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients—

Without taking time to read further we find that "whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust or unreasonable or discriminatory and unfair or wasteful," he "shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order," to make it just and reasonable; and if the licensee shall refuse to do so, he can take away their license. In other words, I understand that this provides for a regulation of all the charges for farm implements; for instance, for fertilizer, and so forth, and that by this provision the farmer is protected. Has the Senator from Nebraska examined that?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, in the first place, that it is limited, as the Senator has noted, to articles of interstate commerce, which has nothing to do with the price.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If they can regulate the profit, it seems to me that necessarily would regulate the price.

Mr. NORRIS. The profit of a factory?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Where does the Senator get that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The print says on page 9:

Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, certainly a storage charge or a regulation of a storage charge on farming implements, for instance, would not accomplish anything.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know that; but the word "profit," as I understand, is what they claim will give the President power to regulate the charges which shall be made to the farmer, because they can regulate the profits made in factories.

I notice this peculiar phraseology in connection with coal:

Fifth. Any person operating a coal mine producing coal, and any person dealing in coal, which enters into interstate or foreign commerce—

That would catch the retailer as well as the man who operates the mine; but with reference to farming implements, it only touches the person operating the factory and does not go to any person dealing in farming implements.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Washington desire my judgment on that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I do.

Mr. NORRIS. A factory manufacturing, for instance, farm implements could sell them at a profit to a subsidiary corporation of not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent, and they could dispose of them then to a dealer from that corporation at a profit of 2,000 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Suppose we should insert in this language here——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me say further, while I am on the question, that if this section to which the Senator refers would regulate and prevent exhorbitant prices being paid by the farmer, then why not regulate them all in that way? Why not exclude everything and put it into this section, if that is going to regulate prices? I am not talking against that provision or of the proposed amendment. There is something similar in the bill, and I think that is an important thing and ought to be in it, but it certainly will not save the farmer from the payment of exhorbitant prices.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Suppose we should insert in line 18, after the word "machinery," the words "and any person dealing in farm implements or machinery"?

Mr. NORRIS. On what page does the Senator suggest that amendment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. On page 8, in line 18, so that it would provide a regulation not only of the person operating the factory but of the person dealing in farm implements—for instance, the retailer. Does not the Senator think that that would help it considerably?

Mr. NORRIS. It might, although my opinion is merely given offhand, just having the matter called to my attention. I have not given it any consideration.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, it has occurred to me, after listening to the remarks of my distinguished neighbor from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who has referred so frequently to the leaders, and at the same time listening interestedly, as I have, to those who do not assume that quality, that perhaps it would be well for a "neutral" to speak. I can not quite describe the impression that has been made upon my mind by listening to the debate on this bill. I have been wondering what one who is disinterested would say of the discussion in the United States Senate—whether we were debating warfare between selfish interests in the United States or whether we were debating means of furthering the defense of our common country.

I come from a neutral State, Mr. President. Ohio is both industrial and agricultural. I am not sure but that we are the third or forth corn State in the Union. We raise half as much wheat as North Dakota; we rate about the third in quantity of oats produced in any State in the Union, and unless the weather man interferes very much with our harvest, we are going to make the most splendid contribution of wheat this year that the State has ever made to the bread supply of the Nation.

So I am a "neutral," Mr. President, as between the agriculturist, on the one hand, and the industrial brother on the other; and, oddly enough, I know a little something about farming. I have followed the cradle, Senators, with the rake, when wheat sold for 40 cents a bushel. That was in the day when farming was something of a contest for subsistence. In this latter day farming has become an occupation for profit; and I happen to know that, under normal conditions, dollar wheat makes it a very profitable occupation—perhaps not to the farmer who farms the farmers, but it is to the farmer who farms a farm; and I make bold, Mr. President, to say now that the regulation of the price of wheat will indirectly operate to regulate the price of all farm products, and that is exactly what this bill is aimed to do or it ought not to be a pending proposal before this body.

It is not a discrimination, Mr. President, against the American farmer. I said a moment ago I represent an agricultural State. I have not received 20 protests from farmers against the passage of this proposed regulatory measure. The Ohio farmer who is promised $1.75 for his wheat will be reasonably content. If the Congress desires to put a higher price on wheat and maintain the relative cost of bread for the American industrial worker, it must of necessity provide for a higher compensation for that workman.

Of course, Mr. President, I should like to have it understood in the beginning that I am not much in sympathy with any feature of this bill, certainly not with the principles involved. I accept it as a matter of necessity in a time of war. I think it is the entering wedge to the establishment of the socialized state; and I have opposed pending amendments suggesting the inclusion of iron and steel and their products and numerous other necessities that the American farmer must buy, because I think the regulation of the price of the great necessity, flour, is the most that we need do in this trying hour, and it is the least step toward the socialized state.

I know how Senators feel; I have listened with a great deal of interest, and with mixed impressions, to discussions in regard to the suspension of constitutional powers. Well, Mr. President, that suspension, if it were not unseemly to say it, began last year in this body when the United States Congress undertook to fix a wage rate in this country. I refer to the passage of the Adamson law. When we established that principle and the United States Supreme Court gave its assent, we laid the first stone in the structure of the socialized State; and it is important to say at this hour that while we are making the world safe for democracy we are going through the processes of revolution or evolution that are very likely to leave the world a socialized democracy.

You need not be surprised thereat. In this tumult of the world, in this contest between popular government and autocracy, in the great revolution in Russia and the hoped-for revolution in Germany, there has come the inevitable contest between the toiling mass and those who have heretofore dominated society. It need not be surprising, therefore, to find slumbering beneath the surface in these United States the unmistakable processes of revolution. I am not seeking to paint a pessimistic picture, but I have the strong conviction, Mr. President, that in this year of 1917 we have much more to do than to preserve the American Republic. We have the greater task of preserving the inherited institutions of the fathers. If this body had adopted any one of the pending amendments in whose behalf arguments have been made on this floor, we would have driven not one but many a wedge into the overturning of the institutions we boast to-day.

Yet, Mr. President, I recognize the necessity that grows out of the exigencies of this world tumult. The toiling masses of America can not live under our standards of living at the present high cost of the necessities of life. If you could regulate the habits of men by statutory enactment, if Congress could prescribe a little self-sacrifice and still more of thrift, then the entire problem would solve itself. No Congress, no political party, no leadership can set aside the abiding laws of economics. You can not abolish the requirements of the law of supply and demand; you can only temporize and avoid its effects. If I could have my way I would say to the people of the United States, "If there are things that seem to you too high, do not buy," and we would soon solve the problem. That is one of the reasons why I very readily assented to the opposition to putting in all these different products, iron and steel and other enumerated necessities.

Why, Mr. President, we are the most extravagant Nation on the face of the earth. I listened a little while ago, with much respect and great interest, to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] talking about the extreme necessity of a well-fed and well-cared-for people. Well, in a sense that is a very agreeable thing to say, but if I could fix a condition to strengthen the fiber of the citizenship of the United States of America I would prescribe some self-denial; and I want to put the prediction in my remarks now that the nation which comes to the fore in the great reorganization and reconstruction of the social fabric and the industrial world after peace comes again will be the nation which has taught itself some self-denial, some economy and thrift in its every-day affairs.

The greatest difficulty with the United States of America——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will pardon the Chair. The Senator's time——

Mr. HARDING. I want to say this, Mr. President: The greatest difficulty with the United States of America is that we have lived according to extravagant standards; we boasted them. It was a peculiarly American development. Nobody has been willing to preach that we ought to modify somewhat our style of living. If I could have my way, Mr. President, I would go back to the good old simple days of the fathers, and if we could do that we would solve, naturally and effectively, the problem that this Congress is now trying to solve inside of 60 days, with the law that we have already enacted providing against the export of foodstuffs from this country.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, one of the results of the adoption of the substitute will be to take cotton out of the bill. I voted to include cotton in the bill on a former occasion because I believed that it was so fundamental a necessity that it was entitled to the protection and the privileges of the bill, and that the possibility of the recurrence of a disaster to cotton like that of 1914 ought to be prevented. It has become evident, however, that the bill can not be passed, or that its passage will be seriously imperiled, with the retention of cotton in the measure, and I shall support the substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The question is on the substitute proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], but I am at liberty to vote on this measure. Therefore I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer, I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as heretofore, I vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 60, nays 16, as follows:

So Mr. CHAMBERLAIN's amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment to section 5, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 5, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

SEC. 5. That the President is authorized, whenever in his judgment the national security and defense will be thereby subserved, to require the following persons to take out licenses in such form and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to wit: First, any person operating an elevator or other storage facility used for the storing of wheat which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce; second, any person operating a cold-storage establishment for the storage of meat, poultry, or dairy products constituting a part of interstate or foreign commerce; third, any person operating a packing house producing meat or meat products which enter into interstate or foreign commerce; fourth, any person operating a factory which produces farm implements or machinery which enter into interstate or foreign commerce; fifth, any person operating a coal mine producing coal, and any person dealing in coal, which enters into interstate or foreign commerce; sixth, any person engaged in producing, storing, or handling fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients which enter into interstate or foreign commerce; seventh, any person, not a retailer as defined in this section, who shall engage in handling any of the foregoing enumerated products. Whenever the President shall give notice that the foregoing persons, or any of them, shall be required to take out a license as herein provided, it shall be unlawful for any person to engage in any such business without having obtained said license and conforming to the rules and regulations prescribed in connection therewith. Whenever the President shall have given said notice it shall be unlawful for any carrier to receive for transportation any of the foregoing enumerated products from any person who shall not have obtained the license herein authorized and provided for. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President, may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, or the officer or agent of any carrier who shall knowingly receive for transportation any such product from any person so required to take out such license but who shall have failed or refused to do so, or whose license shall have been revoked, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners (including live-stock farmers), or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any retailer with respect to the retail business actually conducted by him, nor shall anything in this section be construed to authorize the fixing or imposition of a duty or tax upon any article imported into or exported from the United States or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That for the purposes of this act a retailer shall be deemed to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaging in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the Senators followed the amendment which has just been read and compared it with the section as it now stands in the bill as reported from the committee, they will find this essential difference:

Section 5 now provides that from time to time, "whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries constituting a part of commerce with foreign countries, or among the several States, including the several Territories and the District of Columbia, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall by proclamation so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the proclamation, engage in business" unless he has a license for that purpose issued under the act. Now, in this proposed amendment that portion of section 5 has been stricken out and in lieu of it is inserted the following:

The President is authorized, whenever in his judgment the national security and defense will be thereby subserved, to require the following persons to take out licenses in such form and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to wit: First, any person operating an elevator or other storage facility used for the storing of wheat which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce; second, any person operating a cold-storage establishment for the storage of meat, poultry, or dairy products constituting a part of interstate or foreign commerce; third, any person operating a packing house producing meat or meat products which enter into interstate or foreign commerce; fourth, any person operating a factory which produces farm implements or machinery which enter into interstate or foreign commerce; fifth, any person operating a coal mine producing coal, and any person dealing in coal, which enters into interstate or foreign commerce; sixth, any person engaged in producing, storing, or handling fertilizer or fertilizer ingredients which enter into interstate or foreign commerce; seventh, any person, not a retailer as defined in this section, who shall engage in handling any of the foregoing enumerated products. Whenever the President shall give notice that the foregoing persons, or any of them, shall be required to take out a license as herein provided, it shall be unlawful for any person to engage in any such business without having obtained said license and conforming to the rules and regulations prescribed in connection therewith. Whenever the President shall have given said notice it shall be unlawful for any carrier to receive for transportation any of the foregoing enumerated products from any person who shall not have obtained the license herein authorized and provided for.

In other words, the original bill covered all necessaries. The amendment, as submitted, limits the licensing feature.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Why have you omitted from the storing provision corn and oats and limited it simply to wheat? I refer to line 9 of page 8 of this substitute bill. The licensing only relates to elevators storing wheat, not to those that store corn or oats. Why have you omitted those?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know that there was any particular purpose in it. Wheat is the principal food commodity, and therefore wheat was specifically included.

Mr. NELSON. Is not corn a food commodity, too?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes; it is.

Mr. NELSON. Why should not corn be included?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Well, it might have been included, Mr. President. It can be amended if the Senator thinks it ought to be.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that the Senator amend it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I suggest that the Senator offer an amendment. I have limited it to wheat in the portion of the bill to which the Senator refers.

Mr. NELSON. I am not one of the leaders, so it would be useless for me to offer it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Neither am I, I will say to the Senator. I am simply a worker in the ranks trying, as best I can, in a national crisis to reach a fair solution of a most difficult and puzzling question. I thought it best to confine it to wheat, as did many Senators with whom I have conferred. If the Senate wants to change it or modify it in any way, of course the Senate has the power to do it. I simply offer that as a substitute for section 5 of the bill as it stands; and I have no doubt that the Senate, following its usual practice, will offer a great many amendments to it before the discussion ends. The suggestions which will be made in this Chamber will but confirm my statement that the subject is a most difficult one to solve and adjust, for no two Senators will entertain the same views upon it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I desire to call up my amendment to this section, if the original section has been perfected so far as the acting chairman of the committee is concerned. I will ask the Senator from Oregon, in charge of the bill, whether he has amended the original section so far as he cares to have it amended? If so, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the only amendment I proposed to offer to the substitute, Mr. President. I assumed that Senators would offer other amendments.

Mr. THOMPSON. My amendment is to strike out the interstate and foreign commerce clause wherever it appears in this section. I should like to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "which constitutes a part of interstate commerce" where they appear twice in the amendment, and the words "which enters into interstate or foreign commerce" where those words appear four times in the amendment, and all similar words wherever they may appear in said section or in said proposed amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I offer this amendment and desire a vote upon it, because the matter proposed to be stricken out has no place in a bill of this kind, and because, in my judgment, it will interfere very greatly with the full operation and administration of the law as contemplated by the act.

It seems to have been the plan of those opposed to this bill to put in the bill as many objectionable things as they could to prevent its passage; and, failing in that, to put in the bill as many things as possible to limit it in its operation.

These clauses, in my judgment, are the most objectionable of any in the bill, so far as the operation of the act is concerned. I am aware that there are some Senators who have claimed that this was necessary to make the act constitutional, but I do not believe that the constitutional lawyers who made the argument will seriously contend that there is greater power under the commerce clause of the Constitution than there is under the war power of the Constitution.

This is not an attempt, Mr. President, to exercise the powers of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution. There is no intention of that character, but it is purely and simply, as stated on the face of the bill, and as every line of the bill indicates, an exercise of the war power, which is the greatest power we have under the Constitution, it having been laid down fundamentally and by the highest court in this land as to be absolutely without limitation, except, of course, according as it may be modified by international law.

It is not my purpose, Mr. President, to present a constitutional argument in the limited time I have this afternoon, but I wish briefly to review many of the authorities which have been produced here, so that the minds of all may at least be at rest as to the constitutionality of the bill without these clauses, and also to make the bill better in its enforcement within the object of the law. First, we have the case of Miller against The United States, reported in Eleventh Wallace, page 268, where the Supreme Court held that the confiscation statute passed during war times was constitutional, and where it laid down the doctrine that legislation founded upon the war powers——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. THOMPSON. I can not yield in the limited time I have. I would be glad to yield if I could do it without it being taken out of my 10 minutes.

Mr. GORE. I wish to remind the Senator that in the case of Miller against the United States it was the confiscation of the property of an enemy, not of a citizen.

Mr. THOMPSON. But the court did lay down the proposition, and it is the law of this case, and the Senator can not produce an authority of any higher court to the contrary, that the war powers of the Government have no express limitation in the Constitution, and the only limitation to which their exercise is subject is the law of nations. In this same case the proposition is laid down flatly:

> The Constitution confers upon Congress expressly power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules respecting captures on land and water. Upon the exercise of these powers no restrictions are imposed. Of course, the power to declare war involves the power to prosecute it by all means and in any manner in which war may be legitimately prosecuted.

It is also held in this case:

> For it is evident that legislation founded upon the war powers of the Government, and directed against the public enemies of the United States, is subject to different considerations and limitations from those applicable to legislation founded upon the municipal power of the Government and directed against criminals. Legislation in the former case is subject to no limitations, except such as are imposed by the law of nations in the conduct of the war. * * *
> The war powers of the Government have no express limitation in the Constitution, and the only limitation to which their exercise is subject is the law of nations.

We have heard read one of the leading cases which was referred to by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1), where the court lays down the principle that the constitutional guaranties against search and seizure, two of the most vital rights of citizens, do not prevail under martial law, a form of civil war.

We have here the case of McCulloch against Maryland, which has been read so many times, reported in Fourth Wheaton, where this principle is laid down by Chief Justice Marshall on page 421:

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution—

As it is in this case under the war power—> and all the means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

Then we had cited the celebrated Legal Tender cases, Knox v. Lee and Parker v. Davis (12 Wall., 45), the National Bank cases, and Willoughby on the Constitution, where the whole principle is summed up in section 715, which I desire to have made a part of my remarks, as I have not time to read it now.

> The constitutional power given to the United States to declare and wage war, whether foreign or civil, carries with it the authority to use all means calculated to weaken the enemy and to bring the struggle to a successful conclusion. When dealing with the enemy all acts that are calculated to advance this end are legal. Indeed, the President in the exercise simply of his authority as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy may, unless prohibited by congressional statute, commit or authorize acts not warranted by commonly received principles of international law, and Congress may by law authorize measures which the courts must recognize as valid, even though they provide penalties not supported by the general usage of nations in the conduct of war. Thus during the Civil War in certain cases the provision by congressional statute for the confiscation of certain enemy property or land was enforced, though such confiscation was not in accordance with the general usage of foreign States.
> Even in dealing with its own loyal subjects, the power to wage war enables the Government to override in many particulars private rights which in time of peace are inviolable.
> The power to wage war carries with it the authority not only to bring it to a full conclusion but, after the cessation of active military operations, to take measures to provide against its renewal. As the court says in Stewart v. Kahn: "The measures to be taken in carrying on war and to suppress insurrection are not defined. The decision of all such questions rests wholly in the discretion of those to whom the substantial powers involved are confided by the Constitution. In the latter case the power is not limited to victories in the field and to the dispersion of the insurgent forces. It carries with it inherently the power to guard against the immediate renewal of the conflict and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress."

In the case of Stewart against Kahn (11 Wall., 493) these fundamental principles have been applied by the Supreme Court of the United States. They have so briefly and succinctly stated the case that I desire to read this much of the opinion:

> Congress is authorized to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the granted powers. The measures to be taken in carrying on war and to suppress insurrection are not defined. The decision of all such questions rests wholly in the discretion of those to whom the substantial powers involved are confided by the Constitution.

We have had a long line of authorities both from the fundamental law and the decisions of the higher courts sustaining this principle.

We are here exercising the war power and not a single authority has been produced which in any way contradicts the right of Congress to pass this law without any limitation in interstate commerce. Limiting it to interstate commerce raises the question immediately as to all products as to whether they are to enter into interstate commerce or not, which is a needless controversy and throws a damper upon the enforcement of the law in the very outset. The party we aim to reach will dodge behind the interstate-commerce clause.

These authorities show that Congress had passed these acts strictly as a necessity of war, and whether the power was express or implied it made no difference as to their constitutionality. The life of the Nation was in jeopardy, as it is now, and the doctrine of self-preservation was resorted to to maintain it. Self-preservation is the first law of nature as well as the first law of nations. The construction of the courts on the war power of Congress is in accordance with the old maxim, "Salus populi suprema lex"—the good of the people is the supreme law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Oregon in charge of the bill. I should like to ask him why this licensing provision is limited to the storing of such articles as will constitute a part of interstate or foreign commerce. What is the purpose in connection with that limitation?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator will recall that in the Agricultural Committee there was a great diversity of opinion amongst the members of the committee as to whether it was necessary to confine it to interstate commerce. The committee was fairly evenly divided, and when we reported out a bill, the Senator will remember, there was a sort of a compromise reached under the terms of which one section of the bill omitted interstate commerce and the other section included the words "interstate commerce." I myself do not believe that the bill is framed under the interstate clause of the Constitution. I believe it was contemplated to have been framed, and the powers given under it are under the war-power clauses of the Constitution, but because there has been such a difference of opinion among Senators on it, that was inserted.

Mr. KNOX. I entirely agree with the Senator from Oregon, as I do with the argument just made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], that we are not fighting this war under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, and if we were, section 4 of the bill should have had the limitation in the section now under consideration. I feared that the thought might have been in the mind of some Senators, because the argument has been advanced on this floor, that the only power we have is under the interstate commerce power. I quote from an argument made upon the bill by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], some week or 10 days ago, who, having read the fourth section of the bill, said that it applies to "the provisions of interstate and foreign commerce, which is the full limit of the power of Congress." I do not think the interstate and foreign commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States is the full limit of the power of Congress in a case of this kind. I think it has nothing whatever to do with this legislation. We are legislating, as the Senator from Kansas has well said, under the war power. To emphasize the opposite doctrine the Senator from Georgia read section 4 of the bill which provides, for instance—

> That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof.

He said that in a measure to prevent the destruction, for instance, of wheat or of corn or of food of any kind, or of steel or of any supplies which might be necessary for the Government, if it is done within a State it is beyond the reach of the Federal Government to prevent such destruction; and that any act, or this act specifically, which was then under consideration as it is now, which undertook to lay its hand upon the authorities of the State or individuals residing within the State to prevent them from destroying things that were necessary for the prosecution of the war was beyond the power of Congress.

To me that idea is not only repugnant but it can not be sustained by any process of reasoning of which I am aware. If it were true, all that our enemies would have to do would be to gain control of the central products located within the State and destroy them at their own sweet will, unless the State exercised its authority to prevent it. In other words, the United States at war would be helpless to prevent the destruction of articles which were essential to the prosecution of the war. I am glad to know that the Senator having charge of the bill disavows any such idea.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me answer the Senator. If I had not thought that everything mentioned in the section was such products as go into interstate commerce, I could not have brought myself to accept this as a compromise. I believe everything mentioned in it goes into interstate commerce, but, as I said before, I think the position the Senator takes is absolutely correct, that under the war power the Congress can legislate and go right into the States and do whatever it pleases to carry out the purposes of the war power.

Mr. KNOX. I am not, however, Mr. President, in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas, because I can see a difference between the necessity of a provision such as the fourth section, which would prevent hoarding and prevent destruction or prevent willful waste of things that are necessary for the prosecution of the war, and the necessity for licensing concerns that are engaged wholly in intrastate commerce. I believe in all of the limitations that can be imposed upon the licensing system, and as this is one of the licensed limitations imposed upon that system, I would be opposed to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have on more than one occasion in committee urged that the licensing system, whatever it shall be, shall be limited to persons and corporations handling articles going into interstate commerce. In doing that I have not had in mind any constitutional question. To my mind it is entirely a practical question. If we were to clothe the Government with the power to license every person, firm, or corporation engaged in handling the products recited in this bill, we would bring within the jurisdiction of the Government thousands and thousands of small local dealers in all the tiny hamlets and small villages all over the United States, whose business is strictly local in character, and to bring them under the terms of this bill and under the jurisdiction of the commission that is going to enforce this law would simply pile up a tremendous burden of intricate and useless details upon the commission which is going to administer this statute.

It can not be contended, I think, Mr. President, that any little produce dealer, we will say, who purchases wool or butter or eggs or grain, in a little hamlet of two or three hundred people, is a factor in fixing prices. Certainly it can not be contended that he is a factor to a sufficient extent to justify compelling him and thousands and thousands of men like him to take out a Federal license. But those produce dealers who engage in business upon a scale sufficiently large to compel them to ship the products which they buy and sell in interstate commerce may be said to be factors in the national food situation.

I have believed from the beginning if we are to have any licensing system at all we would accomplish everything that we want to accomplish by limiting the license to those firms, persons, or corporations dealing in goods which are going in turn into interstate commerce.

For those reasons I hope the amendment suggested by the Senator from Oregon, as at present printed in the committee print, will prevail.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think I ought to say a few words on account of the fact that I have favored the basing of the licensing section on the commerce clause of the Constitution. To my own mind the licensing section is utterly repugnant. To require a free man in a free country to take out a license to transact business when he should be encouraged to transact business runs counter to my view of first principles as well as of sound public policy.

I do not think that any one man, however wise, ought to be vested with the power to revoke any man's license to carry on business and thus hold in the hollow of his hand millions of honest business men in a free Republic. The power to license and the power to revoke license is the power of life and death.

My conclusion that this licensing provision ought to be based on the commerce clause of the Constitution is founded on the license-tax cases reported in Fifth Wallace. Those cases arose out of a statute passed in 1864. It was an internal-revenue measure. It was passed during the Civil War. It was passed when the war power was at the very summit of its omnipotence, when all limitations had been cast away, and whatever of infinity there is in the war power was then in unlimited operation.

But the Supreme Court, in interpreting that statute, held that it was a taxing law; that the licenses required were merely a receipt for the tax; and the court declared that Congress could regulate commerce over which it had the power of regulation; that Congress could regulate interstate and foreign commerce by requiring a person engaged in such commerce to take out a license. But the court indicated that Congress could not require a man carrying on a purely intrastate business to take out a license, and that such a license, if required by Congress, would confer no authority upon such person to carry on such commerce—purely domestic commerce—within the limits of the State.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. For a question. When did I understand the Senator from Oklahoma to say the act was passed which he is discussing?

Mr. GORE. In 1864.

Mr. KNOX. The case is reported in Fifth Wallace?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNOX. I am reading from the RECORD the speech of the junior Senator from Georgia, in which he quotes from that case, which says:

> The twenty-ninth section of the internal-revenue act of March 2, 1867—

Reading from the case in Fifth Wallace to which I assume the Senator is referring.

Mr. GORE. I may say that in 1867 the law was amended so as to strike out the word "license" and make it purely a taxing law in terms as well as in fact. The court having held that the license was merely a receipt for the tax, the law was amended in that way.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I am rather inclined to think I shall vote for the amendment as offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]; but I am very jealous of any movement to base the powers under this bill on the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. I wish to say a word about the tax license case just referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

In that case the statute was upheld, and the defendants were convicted, but there was no word said about the war power. The statute was not passed as an exercise of the war power. There is nothing in the case or in the opinion that would indicate that. All there is is a dictum by a single judge that the action in the case must not be construed as extending the power of Congress to interfere with business within a State. The war power is not discussed at all in his opinion, and the case cited is no authority in any sense against putting anything we want in this bill as a war measure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not rise to discuss the constitutional phase of this amendment or to oppose it. I do desire, however, to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when a few days ago I offered an amendment which suspended the right of the owners of whisky to remove it from bond during the period of the war it was strongly asserted—and after a night's reflection the assertion was persuasive—that it was unconstitutional, because without compensation it deprived the owner of the property of the right to use it. This provision attempts to give to the President the right to forbid all property owners within the scope of its provision the right to use their property at all; the right to use property which is not ordinarily subject to the police power of the State, as is intoxicating liquor. I do not in the least think that we can give to the President, either as a war power or otherwise, the authority to forbid the owners of property of this sort its use without compensation; but I have said this only to commend it to those who were so solicitous about the constitutional privileges of those who happen to own intoxicating liquor.

I rose principally, Mr. President, to suggest that there is upon the table, and will shortly be presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], an amendment relating to the regulation of coal, which I regard as infinitely more effective than the one contained in this section.

While I do not intend to move to strike out the paragraph in this section which relates to coal, when the time comes I shall endeavor to point out how utterly futile it will be in the protection of the people of this country against the excessive prices for coal which now prevail, and which we have every reason to believe will prevail in the future. It is simply idle to suggest the relief through the fixing of profits for each individual coal operator. I did not want silence on my part to mislead the Senate into the belief that I regard this provision as sufficient in that respect; and I hope that when the Senator from Ohio presents the amendment to which I have referred it will be considered upon its merits, without regard to the provision which happens to be in this licensing section.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am not one of those who believe that a declaration of war in any sense suspends the Constitution; I hardly think a lawyer can seriously take that position; but I believe the power given by the Constitution to Congress to legislate for the conduct of the war gives Congress a vast power beyond what Congress has in times of peace, and if the necessity arises for legislation which in a measure might be considered in disregard of the usual rights growing out of State lines, I believe that a large discretion rests with Congress to determine the necessity and then to act.

But, so far as the licensing provision is concerned, I do not believe there is a necessity to require a license for more than that class of persons covered by this section. I think it goes as far as the necessity requires. I think it would be unwise to extend the licensing power to every line of food sales, to every line of food and fuel business. If we reach those engaged in interstate commerce, we reach the larger dealer and we carry the control practically to the retailer. I think we go as far as the necessity requires, and I think we cover the case so as to accomplish all that we are called upon to accomplish.

Without passing upon the question as to whether there might not be a necessity which would justify legislation going further, I think the facts that confront us really require us to stop with the provision as offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I shall therefore vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. I do not know just what the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] or the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is with reference to coal. Those amendments will probably come up as independent propositions. It will be sufficiently soon to reach conclusions with reference to them when they are before the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I prefer the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the provision in the bill, but I do not think that there is at this time any necessity for conferring this vast amount of power upon the President of the United States. I agree with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] a few moments ago, that nothing but the most manifest national necessity would justify Congress in attempting to confer upon the President the authority, either himself or through an agent, to say what amount of profit the business men of this country may make in their individual businesses. It is utterly abhorrent to my idea of free institutions.

I do not think the time has come when we ought to say to the President, "Look around, and whenever, in your judgment, you think it should be done, say to this man or to that man, 'You can not do business without taking a license from me; and when you take it you can only conduct your business according to the regulations I will hand to you, together with your license, one of which will be that you shall not make more than 3 per cent or 4 per cent profit on your business.'" I do not think there is any occasion whatever for that kind of legislation at this time. I regret that any such provision is in the bill at all. I prefer the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to the provision of the bill because it limits the universal extension enumerated in section 4.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator from Idaho desires to speak, I will yield to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon has spoken once.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to suggest an executive session, that is all.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator desires an executive session, I do not care to occupy the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There are a number of Senators who desire an executive session; and, unless there is some Senator who desires to go on now, I will move an executive session, but I do not want to lay this bill aside unless that course meets with the general approval of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho wish to be recognized?

Mr. BORAH. No.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Thursday, July 19, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, July 20, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 20, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, July 18, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to offer four amendments so that they may be pending.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to offer some amendments to be pending, two of which I send to the desk. I also desire to move to strike out "$1.75," where it appears in the amendment offered to section 12 by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and to insert "$2."

Mr. SMOOT. I send to the desk a statement giving the advertising pages of Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular showing the cost of tax-paying whisky and the cost of carrying whiskies in bond. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

For 80 months, and not more than 84 months, not to exceed 13½ proof gallons.

Mr. STERLING. I send to the desk a proposed amendment, which I desire to have regarded as a pending amendment. I should like to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 12 the following proviso:

Provided, That in order to further stimulate the production of wheat, the board of food administration herein provided for is authorized to devise and put in operation a plan for the awarding of Government prizes or bonuses for the best crop or crops of wheat, quantity and quality both considered, which may be grown on any specified area to be designated by said board. That in devising and carrying out such plan said board shall, so far as possible, advise and cooperate with the several State and county authorities in the wheat-growing sections of the United States, including State, district, and county agricultural associations. That for the purpose of carrying out these provisions the sum of $1,000,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my desire to offer an amendment to section 12 as proposed by the acting chairman, and if the amendment is not presented before to-day at 2 o'clock I understand I can not offer it except by unanimous consent. I desire to know if it is in order to suggest the amendment now so that it may be pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will send it up in writing, please.

Mr. CURTIS. It is only three words, and I will state it. After the word "northern" I want to insert "or its equivalent" at the end of section 12. I will put it in writing and send it to the desk.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Martin	Smoot
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Sterling
Broussard	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sutherland
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Swanson
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Thompson
Culberson	Kellogg	Page	Tillman
Cummins	Kendrick	Penrose	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Vardaman
Dillingham	King	Pomerene	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Ransdell	Watson
Gore	La Follette	Reed	Weeks
Gronna	Lodge	Saulsbury	Williams
Hale	McCumber	Shafroth	Wolcott
Hardwick	McKellar	Sheppard
Hollis	McLean	Smith, Ga.
Husting	McNary	Smith, Md.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent owing to illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is detained from the Senate on important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is absent on important business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in view of what has appeared in one of the morning papers, I feel obliged to rise to a question of personal privilege. It is stated in one of the morning papers in the news column as follows:

In the midst of caustic debate REED calls HOLLIS, of New Hampshire, a liar upon the floor of the Senate.

Of course, Mr. President, it is not agreeable to have statements of that kind published in the papers. It is perhaps less offensive in my part of the country than it is in other parts where it is warmer. I understand that in the part of the country the Senator from Missouri comes from when the word liar is used a man who is expected to maintain his own self-respect and have the respect of others is obliged to hand his coat to some muscular colleague and make a frantic effort to get at the man who employs the language and personally chastise him.

In examining the RECORD I find that the newspaper has it wrong. I will read what occurred, at pages 5256 and 5257 of the RECORD of yesterday's proceeding. I said:

I do not know Mr. Hoover; I have never met him; I have only seen him twice, and that was twice on the same day, when he was mercilessly cross-examined by the Senator from Missouri, very much as he would have been examined if he had been on trial for some crime in a police court.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not yield. I have not the time to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield.

Mr. REED. I simply want to challenge that statement, and say that it is absolutely untrue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator——

Mr. REED. And the record will show it is untrue.

Mr. HOLLIS. The record will speak for itself.

Mr. REED. It will.

Mr. HOLLIS. It has been published; the Senator has referred to it many times; he has attacked Mr. Hoover mercilessly on many occasions, and I say the record shows that he attacked him mercilessly on that occasion, as if he had been up before a police court for stealing chickens in Kansas City. I repeat that.

A little later:

Mr. REED. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri rises to a question of personal privilege. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. I say that the statement just made by the Senator that I mistreated Mr. Hoover in any respect in examining him and that I made any attack upon him in examining him is absolutely and unqualifiedly false.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. And that the printed record——

Mr. HOLLIS. I think I ought to call the Senator to order. This is no place to indulge in words of that kind——

Mr. REED. The printed record will show——

Mr. HOLLIS. Or in fisticuffs or in altercations of any sort. The record will speak for itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. REED. The question of personal privilege is just what I have said, that the statement made by the Senator is untrue, and that the record——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator is subject to being called to order.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not a question of personal privilege. It is not a question of personal privilege to arise for the purpose of calling another Senator a liar on the floor of this body.

Mr. REED. I have not employed any such language. It remained for the Senator from Mississippi to employ it.

It is very gratifying to me to observe in this nice disfinction of language that I was not called a liar on the floor of the Senate, but that an opinion which I expressed as to a certain controversy was called absolutely false and untrue. When you get to a matter of opinion you are outside the realms of fact. To state that a man's opinion is absolutely false and untrue is to state in a rather offensive way that he is mistaken. I have practiced law for 20 years. I know the difference between the expression of an opinion and the statement of a fact. I think I am qualified as well as perhaps the average man to say whether the cross-examination of a witness is merciless, but I have never practiced law in a police court; I have never conducted a criminal practice. My opinion as to how a chicken thief might be treated in court may not be of particular value. So far as that point is concerned, being in the realm of expert discussion, I am willing to allow my statement to stand as it is in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not under the rules I can be allowed to say anything at this time. If I am permitted to speak I will very briefly clear this matter up.

In the first place, I am not in the habit of calling people liars, in public or in private, and I did not employ that term to the Senator from New Hampshire. Unfortunately, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was in the Chamber observing his opportunity, and he employed the term, I take it, in the interest of amity and peace.

If when the Senator from New Hampshire started to make his statement regarding my treatment of Mr. Hoover he had yielded to me for the mere purpose of inquiring whether he was present when I examined Mr. Hoover, or, if not, whether he had read the testimony, probably there would not have been anything unpleasant said. I do not think that the Senator from New Hampshire was present when the examination took place, and I ask him now if he was present?

Mr. HOLLIS. I was present all the time during the examination in the Senate Office Building, and I was present a part of the time during the examination in the Capitol Building, and what I said was as a result of my own personal observation at the time.

Mr. REED. Very well. The Senator evidently wants to perpetuate whatever unpleasantness exists, and in that he may have my hearty cooperation.

Some newspaper writers referred to the examination as being a "police-court examination," and so forth. I paid no attention to their statements at the time, because I did not think it meant anything more than that some partisan of Mr. Hoover was interested in doing everything possible to help him, and that he thought one of the ways to do so was to parade him as a martyr. I challenge the Senator from New Hampshire, and I hand him the record, to read a single question I asked Mr. Hoover that is not courteous, that is not absolutely within the proprieties [handing document].

Mr. HOLLIS. I have not read the record. I tried to get a copy of it this morning but was unable to do so. I can not read it now sufficiently to point it out. It may be that as it appears in the record it is not offensive, but the whole manner and appearance and effect of it to me was as I have stated.

Mr. REED. Now that explains the whole difficulty. It is not in the language that the Senator finds offense, but it is in the manner and method and appearance—not the language, for language does not have an appearance; not in the method, for language does not have a method; evidently, therefore, it was my manner and my appearance that offended the tender sensibilities of the Senator from New Hampshire. Now, it may be solemnly entered of record that my appearance and manner are highly displeasing at all times and under all circumstances to the Senator from New Hampshire.

I simply want to say that this testimony is printed. I never saw it from the moment it was transcribed until it was printed.

I, therefore, never changed a word of a question or an answer. It speaks for itself.

The truth about the whole matter is that the Senator from New Hampshire is probably just a little bit nervous about Mr. Hoover, and I can see why he and all others might be slightly particular regarding the treatment of this gentleman.

I hold in my hand a letter sent out by the publicity department of the food conservation section of the food administration, which shows that material is being sent by Mr. Hoover to the papers from time to time:

PUBLICITY DEPARTMENT, FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
FOOD CONSERVATION SECTION,
Washington, D. C., July 14, 1917.

To the EDITOR:

Herewith I am inclosing to you some material that has been sent out from the Food Conservation Section of the Food Administration to the news associations and by them sent over their wires. I feel that there are stories in this material that you have not seen and that these may be of use to you.

Your name is on the mailing list of the Food Conservation Section, and after this news stories will be mailed to you Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays.

I hope you will find here something useful to your paper and to the great cause of food saving.

Faithfully, yours, KATHERINE LECKIE.

I now read one of the articles sent out by Mr. Hoover's department in regard to himself. It is dated July 13, 1917. Listen to it:

[For release July 13, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
FOOD CONSERVATION SECTION.

Post-office clerks rubbed their eyes to-day when they found in an incoming mail sack a letter bearing no other address than "Mr. Miracle-Man Hoover, Washington." On a guess as for whom it was intended the letter was carried to Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator. The guess proved correct. The writer tells of the pressing need for food conservation, and adds "God bless you in your service to our country."

And this statement is being sent out by Mr. Hoover about himself in order that he may thereby glorify himself by having it printed in all the papers of the country. It is, I assume, sent out at Government expense.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Here is another news item sent out by Mr. Hoover.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but if he is addressing himself to the bill——

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I am not. I am addressing myself in reply; and I shall be through in less than three minutes.

I read the news item; it may be of interest to the Senator from New Hampshire. It was sent out by Mr. Hoover to be printed in the newspapers:

[For morning papers of July 19, 1917.]

HERBERT HOOVER,
Washington, D. C., July 18, 1917.

That the passage of the Hollis bill would permit gambling, speculation, and exploitation to proceed without restriction, and would leave the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection, was the statement made to-day by representatives of farmers' unions, cooperative associations, grain growers, granges, farmers' societies, and terminal houses. The Lever bill was indorsed and its final enactment into law demanded. The statement, subscribed to by all the representatives, was as follows:

"We are strongly opposed to the fixing of the exact amount of a minimum price for wheat by law, because we recognize that it is an expert question to be settled after such consideration as Congress can not possibly give it, and in a manner which will give the producer a full voice. The Food Administration should be vested with power to deal with this question.

"We recognize that the minimum price of $1.75 for wheat, fixed in the so-called Hollis bill, is unwise and unjust to the producer, and was fixed without consultation with Mr. Hoover or the Food Administration, and against their protest.

"We are opposed to the passage of the so-called Hollis bill, because it permits gambling, speculation, and exploitation to proceed without restriction, exempts sugar, corn, and other products from many or all of the provisions of the bill, and leaves the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection.

"We are opposed to the exemption of cooperative agricultural organizations from the provisions of the bill, thus preventing the Food Administration from dealing with them.

"We favor the Lever food-administration bill as it passed the House, and demand its final enactment into law in that form. It is a workable bill; the Senate amendments are not workable."

Mr. President, as severe as I have sometimes been on the Senator from New Hampshire, and as he has been on me, I have never said as uncomplimentary a thing of him as Mr. Hoover sends out at Government expense and asks the papers to publish regarding a bill pending in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair feels constrained, in view of this unfortunate circumstance, to once again call the attention of every Senator to the following rule of the Senate:

No Senator in debate shall, directly or indirectly, by any form of words impute to another Senator or to other Senators any conduct or motive unworthy or unbecoming a Senator.

The rule is being "more honored in the breach than the observance." Senators may think of each other what they please; that is no business of the Chair; but Senators from this time on must stop abusing each other in the Senate of the United States.

The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon it is proposed to strike out in section 5, page 8, line 9, after the word "wheat," the words "which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce"; in line 13, after the word "products," to strike out "constituting a part of interstate or foreign commerce"; at the beginning of line 16 to strike out the words "which enter into interstate or foreign commerce"; in line 18, after the word "machinery," to strike out "which enter into interstate or foreign commerce"; in line 21, after the word "coal," to strike out "which enters into interstate or foreign commerce"; and in line 24, after the word "ingredients," to strike out "which enter into interstate or foreign commerce."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the Senate votes upon this subject I desire to present a thought with respect to this pending section, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to the phraseology of the section. The Senate will note that on page 8 of the printed amendment provision is sought to be made for the licensing of certain producers and dealers. There are several classes to be licensed. In the first class the phrase is used, limiting it, as follows:

Wheat, which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce—

The second, after defining certain products, uses the language:

Constituting a part of interstate or foreign commerce.

The third class, relating to packing houses, and so forth, uses the language "which enter into interstate or foreign commerce." The same language is used with respect to the fourth, fifth, and sixth classes. The seventh class is as follows:

Any person not a retailer, as defined in this section, who shall engage in handling any of the foregoing enumerated products.

So that as to the dealer it seems that there is no limitation in so far as interstate commerce is concerned, save and except that when, later in the section, they attempt to define what is meant by a retail dealer, the language is:

That for the purposes of this act a retailer shall be deemed to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaging in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum.

I do not know, and I was anxious to inquire of the Senator having the bill in charge as to whether he used purposely the language "which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce," as applied to the first two classes, and the language "enter into interstate or foreign commerce" as to the other classes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if the Senator desires an answer from me——

Mr. POMERENE. I shall be very glad to have any information the Senator may give.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The way that happened to exist is this: In the Sherman Antitrust Act the first language is used, and those words are found in the Sherman Antitrust Act. The second language is used in the child-labor bill, and they were not considered materially different; but as part of the propositions were prepared with the child-labor bill before the draftsman, and part with the Sherman Antitrust Act, it just so happened that the antitrust language was used in one and the child-labor language in the other. I think the Senator in charge of the bill would say that he would be perfectly willing to use either as to both, and that there is really no substantial difference.

Mr. POMERENE. I could think of no legal reason for the distinction, if there was a distinction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The difference was really largely accidental.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the motion is to strike out the whole of that.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that very fully, and it is to that that I am about to address myself.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the real point is that that language is necessary to bring the provisions within the Constitution.

Mr. POMERENE. That is where the Senator and I must differ. I agree entirely with what was said by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Kansas with respect to the constitutionality of the bill; but I want to point out, if I may, very briefly, the serious difficulties which the committee are placing in the way of the administration of this bill. It seems to me that if this language is retained it will render the bill entirely inoperative. I express the hope that before this shall be finally passed upon by the Senate, the amendment which I offered, and which is the result of the collaboration of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and myself, will be substituted for the provisions of the pending bill in so far as they relate to coal and coke.

To say that we shall license dealers in food products who are engaged in interstate commerce, and that we shall not license dealers who are engaged in the sale of food products in intrastate commerce, is to defeat, in my judgment, the very purpose of the bill. You can not say to one man that if he is dealing in interstate commerce and his dealings aggregate $1,000 annually you are going to aid the consuming public in fixing the price of his products, when at the same time you are going to leave free from the operations of this law the dealer or producer who may be interested wholly in intrastate commerce. He may be dealing to a larger extent in the very food products the price of which we want to keep within reasonable limits than the man who is dealing in interstate commerce.

Let us see how this can operate so far as it applies to coal. I think that one of these lawyers who was referred to yesterday as "Oily Gammons" would delight in having this particular bill before him to advise clients under it. Suppose, for the sake of the argument, that I am a coal operator or miner in the State of Ohio. My output may amount to a million tons. It may be that I am selling a part of my coal to dealers within the State, to consumers within the State, and a portion of it to dealers or consumers in the State of Michigan, which is a noncoal-producing State. If this bill becomes the law, of course, under its terms I can not deal in interstate commerce; I can not sell to my customers in Michigan and transport the coal there; but I submit that if I see fit to mine my coal and sell it at the mouth of my mine to some one who may come to my mine as a purchaser, I am not dealing in interstate commerce. So that the effect of this law would be this: If I have been heretofore charging $6 a ton for my coal, and there is a limitation placed upon the coal which goes into interstate commerce of $3 or $3.50 per ton, the maximum price which was agreed upon by certain operators here, I can readily evade such arrangements as that. I can continue to sell the coal, if there is no specific regulation by the Government, at any price I see fit to make to my customer who comes to the mouth of my mine.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, I am very sorry, but I realize what the rule is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. KENYON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to have the amendment stated from the desk, so that we can understand exactly what it provides.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At six places in the proposed amendment occur the words "which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce" or "which enters into interstate or foreign commerce."

Mr. SHAFROTH. What page and line of the bill as amended?

The SECRETARY. In the reprinted amendment it is on page 8. The Senator from Kansas proposes to strike out those words where they appear in six places in the proposed amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say just a few words on the proposed amendment. I understand that the motion of the Senator from Kansas is to strike out those words. That would make a discrimination as between coal mined for intrastate and interstate shipments. It seems to me from the statement which has been made by the Senator from Ohio that there will be interminable confusion unless this interstate commerce provision is stricken out, so as to leave the law to apply to the production of all coal, no matter for what purpose it may be mined or sold.

It is easy, as long as that provision is in the bill, for the purchaser to represent that he intends this coal for intrastate shipments, and thereby evade the operation of the law. That being the case, it seems to me it is bound to result in an evasion of the provisions of this act, whereas if this language is stricken out, if the operation of this bill is to be made to apply to the production of all coal, which is justified under the war power of the Government, surely a more strict regulation can be had in regard to the operation, production, and the prices of coal.

In other words, as long as this measure is confined to shipments of coal in interstate commerce there is not only danger but probability that the entire operation of the coal provision of the bill will become ineffective, because it can be evaded, for whenever a mine owner sells his output at the mouth of the mine, that is not interstate commerce. The intention of the coal buyer becomes a different question. A man might buy coal at the mouth of the mine with the honest intention of using it in the same State in which the mine is located, but afterwards he might change his mind, and for that reason it does seem to me that if this restriction is placed in the bill it will very much impair the efficiency of the administration of the measure.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest in that connection, to follow out the illustration which I was trying to develop, that if my former customer in Michigan were required to have my coal, and he came to the mine to buy it, I could charge him six or eight dollars a ton without violating the provisions of this act, because then I would be dealing in intrastate commerce and not in interstate commerce.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that the illustration which the Senator has given is very apt, and I can not see why there should be a limitation placed in this bill upon coal that is mined for one purpose or for another or for one kind of shipment or for another.

If it were a question as to the constitutional power, it might be that it ought to be looked into; but I take it, from the authorities that have been cited here and the general votes that have been taken, that we have the right, under the war power of the Government, to enact this legislation; and if we do, any limitation that may be placed upon any one of the products named in this bill would, it seems to me, work to the detriment of the administration of the bill. For that reason I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, which strikes out the interstate-commerce feature, will be adopted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not believe that we have the constitutional power to enact this legislation at all. In the first place, it is simply amazing to me that Senators who contended when the child-labor proposition was before the Senate that Congress had no right to apply the interstate-commerce clause to the products of industry in this country before they actually entered interstate commerce, and that Congress could not under the guise of regulating interstate commerce regulate the processes of production and manufacture that were anterior to interstate commerce, can now contend that any such power can be conferred as contained in this section.

I do not believe that the addition of these words, "interstate or foreign commerce," adds one particle of strength to the constitutionality of the proposition. I believe that if we have the power to do the things proposed in section 5 of this bill we have that power independent of whether they are interstate commerce or intrastate commerce, because if the power exists at all it rests on the war power and can rest nowhere else.

Personally, I am going to vote for this limitation, for the plain, simple reason that I do not believe in too much of this kind of thing, anyhow, and while I am going to vote against the bill, I want to make it as little evil as possible.

Senators, whatever popular support this bill has before the people of this country rests on a false assumption, and in my judgment we shall not be able long to deceive the American people about it. Are we going to be able to successfully tell the American producer that this bill is enacted in order to give him higher prices, and in the same breath tell the American consumer, especially in the great centers of population of this country, that we are enacting this bill to give him lower prices, and expect both statements to be believed?

Under our dual form of government, whatever of regulation, whatever of restriction, whatever of control of these matters—forestalling, regrating, and engrossing—is needed in New York, in Chicago, and in these other great cities, can only be applied locally by the authorities of those communities. The war power does not change the situation, in my opinion. Under the war power, without regard to whether it is a part of interstate commerce or intrastate commerce, we can commandeer every bushel of grain in this country, every pound of meat in it, every article of necessity that our Army and Navy needs; but we have no more right in time of war than we have in time of peace to undertake to deal with this question of the high cost of living for the consumer in localities, and to invade a province that belongs to local authorities, and over which we have neither jurisdiction nor power.

My prophecy is that before long the American consumer will be undeceived. You have taught him to expect great things from this bill. You have told him that it is going to cut the cost of living. I here and now confidently predict that it will do no such thing. If your proposition was merely a frank proposal that since we have interfered with the ordinary and normal industrial laws applicable to wheat, we will say, because, as a part of the war policy of this country, we found it necessary to impose an embargo on wheat, then I would say it was all right for the Government to say, since we have been forced as a part of our war policy to interfere with the normal situation with respect to wheat and to change the ordinary and normal laws of trade with respect to that article, that it will make the loss it has occasioned good to the producer, to stimulate production and keep conditions as stable as possible by governmental action. So if you limited the legislation to coal and said frankly that no nation can fight a great war without controlling absolutely its coal supplies, and for that reason we must for the moment brush aside the ordinary laws of industry and economics in relation to coal production and coal selling and undertake to regulate as a matter of governmental regulation these prices and these practices with respect to coal it would be all right. If we could have confined it to two or three things like that, and to no more than that, pretended no more, everybody could have supported the proposition. But when we go before the American people promising the American consumer that we are going to do great things for him, that this bill is going to relieve the distress that he now experiences and is going to enable him to buy things cheaper than he is now buying them, it is impossible for a man as confident as I am that no such result is possible to take part in such a confidence game.

I doubt the constitutional power of Congress to undertake to deal with the high cost of living in any different manner or under any different power, or in any different way in time of war than it can in time of peace.

I am sure, Mr. President, my own opinion is fixed, that when we come to the end of all this, and the American consumer who is clamoring for this legislation gets it, he will find that instead of relief he has actually gotten a gold brick. I do not care to take any part in his deception.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to eliminate the words "interstate commerce." I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, or anyone on the committee which considered this proposed amendment to include those words, the reason why those words were inserted in the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, as I said yesterday on the floor of the Senate, when this amendment was before the Agricultural Committee there was a line of cleavage between the members of the committee which practically divided them into two contending forces, almost equally divided, and we see it now, some insisting that this should be operative on commodities entering into interstate commerce and others contending that interstate commerce has nothing to do with it; in other words, some contending that the provisions of the bill must rely for the powers granted on the war power conferred by the Constitution and others contending that it should be operative under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. So out of the discussions which took place in the committee there was finally a compromise, as I understand it, so that section 4 should eliminate from its provisions the interstate-commerce provision and that this particular section should contain it. It was really a compromise, as I understood it.

I will say, so far as I am individually concerned, I do not believe that the bill is framed under the theory that it can only come under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, but that, on the contrary, it is framed entirely and is dependent on the war power. But in view of the feeling in the committee and with others with whom I have discussed the matter, because there is a well-defined line of division between the sections, I felt that I ought to stand by what the committee reported out.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I do not desire to yield any more of my time now.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I thought the Senator asked members of the committee to state why it was left out. I shall take my own time to explain it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I am glad to get the explanation of the Senator, who has the bill in charge. I wish to say that with the application made by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to coal I can not see why it ought not to apply to everything else. I do not consider it fair; I do not consider it just. I think there is only one conclusion that anyone can reach, and that is that it will limit the real benefit of the bill by inserting in the amendment the words "interstate commerce" and destroy the intended purposes of the bill in its general application.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in order to get the amendment which I have to offer under the rule which we established in the unanimous-consent agreement, that amendments should be presented before 2 o'clock, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I think this is a matter of such importance that the Senate ought to be advised just what divided the Agricultural Committee in inserting the words "interstate and foreign commerce" in one section and leaving them out in another. We all recognized and agreed that whenever there was the necessity for the Army and Navy to commandeer for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy no interstate or intrastate lines were to be contemplated, but whatever the Government needed for the support of our Army and Navy we were willing to give them unlimited power to obtain, if they did not already have it under the Constitution. But when it came to the question of going beyond that for the support of the civil population, to lower the cost of living to those who are not in the Army and Navy, we thought we were not justified in giving unlimited power or attempting to give it, to go and take the store of one man or any set of men on the same basis that we took it for the Army and Navy.

The Army and Navy as a matter of course have to be supported, and under the provisions of our Constitution as interpreted by some of the constitutional lawyers no State lines need be observed, but when you sought to commandeer the food and the property of the individuals of the country for the purpose of relieving the distress and the necessity of other individuals we thought that the interstate and foreign commerce limitation ought to apply. There is a distinction between taking food and necessities for the Army and Navy and taking food and necessities for the civil population of the country, and we drew that distinction and made it apply all through the bill.

If the Senate sees fit to grant to the administrator under the bill the power to disregard State lines, to disregard personal rights for the purpose of feeding the population that is not actively engaged in either the Army or the Navy, that distinction is made in the bill, and they can withdraw it if they see fit. The Agricultural Committee did not think we had a right to commandeer or confiscate private property for private use, and therefore we did not write it in the bill. We did think you had the right to commandeer and to confiscate if necessary for the support of the Army and the Navy.

I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to the amendment will be defeated. We want to encourage the people of America to cooperate. They are all patriotic people, and they will divide their last crust of bread, and their last dollar in helping to support our Army to a successful conclusion of the war, but I do not think the country is called upon to enter into absolute socialism in order to support the civil population. Therefore I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to be printed and pending under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on which the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer it to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] and vote "nay."

Mr. KELLOGG (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]. I make this transfer on all votes for the day without further announcement. I vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS]. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer the pair to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I observe that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has not voted. I have a general pair with him, but I am advised if he were present he would vote against the pending proposition. I therefore feel relieved from my obligation, and I vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. CALDER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], but am permitted to vote on the provisions of the bill. I will therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. We have made an arrangement to transfer these pairs, so that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] will stand paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. This announcement may stand for the day without repetition. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I ask whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], with whom I have a general pair, has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the negative). I transferred my pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], but that Senator has entered the Chamber and voted. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Shafroth

So Mr. THOMPSON'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I desire to reserve the right of having a separate vote on this question in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the vote on the amendment is finally taken I desire to say just a word with reference to it as explaining what my purpose shall be later.

In my judgment the vote just taken is going to defeat the purpose of this legislation. I was not able to complete my statement a moment ago, and I am going to take the time now simply to complete it as far as it applies to this particular bill.

In the matter of wheat, for instance, it has been limited by the action of the Senate to interstate commerce. If I had an elevator with a million bushels of wheat in it in the State of North Dakota, and I wanted to evade the provisions of this law as it now is, I would hold my wheat and simply sell it in intrastate commerce and not in interstate commerce. Bear in mind, if Senators please, that at this crucial time it is not the producer or the seller who is hunting the buyer, but it is the buyer who is hunting the producer and the seller; and there would be buyers galore going to my elevator in North Dakota and buying this wheat.

Under the provisions of the bill limiting profits, the fact is that you are seeking to limit prices; it is one and the same thing. When the buyer comes to my elevator I say to him, "I am selling in intrastate business only; my transaction will be completed here at my elevator; I sell it here; I deliver it to you; and it is an intrastate transaction; it is not an interstate transaction. When it comes to negotiating the price, if the food administrator would fix the price of wheat at $2 a bushel I would say, "No; my price is $5 a bushel." I should like to have some Senator explain to me how he could subject me to the provisions of this bill if I were dealing in intrastate commerce alone? I fear that will be the effect of it in its present form.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. WATSON. It occurs to me that a fair interpretation of this language will exclude the idea which is advanced by the Senator from Ohio. The language is:

> First, any person operating an elevator or other storage facility used for the storing of wheat which constitutes a part of interstate or foreign commerce.

Under that language, suppose the Senator were operating his elevator in North Dakota, that I were to go to him to buy a part of the wheat stored in that elevator, and that I took that wheat and put it into interstate commerce; would not the fact that the wheat, the product, goes into interstate commerce subject him to this license provision?

Mr. POMERENE. It may be after the wheat gets into the possession of the Senator from Indiana and he seeks then to dispose of it that it would be in interstate commerce. To illustrate: If I go to my shoe merchant in the city of Canton and buy a pair of shoes, it may be that I am going to wear those shoes to Washington. Is that interstate commerce?

But what I sought to say was that, if this section shall be adopted, it is my purpose and the purpose of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], as I understand, to later offer the amendment, which was printed the other day and of which I gave notice, on the subject of coal and coke. As it now reads, it is coal, coke, petroleum, and other products. My judgment, however, is that it should perhaps be limited to coal and coke. I will offer that as an independent proposition.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Ohio is unduly pessimistic about the effect of the adoption of this amendment in the form which the Senate has indicated that it should take. If there were nothing but this license section of the bill, there would be much, in my judgment, to what the Senator from Ohio has said; but this license section is only one part of the bill. Indeed, in my own judgment, I doubt the necessity for the license system at all. It is not a compulsory system; it is a system which the President can impose if the necessities of the situation demand it; and nothing, in my judgment, would justify the President in imposing a license system unless the dealers in these products have been guilty of some moral turpitude in the transaction of their business. If they are guilty of moral turpitude in the transaction of their business, they are liable criminally under a distinct section of this bill. I do not know anything within the sphere or realm of moral turpitude that is not included in that other section.

Now, let us look at it. It is section 4. It is made unlawful for a person to do what? A person where situated? Not persons dealing in interstate commerce, but persons wherever they may be situated. It is unlawful for them to willfully destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price; to permit waste or to attempt to monopolize either locally or generally; to make or engage in any unfair, discriminatory, or deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; to restrict the supply and distribution of necessaries; to willfully prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production, or to exact excessive prices.

So it goes. I can not imagine anything that would be unfair or irregular or unjust or monopolistic or swinish in the conduct of business that is not reached by the provisions of the fourth section of this act; and those who commit those offenses are liable to be fined and imprisoned.

So, I say, taking the illustration which the Senator from Ohio gave, if a man storing a million bushels of grain in an elevator within the State of Ohio undertook, by reason of his dominion over that property, to coerce the public in any of the ways that are mentioned in section 4, he would be liable to this punishment. I think the President would scarcely be justified in using the option to invoke the license system unless the parties had been found guilty of some of the offenses prescribed by section 4.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question before he takes his seat, referring to the illustration which I used a moment ago, and assuming that the elevator man would sell all of his wheat in intrastate commerce, acting, we will say for the sake of the argument, in perfect good faith, I ask would he be subject to the provisions of section 5 of the bill?

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator mean section 4?

Mr. POMERENE. No; section 5. I recognize the force of what the Senator says with respect to the efficacy of section 4. I am addressing myself now to the license provisions of section 5.

Mr. KNOX. He certainly would not under the provisions of the license section be required to take out a license if he dealt wholly with citizens of the State of Ohio, but it is just as the Senator from Ohio stated a moment ago, these are times in which the owners are not seeking the purchasers, but the purchasers are seeking the owners, and whether the primary transaction was between the owner of the elevator and a citizen of the State of Ohio or not, the wheat would ultimately get out of Ohio, because the demand from that State would not require the hoarding of the grain within the State. So that ultimately the wheat must eventually get to the consumers, and the consumers, as the Senator has well said, are scattered far and near.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], believing, as I do, that the power conferred in this bill is derived from the war power of the Constitution and not from the interstate-commerce power at all; and that it should be exercised for war purposes. Therefore I can see no possible reason or sense in attempting to limit it or in putting in words which might be construed as limiting it, as might be the case, when we use the words "in interstate commerce."

I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] that there are provisions in the bill to cover practically all of these cases. Hence the more reason, in my judgment, of eliminating words about which there might possibly be some controversy. Therefore, I voted to eliminate the words "in interstate commerce." I do not believe they are necessary and might possibly be confusing.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, under the rule I send a proposed amendment to the desk, so as to give it a parliamentary status whereby I can offer it later, for I understand that after 2 o'clock no amendments can be offered. I shall offer the amendment which I send to the desk at the proper time. I do not know what the practice is, whether it should lie on the table or simply be considered as suggested. I will later ask for a vote upon this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules that when a Senator presents an amendment and states that he expects to have it pending and voted upon it will be voted upon.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say concerning this amendment that it is the identical amendment which has been adopted by the Senate in the former food-control bill with reference to the question of speculation, and which is now before the conference committee on the other food bill, with the addition of a slight clause providing that it shall not in any way affect the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I make this statement now because at the time of presenting this amendment I feel that there will be no opportunity to offer any suggesions concerning it. I believe, if it should be adopted as a part of this bill, it will relieve the work of the conference committee on the other bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if his amendment relates to hoarding, storing, and so forth?

Mr. KENYON. Yes. I want to say just a word further about the pending question. I think the gloom of the Senator from Ohio might be further dissipated by reference to section 8, which gives the President the power to commandeer—> foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or any other public use connected with the common defense.

It has been my thought that a hoarding such as has been suggested by the Senator from Ohio, if it interfered with the question of domestic tranquillity, would be so related to the common defense that the President, under section 8, could commandeer the commodity at a price to be fixed by him, subject to the appeal to the courts provided in the section.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, do I understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon is still open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I move to amend, on page 8 of the so-called committee print, on line 12, after the word "poultry," by inserting the word "eggs,"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I do not know that I understand just what the purpose of the amendment is.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will be found, on lines 11 and 12, that amongst the persons who are to be subject to the license system, in the discretion of the President, is—

> Any person operating a cold-storage establishment for the storage of meat, poultry, or dairy products.

I think, in order to be consistent and really to reach a product which is placed in cold storage in very large quantities, we should insert the word "eggs" after the word "poultry."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have not a copy of the bill before me. I will ask the Senator, How will it read with the word "eggs" added?

Mr WADSWORTH. It will read:

> Any person operating a cold-storage establishment for the storage of meat, poultry, eggs, or dairy products——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have no objection to that, so far as I am concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has a right to modify his amendment so as to embrace cold-storage eggs. The amendment is so modified. The question now is on the amendment as modified.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HUSTING. Is the vote to be on the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. HUSTING. If it be proper at this time, I should like to reserve the right to have a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to provide that the administration of this bill shall be placed in the hands of one man instead of in the hands of a board.

Furthermore, I should like to reserve the right to have a separate vote in the Senate on the amendment which I tendered yesterday, leaving to the President the right to bring within the provisions of this bill other commodities which might appear to him to be necessary to regulate in a similar way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from North Dakota proposes the following amendment to the bill:

> In section 8, page 10, line 22, after the word "therefor," a committee amendment which has been agreed to, insert the following:
> "In determining the compensation to be paid for farm products all labor employed in producing the same, whether furnished by the farmer or members of his family, including the necessary domestic service, shall be computed and allowed for at the same rate of wages paid for like labor, or labor requiring a like degree of intelligence and arduous efforts, in other lines of business or trade; and in addition thereto there shall be allowed as a charge in the cost of production a reasonable rate of interest upon the capital invested in both real and personal estate and a further reasonable charge for deterioration and upkeep. There shall also be taken into consideration the increased cost to the farmer of all necessary farm equipment, food and clothing required, and other advanced cost in the ordinary necessaries of life."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish Senators to understand, first, that this amendment is not offered as a substitute for or in any way related to any proposed amendment fixing a minimum price for crops that are or may be raised. I call attention to section 8. It is a section which provides for the commandeering of different articles for the necessities of the Government. That section reads:

> That the President is authorized from time to time (a) to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor.

This amendment applies, as I have stated, only to those cases in which the Government may see fit to requisition these articles of food; and if the Government requisitions wheat or oats or barley or rye, I simply want the Government in that case to apply the usual rule in determining what is a just compensation therefor.

If we enter into any other line of business, if I conduct a manufacturing business of any kind, and the Government wishes to take the product of that factory, it ascertains the labor cost, the taxes, the overhead charges, and every other necessary expense that goes into that production, and then it will allow a reasonable return upon the investment. Now, that is all I ask in this case—that the same rule that is to be applied in commandeering coal or steel or any other product may be applied in taking the products of the farm. I want whatever officer exercises that authority to consider the price the farmer must pay for labor, the amount invested in farm and machinery, and the ordinary wages or going wages that are paid for like service; because in many instances all of the work that is performed is performed by the farmer and his family, and there would be no standard to go by except the standard of like wages for like character of service. No one can complain because this allowance is made; and as it does not affect the question of fixing a price in case there is a guaranty, but simply the rule of damages or compensation in case the property is taken, I ask that this amendment may be inserted and may go into conference. On this amendment, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I make the same announcement of my pair and transfer as before and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I make the same announcement with regard to my pair and vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. MCCUMBER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to offer for the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is absent, an amendment and have it considered as pending.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I ask that the substitute for section 9 be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I did not understand the request of the Senator from Oregon in regard to section 9.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I offer the amendment which is already pending to strike out all of section 9 and in lieu thereof to insert what the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Oregon proposes to strike out all of section 9 and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices, fuel, wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed pursuant to the provisions of section 12 of this act, then the price paid for any foods, feeds, or fuel so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal by the United States of necessaries under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I am opposed to section 9, and have a motion pending, as a pending amendment, to strike out section 9. A parliamentary inquiry. If section 9 be adopted at the present time, will the motion to strike it out lie thereafter?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Rule XVIII provides that the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition, nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which is pending to strike out all of section 12 and in lieu thereof to insert the amendment which is pending on the Clerk's desk. I request the Senator to listen to this amendment attentively, because it is the one which provides for the fixing of a minimum price on wheat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 12 as printed in the bill and insert:

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to require the board of food administration to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. Said board shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act, approved August 11, 1916. It shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as it shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 Northern at the principal interior primary market as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period not exceeding 18 months prescribed in the notice a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the board of food administration, subject to the approval of the President, shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat from the passage of this act to the 1st day of January, 1919, shall be based upon No. 1 northern at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary market. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President or said board under the first part of this section but is hereby made absolute. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will affect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any wheat for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store it, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of wheat under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think the Secretary perhaps misread one provision there. As I heard it it said "the sales to countries at war with the United States." But I rose for the purpose of offering an amendment. I wish to propose to insert the words "or its equivalent" after the word "northern" at each place where it appears in the amendment, so as to make the price fixed on the northern wheat or its equivalent, which would include our No. 2 hard-winter wheat.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator permit me to offer an amendment so as to be within the rule, the amendment to be voted on later? I send it to the desk.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make a request that the amendment be printed and lie over until to-morrow. The amendment read by the Secretary is not the same amendment that has been offered and printed and on our desks. It has several features in it that I never heard except as they have been read. It is the most important amendment probably to the bill, and it seems to me we ought to have an opportunity to read it at least.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. All right. I would be glad to let it go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CURTIS. If I may just make one statement I will yield the floor. If the amendment is printed I ask that the amendment suggested by me be printed in small caps.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Kansas will be complied with. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Before it is agreed that the amendment goes over until to-morrow I wanted to have an opportunity to examine the unanimous-consent agreement. I am not sure but that if it goes over until to-morrow we can not discuss it at all. There is a limit to debate to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. After 2.30 p. m.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Pending that I desire to take up the motion to strike out all of section 15.

Mr. GRONNA. May I have just a word before that is done?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I think it is very unfortunate that the leaders should have seen fit to withhold from the Members of this body an amendment as important as is this amendment. I doubt if anyone in this body understands the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. The effect it will have upon this industry will be staggering to humanity.

Mr. President, I think we ought at least to have had an opportunity to have the amendment presented in time to discuss it. The amendment never has been presented to the Committee on Agriculture. It has not been considered by the members of that committee. It has not been referred to members from the grain-growing States.

I think I may say it is unfair to the representatives who come from those States to be forced to vote upon it without an opportunity to discuss it. This amendment is presented and is now in the second degree. If Members who come from the grain-growing section should feel like offering a substitute it will not be in order.

Mr. President, I am not asking that the amendment shall go over until to-morrow. I think we ought to occupy the entire time necessary to discuss this question, because it is the most important question in the entire bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator. There has been no desire to get anything before the Senate unfairly. It has been discussed by Senators from wheat-growing States. It may not suit everybody, and nothing that has been done by the Senate suits everybody. I suggest to the Senator that we have the amendment printed at once. We can get it back here in an hour or in two hours, printed, so that Senators can devote the balance of the day and the night, if they wish, to the discussion of it.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the privilege of entering a motion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognized the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GRONNA. I had not yielded the floor. I do not think my time is up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not so understand, or, of course, he would not have recognized another Senator. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall take only another minute. The Senator from Ohio has had his time this morning, and I have not occupied a single moment.

Mr. POMERENE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he had concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply want to have read the amendment offered by me before my time expires.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator allow me to say that I had no intention of interrupting him? I assumed he had taken his seat.

Mr. GRONNA. I should be glad to yield to the Senator if I had time.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not asked the Senator to yield to me. I thought he had yielded the floor,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is the fault of the Chair in recognizing the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from North Dakota still retains the floor.

Mr. GRONNA. I send to the desk an amendment I propose, and I ask to have it read in my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In the printed amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] strike out the proviso on page 22 of the amendment and insert:

The United States hereby guarantees and agrees to pay from the date this act becomes a law to the 30th day of June, 1919, for all wheat raised in the continental United States and tendered to it at any of the five principal interior primary markets, to be designated by the board, not less than $2 per bushel for standard contract grades in such markets. The grades shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, as by law provided, the price for other grades to be based upon the said standard grades. The board shall make rules specifying the conditions of delivery and for the proper carrying out of the provisions of this paragraph.

The provisions of this act for the execution of the guaranty by the Government of minimum prices of wheat shall apply to the minimum prices covered by this paragraph.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this amendment is drawn in very simple language, and I think no one can misconstrue it. I take it that it is the intention of the Members of Congress to guarantee to the farmers the amount specified in the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. If it is, it ought to be made in plain language and have no ifs and ands about it. We ought to say in specific language that we want to guarantee the farmer for his wheat. We also ought to make it plain where that price shall be obtained.

My amendment provides that at five primary markets, and these five markets may be named by the board, and based upon the highest grade, the price shall be $2 a bushel. That would not mean $2 a bushel to the farmer; it would mean in my section of the country, if Minneapolis or Duluth were designated as one of these markets, for the highest grade about $1.84 a bushel. It would mean, on an average, taking all the grades, not to exceed $1.50 a bushel to $1.60 per bushel.

But, Mr. President, if we say that the price shall be fixed and leave it to the board, the board might designate New York, which would mean at least 40 cents a bushel to be deducted in the grain sections of the West, including Missouri and the interior sections of the western country. I think we ought to make that plain. That is what my amendment does, and I trust Senators will give it consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I suggest——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the Senator's time I wish to take just a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will get recognition in that way. I should like to ask what is the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon offers a motion to strike out section 15, and that is pending, with one or two amendments, of which notice has been given to be proposed to the section.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Oregon proposes that that should be laid over, I understand, until to-morrow. I shall object to its going over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will say that section 12 was the one that I asked might go over until to-morrow, but I withdrew that request and suggested that within an hour or an hour and a half we can have it printed and laid before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. As there is no certainty at all that we will discuss it, even if it is printed within an hour, and it goes over until to-morrow, if I am still within my rights to object to its going over for printing or any other purpose, I wish to object to it. I have not heard the proposition put to the Senate as to whether the Senate would agree to that course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the Senate has agreed to anything in regard to it; and the pending question is the motion to amend of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; then, I wish that motion to be disposed of.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that that matter has been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not.

Mr. POMERENE. I rose for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would not be in order. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I offer a substitute to section 12 or the amendment moved by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STERLING. I ask that the substitute may be read.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I simply desire to offer an amendment to the amendment to section 12, as proposed by the Senator in charge of the bill, in order that the amendment to the amendment may be pending. I ask that it shall be considered as pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Dakota has just offered an amendment to that section, which will be read.

Mr. REED. Certainly; but I simply ask that this amendment may be offered to be pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. REED. Under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be so received.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment and have it pending so as to save my right under the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received under the unanimous-consent agreement. The Secretary will read the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The SECRETARY. In lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon insert the following:

SEC. 12. That whenever, during the continuance of the war, the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of any nonperishable agricultural products produced within the United States, in order to stimulate the production of such products, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable price for any such products, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. Thereupon, if the President finds that the importation into the United States of any such products produced outside of the United States seriously interferes or is likely seriously to interfere with the obtaining by such producers within the United States of the reasonable price therefor determined pursuant to this section and shall so proclaim, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a rate of duty, upon the products so imported, the amount of which rate of duty shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, which amount shall, when added to the value of the product at the time it is offered for entry, be sufficient to bring the prices thereof at which imported up to the reasonable price which shall have been fixed therefor pursuant to this section; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon any such products under any then existing tariff law of the United States: Provided, That, in order to further stimulate the production of wheat, the board of food administration herein provided for is authorized to devise and put in operation a plan for the awarding of Government prizes or bonuses for the best crop or crops of wheat, quantity and quality both considered, which may be grown on any specified area to be designated by said board. That in devising and carrying out such plan said board shall, so far as possible, advise and cooperate with the several State and county authorities in the wheat-growing sections of the United States, including State, district, and county agricultural associations. That for the purpose of carrying out these provisions the sum of $1,000,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that the pending question is the elimination of section 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; section 12. The Chair was endeavoring to ascertain the exact status from the Secretary. The Chair does not understand that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] offered his amendment at this time to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon. Is the Chair correct?

Mr. GRONNA. I did offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota is in order. The Chair will recognize the Senator from South Dakota for the purpose of offering his amendment later

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I make this promise to the Senator? It is objected that section 12 shall go over, and if the discussion is going on I promise the Senate within an hour and a half to have it printed. So the discussion may go on just the same, if there is objection to its going over.

Mr. REED. May I make a suggestion to the Senator in charge of the bill? When he comes to have the amendment printed the provision is that this guaranteed price of wheat shall be paid for wheat delivered up to the 1st day of January, 1919. The sole effect of that would be to compel the delivery of the entire wheat crop that may be raised prior to the 1st day of January, 1919, and instead of spreading the delivery of wheat over the entire year, which is entirely desirable, having it come to the market gradually, it would probably glut the market along about January. I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that in printing his amendment he insert the word "July" instead of "January."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That change can be made after the amendment is printed, if it is deemed advisable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may be permitted, I wish to say to the Senator from Oregon that I did not object to having the amendment go over for an hour, but my colleague objected, and he is not now in the Chamber.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think he would not object to its going over for an hour. He did object to its going over until to-morrow, I think.

Mr. WARREN. I understood that he objected to its going over until to-morrow. He wanted to have it considered at the present time.

Mr. GRONNA. I think we could save time by calling for a quorum, and then my colleague will be here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Smoot
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Sterling
Calder	Kellogg	Phelan	Stone
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Pittman	Sutherland
Culberson	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Tillman
France	Knox	Ransdell	Townsend
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Reed	Trammell
Gore	Lewis	Saulsbury	Underwood
Gronna	McCumber	Shafroth	Vardaman
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Harding	McLean	Sherman	Warren
Hitchcock	McNary	Shields	Weeks
Hollis	Myers	Simmons	Williams
Husting	New	Smith, Ariz.
James	Norris	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on the 30th of June last I prepared and submitted an amendment to the pending bill. In view of the ruling of the Vice President a few moments ago, I should like to have the amendment read at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be stated.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill now under consideration, in order to have it pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received.

Mr. CALDER. I offer an amendment, which I desire to have considered as pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] that my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER], who objected a moment ago to this amendment going over, has since informed me that he would have no objection to a unanimous-consent agreement to let it go over until 3 o'clock, and to let the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think I can have the amendment printed by that time.

Mr. GRONNA. Then, it will be understood that it will be taken up at 3 o'clock. I think there is no objection to that. I ask that the pending amendment also go over.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the amendment of the Senator is to go over and the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is to be printed, I ask that the substitute offered by me a while ago may also be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the request to be that the pending amendment be postponed for consideration until 3 o'clock, and that meanwhile the amendment of the Senator from Oregon and the proposed substitutes and amendments thereto be printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Amendments to section 12.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Amendments to section 12. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon will come up at 3 o'clock.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think, if that be disposed of, that the motion to strike out section 15 is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask if the amendment is a committee amendment?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; it is not a committee amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I will yield to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The motion was to strike out section 15.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to strike out section 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is only one other amendment which I desire to suggest, and I think it will not need any discussion at all. Senators will remember that section 17 of the bill provided, in substance, that no salary in excess of $3,500 should be paid. In view of the fact that the first section of the bill, as now amended, provides for a $7,500 salary to each member of the board, I desire to have section 17 amended by striking out and inserting, so that it will make provision for the increased salary. I ask that the Secretary read the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 17, and in lieu thereof to insert:

SEC. 17. That the sum of $2,500,000 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1918, for the payment of such rent, the expense, including postage, of such printing and publications, the purchase of such material and equipment, and the employment of such persons and means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential: Provided, That all salaries and wages paid under the provisions of this act shall be the equivalent of salaries and wages paid in other departments of the Government for like services; and in no event shall any salary be paid in excess of $3,500, except as herein specifically provided.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I desire at this time to call up for consideration the amendment which I submitted a few moments ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 19 by adding a new paragraph, as follows:

Provided further, That the President, in his discretion, may expend from the amount hereby appropriated not to exceed the sum of $20,000,000 on reclamation projects in accordance with the provisions of the reclamation act approved June 17, 1902, and acts amendatory thereto.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I desire to speak very briefly on the amendment which I have offered.

At the threshold of the statement I propose to make on behalf of this amendment I am frank to declare that I do not want to burden the food-control measure with unnecessary luggage, as its speedy passage in a perfected form is necessary to the accomplishment of those beneficent purposes which its advocates believe are certain to follow. Hours now are as precious as were days in normal times, and I have no doubt that the delay in passing this bill has placed a toll upon the American public which it will sorrowfully pay before the year is over. War necessities demand speedy action by the removal of all barriers to an abundant production and an equitable distribution of food products. The producer must have assurances from some governmental source of a fair profit, while the consumer must be screened from the heartless exactions of the speculator. No particular class must be made to feel the hardships of war while another class is permitted to enjoy the favor of its profits.

One of the corner stones upon which food-control legislation is founded is increased production, and that is the purpose and aim of the amendment which I have offered. We have daily referred to the necessity of man power, yet equally important is land power; that is, the ability of the available acreage to yield bountifully and the possibility and practicability of bringing more land into the fold of productivity.

If we are to feed our people, and our armies and to assist in feeding our allies, we must look in part to those vast acres of unreclaimed lands that lie to the west, for there rests the potential possibilities of war's success.

Our consumption of wheat has increased faster than our acreage, with the result that our exports to the foreign nations have decreased during the past decade over 30 per cent. A very large part of our agricultural land has been brought under cultivation, and we can increase production of food only in two ways: First, by rejuvenating our lands by the use of fertilizers, which is practical and generally employed, yet expensive, and, second, by immediately increasing the acreage of productive lands.

To a large extent our fertilizers have been imported. From Germany comes our potash, which the war has stopped, while we have drawn upon Chile for our nitrates but which beds are now approaching exhaustion. As yet we have not developed water power for the making of nitrogen, which has proven successful in Germany and Canada.

The automobile and farm tractor has curtailed the available quantity of stable manure until its cost is almost prohibitive, and for that reason green manures, such as leguminous crops, are now the farmers' chief agency in restoring to the soil the plant foods that make for soil restoration.

In view of this situation it becomes almost imperative in times of war to look for and develop latent productive sources which are calculated to increase food production, and that is the justification for adding the amendment here proposed. Extending the area of productive lands in the United States is the purpose of the work of the Reclamation Service, and this was made possible by the congressional enactment of 1902 and acts amendatory and supplementary thereto.

To some of the Senators who have not had time to consider the purpose of the amendment, it might appear that an attempt was being made to divert public money from a purpose foreign to the bill under consideration, but such is not the case, as the revolving feature of the reclamation act does not admit of the exhaustion of the funds the President, in his wisdom, might use for development of present or new projects.

Out in the 16 Western States are millions of acres of arid lands which could be made to blossom and to yield bountifully by the application of water brought about by Government aid. In the State of Oregon I will cite but one example of the prompt returns in the shape of increased food production that would follow governmental assistance. The Warm Spring district in eastern Oregon needs a dam which Government engineers say would cost $400,000 and which would require six months for its construction. In the project 12,000 acres are now annually producing 40,000 tons of hay, but the supply of water is exhausted about the 1st of July, and in consequence thereof only one crop is harvested, whereas a more liberal supply of water would insure an additional crop. Five thousand more acres now unproductive could be made ready for cultivation by the time the dam was completed. Subsequently and within the time for harvesting the crops in 1918, 15,000 or 20,000 adjoining acres could be brought to a state of cultivation.

Throughout the entire West many examples of this kind could be detailed as practical possibilities in the scheme of reclamation but are halted on account of the lack of funds. Other equally important projects in Oregon, upon which work could be commenced at once and which in the aggregate contemplate hundreds of thousands of acres of land susceptible of irrigation are the Deschutes, Malheur, and Owyhee projects; Silver Lake project; John Day and Ochoco projects; and Butter Creek, Klamath, and Rogue River projects. Similar opportunities exist in other arid and semiarid Western States.

Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD the following telegrams, which contain data confirmatory of that which I have said:

Amendment carrying twenty million for reclamation means a vast addition to the productive possibilities of the country. Through you we urge upon Congress that this amendment will do more to increase grain, beef, and wool production in 1918 and the future than any other feature of the bill. It will certainly do much to prevent the sure shortage of foodstuff whether the war continues or ends. Signed, John H. Lewis, State engineer; George M. Brown, State attorney; Julien A. Hurley, State senator.

If Oregon should get portion of your appropriation for reclamation, the food product of 75,000 acres will be doubled. In two years time 10,000 acres would be doubled next spring. You know character of Snake River Valley lands most productive in West, if plenty of water available. We strongly urge the adoption of your amendment and an apportionment to Oregon. Signed, Ontario Commercial Club.

Therefore, Mr. President, it will be observed that the amendment which I offer contemplates a governmental adventure quite akin to the main purpose of the measure which it proposes to amend, namely, the increase of food production.

I received yesterday a letter from the Director and the Chief Engineer of the United States Reclamation Service which is confirmatory of the telegrams I have read. I do not wish to tire the Senate by reading this letter. It covers the situation in Oregon as I have attempted briefly to outline, as well as the situation in the other arid States. I also ask, Mr. President, to have the privilege of having this letter printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES RECLAMATION SERVICE,
OFFICE OF THE DIRECTOR,
Washington, D. C., July 18, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of July 16, $20,000,000 can be used to great advantage in the reclamation States, especially in Arizona, California, Colorado Idaho, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming.

The Reclamation Service is now developing throughout the West, including all the above-named States, some 20 projects, intended ultimately to irrigate approximately 3,000,000 acres. The principal works have generally been constructed, such as the large storage reservoirs, diversion dams, tunnels, etc. The canal systems have been extended to cover approximately 1,500,000 acres. Thus the work remaining to complete these projects is mainly (though not entirely) additional canals and extensions of existing canals to cover new lands, on account of which large investments have already been made in the major works, and drainage systems to safeguard the land already covered from waterlogging.

At present our progress is limited by the amount of money available. The annual appropriation from the reclamation fund has recently been about $8,000,000 About half of this is required for work that brings no additional land under canal. The main item in this category is the operation and maintenance of the systems already built, the cost of such operation being largely "turned over" each year—i. e., expended and collected—but the collections reenter the reclamation fund and must be reappropriated each year. Under present conditions and laws the reclamation fund will provide even less for new construction in the next few years than now.

Thus, if $20,000,000 were added to the reclamation fund, its best use would be toward completing these projects now under development. It might also be used to build or initiate one or more additional projects. There are a great many of these demanding attention, especially where projects have been partly built, or the lands covered in part by canal, requiring storage works to insure the water supply and additional canals. Some of the projects in Oregon are especially available, as we have for them more complete information gained through cooperative work with the State.

It is difficult to say for how many acres irrigation works can be provided with $20,000,000. Of course, this depends on where and how it is used. On new projects it should make water available for from 200,000 to 400,000 acres. On the extension of the present Government systems this might well reach 500,000 acres and more.

I am sending you herewith the following:

1. Fifteenth Annual Report of the Reclamation Service.
2. Preliminary reports resulting from investigations in cooperation with the State of Oregon on the following projects:
   Malheur and Owyhee.
   Deschutes.
   Ochoco and Crooked River.
   Harney and Silver Creek.
   Rogue River Valley and Willamette Valley.
   John Day.
   Silver Lake.
   Warner Valley and White River.
3. Hearing before the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands of the House of Representatives on April 15, 1916. This is our file copy, and I would appreciate its return at your convenience.
4. General Reclamation Circular, which contains the Federal reclamation laws for convenient reference.

Very truly, yours,

A. P. DAVIS,
Director and Chief Engineer.

Mr. MCNARY. I hope sincerely that the Members of the Senate will favor this amendment and will give it the hearty support it so richly deserves.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I understand, this amendment makes available out of the $150,000,000 appropriated $20,000,000 for irrigation purposes to carry on Government projects now under way, or to take up new projects. I am very earnestly in favor of this amendment. I think I know pretty well the possibilities of lands under irrigation. In my State we have two or three projects, and as indicating what can be done, I desire to say that the reclamation reports show that the proceeds per acre from one of the irrigation projects in my State average over $70. That was before the present abnormal prices came in. The productive capacity of reclaimed lands is extremely great, and I do not believe we could expend the money of the Government more wisely than along the lines contemplated by the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

I did not know that amendment would come up to-day, or I would have had some details and facts which I think it would be interesting to present. I am not going to take the time of the Senate further than to join with the Senator from Oregon in the hope that the Senate will agree to this amendment. I believe that it is very important as a war proposition, and that for the purpose of increasing the food production of the country we could not expend $20,000,000 more advantageously than in this way.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I dislike to oppose a proposition advanced by the Senator from Oregon, but let us face the situation just as it is. Undoubtedly there are numerous projects which could be added to this bill fully as germane as the amendment of the Senator from Oregon. I apprehend the river and harbor bill might be attached to it on the same theory, and, the first thing we know, the bill would be completely loaded down with amendments which it would be impossible to hold in conference.

The last food bill that passed the Senate was loaded down at the last moment with amendments covering nearly every conceivable subject. There was a reclamation project proposition included in that measure by way of amendment, and public-lands questions that had no place there at all. All of those matters have made it difficult, if not almost impossible, to secure any agreement amongst the conferees on that bill; and the conferees and Congress have been subjected to great criticism because of the delay on that bill.

Now, if we commence to attach propositions of this kind to this bill many other propositions will go on it, and it will simply be loaded down. Consequently I hope that we may confine this bill, as far as possible, to the purposes for which it is designed, and not permit every kind of an amendment to be attached. I say this without questioning the merits of the proposition. I hope, on the theory I have suggested, that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in his time?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to ask the Senator in regard to the first food bill to which he has referred. There was an amendment put on that bill that does not exactly relate to an irrigation project, but suspends one provision of the reclamation law relating to residence upon land during the pendency of the war. It would not cost the Government a cent, but would make it possible to have cultivated a considerable area of land for which water is actually available and in that way increase the food supply. I want to take this opportunity to express the hope that the Senate conferees may convince the House conferees that that proposition ought to be retained in the bill, for, I repeat, it will not cause the Government any expense and will result in the actual cultivation of a large area of land. I do not know whether or not the Senator can express any opinion as to that.

Mr. KENYON. I will say to the Senator that the Senate conferees are trying to secure the retention of that amendment in the bill, and I am inclined to think that they will succeed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I can not see any real valid objection to a proposition of that sort.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to submit the amendment which I send to the desk, so as to come within the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be received. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am very much interested in the matter of reclamation, more particularly from the standpoint in my State of reclamation by drainage instead of the reclamation of arid lands. I wish to state that, if it shall be declared the policy of the Senate to amend this bill by providing funds to assist in carrying along arid-land reclamation projects, I shall then ask, in behalf of a very meritorious reclamation project in my own State, that the President also be authorized to use part of the funds to assist in the reclamation of the Everglades of Florida.

I have no contention to make, nor have I any disapproval to utter, as to the policy of Congress heretofore in assisting in the reclamation of the arid lands of the West; but I do think, Mr. President, there being a vast territory, practically an empire, within my own State subject to reclamation, land that is very productive and fertile, land that could be reclaimed at a much smaller sum per acre than the arid lands of the West, that my section of the country, this vast drainage district within the State of Florida, is entitled to some of the beneficent treatment of the Government. If we are to amend this bill and authorize the expenditure of a considerable part of the sum appropriated to assist in the reclamation of the arid lands of the West, if it is the policy of the Senate to authorize such an expenditure, I shall present an amendment covering a project which I think is equally as meritorious for the consideration of the Senate and ask that a certain amount of the funds be authorized to be expended in carrying on the reclamation of the drainage project now in course of progress in Florida.

We have in that State 4,000,000 acres of very rich and productive land that could be reclaimed at a very small cost per acre, considering its value. The State and the owners of the land within the territory are pushing the work forward as rapidly as possible, but some financial assistance from the Federal Government would, of course, expedite this deserving enterprise.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Are the lands to which the Senator refers Federal lands, or are they lands belonging to the State?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The lands belong in part to private owners and in part to the State. Possibly a third of the area belongs to the State.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that the lands to which the Senator from Oregon refers are Government lands, and is there not a very clear distinction between the Government utilizing its funds for the reclamation of its own lands and using governmental funds for the reclamation of lands belonging to a State or to private individuals?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am thoroughly cognizant of that distinction, but all we wish is to be placed upon the same basis. It is the policy of the Government to advance funds for the reclamation of the arid lands and then to sell the lands upon certain installments, allowing the purchasers to refund to the Government the moneys which have been expended on the reclamation project. The cost of reclamation in the West has run from $25 even to $60 per acre. We have a vast territory of exceedingly rich land that can be reclaimed, and is being reclaimed, at an average cost of from possibly $4 to $10 an acre, and all we ask is that we have similar consideration on the part of the Government and some financial assistance—not a direct appropriation, but something in the nature of financial assistance.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to state to the Senator from Florida, if he will permit me, that there is nothing in this amendment in the way of an inhibition of the use of the money in connection with projects in any of the States, if it is governmental in character. It is the purpose of the amendment to provide for the reclamation of lands so as to bring them into a state of cultivation, and if, in the discretion of the President, a part of the fund should be applied to the project to which the Senator from Florida refers, I presume that could be done, provided it is governmental in its character.

The money derived from the sale of land on reclamation projects becomes a revolving fund and is set aside for the purpose of reclamation. I do not know anything in this amendment or in the reclamation act or in any of the acts amendatory thereof which would prevent the use of a portion of this money in Florida, in the discretion of the President, if he thinks it proper to expend it there; provided, of course, the project comes within the operation of the reclamation act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, of course this amendment refers to the law of 1902. The law of 1902 was so framed as to fit the situation in the West with reference to the arid lands in that section, but does not meet the conditions in my State. Of course we would have no hope of getting any benefit from such an amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator's permission to introduce an amendment so as to have it pending and printed. Two o'clock is the time limit under the rule for the presentation of amendments, and I should like to have the amendment I now offer introduced before that time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator from Florida will extend the same courtesy to me, I also offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendments offered by the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Nebraska will be received.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield for the purpose of offering amendments?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to make an inquiry.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I yield the floor. I have nothing further to say. I have no objection to entering upon the project to which reference has been made by the Senator from Oregon, but I wanted to bring to the notice of the Senate the fact that we have a very worthy and commendable enterprise of a similar character in Florida, except that it is a matter of reclamation by drainage instead of by irrigation. I express the hope that if it is the policy of the Senate to so amend this bill as to extend the beneficence of the Government to the projects of the West we may also have Florida included.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. LEWIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I am not going to make an address. I merely desire to make an inquiry, if the Senator will allow me. I wish to know under what provision of the unanimous-consent agreement there is found anything which requires amendments to be presented before 2 o'clock to-day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will readily ascertain from the last clause of the unanimous-consent agreement that amendments must be presented before two o'clock to-day.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise for the same purpose. I was not of the opinion that the presentation of amendments was limited to 2 o'clock, but inasmuch as they are I desire to have it understood that I have tendered an amendment striking out fuel from the provisions of the bill. Later I will amplify that on the assumption that my amendment will be treated as having been offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois offers an amendment striking out the word "fuel" from the bill wherever it happens. The amendment will be considered as pending.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HUSTING. Before the President pro tempore took the chair I reserved the right to have a separate vote on two proposed amendments. I should like to inquire whether it is necessary to present those amendments before 2 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the amendments are pending, and have not come to a vote, they will necessarily be voted on. The Chair can not otherwise answer the Senator, not knowing the circumstances of the inquiry.

Mr. HUSTING. I will state that the amendments were pending before the Senate and were disposed of as in Committee of the Whole. Now, do I understand that they are still pending, so that the reintroduction of those amendments is not necessary?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know the circumstances regarding which the Senator inquires, and can therefore not answer, but will refer him to the unanimous-consent agreement. That is the only matter which interferes in any way with the ordinary rules of the Senate.

Mr. HUSTING. In order that there may be no question about this——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Chair will permit me, I will state that after 2 o'clock, as I understand, no amendment can be submitted to the bill, except by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that that is the understanding of the present occupant of the Chair.

Mr. HUSTING. Then I offer the two amendments. I offer the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] in regard to the make-up of the board, reducing it to one. I also offer the amendment submitted by me in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole providing that the President shall have the power, by proclamation, in the event he finds it necessary, to include other commodities in this bill. I refer to this so that it may be in the RECORD; and I should like to have it understood that it is in the RECORD, and that the amendments are pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be received without prejudice.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], but in view of the fact that this bill has been offered for a specific purpose and because after long negotiations and discussions this bill, by way of compromise, was tentatively agreed upon, it seems to me that to add to it extraneous matters would jeopardize its passage. Senators, in order to reach some basis of action, waived provisions that they would like to see incorporated in the measure under consideration, and it would be unwise to open the door to general legislation, no matter how meritorious it might be.

I think one of the really great acts of statesmanship on the part of the Congress of the United States within the past 25 years was the passage of what is known as the Newlands Act, which provides for the reclamation of arid lands in the West. The Interior Department has attempted to faithfully carry into effect the beneficent provisions of this law, and one of the results is that vast tracts of arid lands have been reclaimed and have added millions of dollars in value to the wealth of States and the Nation. Upon these sterile wastes of a few years ago prosperous cities and towns have been builded and thousands of people have happy and peaceful homes. In time the Government will be repaid for the vast sums expended for reservoirs and irrigation systems. Notwithstanding what has been done by the Government, my opinion is that the best way to handle the public lands of the United States is by ceding them to the States within which they are found. It is my opinion that the record of the Federal Government in controlling and disposing of the public domain is not one that can be commended. I believe that its plan of control has been unwise, and it certainly has been exceedingly expensive. My criticism goes not to any administration but to the general plan under congressional enactment. Notwithstanding the fact that the holdings of the Government are much less than they were 15 or 20 years ago, the cost of maintaining the Interior Department and looking after the public lands, and the operations of the Government in connection with them, as I am advised, is greater now than it was then; so that with less lands it costs the Government more to look after its public possessions in the West than it ever did before. However, this must be said, the reclamation projects, the forest reserves, and the work in Alaska necessarily call for large expenditures and make a comparison of cost unfair.

When I had the honor to represent my State in the other branch of Congress I offered a bill providing a cession to the States all of the public lands within their borders; and I know that at that time distinguished Republicans and Democrats, the leaders in the House, were in favor of the passage of the measure or a similar one. My opinion is that the day will come when Congress will cede to the States the public lands within their respective borders; not only the agricultural lands, but also the mineral lands. However, there are stronger reasons for withholding a grant of the mineral lands than there is of the agricultural lands. The plan pursued by the Government in dealing with the public domain has not been satisfactory. It has proven costly to the Government and has resulted in constant friction between the Federal and the State Governments. Senators will remember that for years leasing bills or other measures have been presented affecting the public domain and the relations of the public to the same, and there has been friction and controversies between the State governments and the Federal Government with respect to the same and to the control of the public domain. The Western States feel that their growth and progress have been retarded by the paternalism of the Federal Government, and the people have opposed the rules and regulations promulgated and enforced by the Interior Department.

The whole system has been obnoxious to them; it has been bureaucratic; and resentments have been felt not only against the Government, but against the hundreds of employees of the Federal Government, who, it has been felt, have been harsh, autocratic, and unnecessarily technical and severe in the administration of the law and the rules promulgated by the department. I am making no criticism of the present administration, but speaking generally of the situation which has existed for years. There has been constant irritation and the Government has not profited by owning the land, and the growth of the States, it is felt, has been impeded.

I believe that the States can handle the public domain better than the Federal Government can handle it. The government of a State and the people within the State can in a more economical manner and in a way more in consonance with their wishes control and dispose of the public land therein. My information is that the State of Texas has handled its imperial domain far better than the Federal Government would have controlled and disposed of the millions of acres of land found within the State's border.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, as I understood it, contemplates the expenditure of a large sum of money in the development of lands that belong to the Government; but in his statement just submitted to the Senator from Florida, I understand that it goes further and would permit the employment of the money appropriated in the development of lands that belong to private individuals, or lands belonging to the State of Florida or any other State.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is no doubt but that the amendment simply turns the money over to the Reclamation Bureau. Of course, the Senator knows that under the reclamation law it would not be necessarily confined to public lands, although practically it has been so confined to a great extent.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I think the spirit of that act is that the funds shall be devoted to the reclamation of lands belonging to the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but in almost every reclamation project there is a large amount of private land, in some projects more than half private land. As I understand, it is no technical, legal objection that the land is privately owned, but the money is a revolving fund, and all comes back, of course, to the Government. This amendment of the Senator from Oregon, as I understand it, simply adds that much to the reclamation fund, and it would be applied under the law at any place where the Reclamation Bureau might see fit to use it, the same as they use the funds now controlled by them.

Mr. KING. Primarily, however, the reclamation fund was provided for the purpose of reclaiming lands belonging to the Federal Government, and I am sure that that bill never would have received the support that it did, or have been passed, if it had been proposed that any part of the fund would be devoted to the reclamation of private lands or lands owned by States. The contention was made that the Federal Government owned millions of acres of arid land which, if water were applied thereon, would become exceedingly productive and furnish homes to hundreds of thousands of home seekers in the Republic.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator states the case correctly; there is not any doubt about that; but when you come to a practical application, in laying out an irrigation project you necessarily run across a great deal of privately-owned land. I do not suppose there has been a single project where there has been nothing but Government land. It would be impossible to find such a place, perhaps, at least in any large project. So that to make it practical you would necessarily get a good deal of privately owned land. Of course, the real object was to develop the arid public lands; that is true; but in developing them you would necessarily have to develop other land that would come under the same ditch.

Mr. KING. I think the instances to which the Senator refers have occurred under circumstances like these: There have been flood waters having the same source as the low waters. The low waters were all owned and appropriated during the irrigation season by the primary water users, by those having, as we say in the West, the primary water right. The Government in some cases has entered upon those streams for the purpose of impounding the flood waters, and in order to build reservoirs and conserve the higher surplus waters for use by new settlers upon public lands it has necessarily been compelled to enter into arrangements with the owners of the primary flow in order that there should be no conflict, and both the Government and the primary owners would get what each was entitled to.

This has resulted in the Government taking control of the entire stream, both the flood and surplus waters as well as the primary flow. In so doing it has distributed to the primary holders a certain quantity of water, and the balance has been used upon lands that belonged to the Federal Government, and which the new settlers were seeking to reclaim and obtain title to. So a sort of a partnership arrangement has been made, and in some instances, as I am advised, corporations have been formed and the primary owners have conveyed their water rights to such corporations, and they have water distributed to them according to their interest in the corporation. The corporation, however, would hold only the legal title to this water in trust for the grantors.

But to come back to what I was observing. The primary object of the law was to reclaim the public domain, and to furnish homes to the courageous men and women who would enter thereon and subjugate the stubborn and arid wastes of the West, and I certainly would oppose, even in these war times, the appropriation of money out of the Federal Treasury for the purpose of reclaiming the lands of individuals, or the lands of any States within the Union. If the Government will not cede its public lands to the States, I should be glad to see it as soon as it can in a practical and proper way construct other and additional irrigation systems for the purpose of reclaiming its lands in the West; but I believe that at this time we would not be warranted in making appropriations for that purpose. Certainly nothing should be offered as an amendment that will further delay the passage of the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that his time has expired.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the most valuable thing existing beneath the folds of the American flag is a human being. The best place to develop that human being is on the farm. I would rather have one boy raised on the farm than three raised in the city. On the farm, where a man lives close to nature, with honest and salutary environment, where morals are valued more highly than money, and character is above reputation, we find the man and woman—if not the finished product—the foundations are laid for the most perfect and symmetrical characters. Then, they have not been spoiled by the social lies that warp us from the living truth, nor their characters perverted by the social wants that sin against the strength of youth.

I think the largest returns come to all the people from money expended by the Government in aiding in the establishment of homes for the citizens in the country. Therefore, any measure or appropriation intended to promote home building in the rural sections or contributing to the comfort and well-being of the rural population of this Republic commands my most cordial sympathy and support.

But I take it that this bill should not be burdened with amendments of this character. I am afraid, as was said by the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], that if this amendment should be adopted it would open a floodgate for other similar amendments. And yet, Mr. President, I am persuaded that the $20,000,000 proposed to be devoted for the reclamation of arid lands in the West would bring to the American people larger returns than any carried in this bill.

There is no doubt about the need of homes—country homes for the people of America. Upon the farm is produced the things that feed and clothe the world, and in addition to the fact that the necessaries of life are produced upon the farm, it is also the breeding place for the rugged virtues, the sterling qualities which shall save this Republic, if indeed it shall be saved at all, from the corroding greed for gold and other sordid influences that are eating out the hearts of the people in the urban districts of the land.

But for the large number of recruits that go into the cities every year from the rural districts, the population of those congested centers would deteriorate and rot in three generations. No; I insist most earnestly that money invested as this $20,000,000 is proposed to be invested would not be an extravagance, but on the contrary it would be a very wise and prudent economy.

But I do not want to delay the passage of this bill. The American people demand its immediate passage. As I have heretofore stated I think the results are going to be disappointing to the consumer and producer alike. The Utopian conditions which are promised by the proponents of the measure to follow its enactment will be, in my judgment, almost as disappointing as the sea fruit, which, instead of delighting the palate of the hungry, turns to ashes upon the lips.

But if this amendment is adopted other similar amendments will be proposed, and the original purpose of the bill may be defeated altogether.

I want to say to the able junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] that I shall be glad in the future to cooperate with him and other Senators from the West in any movement leading to the development of that great country. I want to see the latent fertilities and beneficent elements of that wonderful soil developed, which will mean much good to the American people without regard to section, because it is a fact that you can not add to the wealth of the farms in the remote West without benefit to the people of every section of this Republic.

Prosperity in the home of the agriculturist brings light and life, and hope, patriotism, strength, and virtue among all classes of people. I therefore regret that I can not vote for the amendment, not for the reason, as I stated before, that it is without merit but because I think its adoption at this time would lead to the introduction of other measures which might, if not defeat the bill, fatally impair its usefulness.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I would not want to burden this bill with anything that I thought had no connection with it, that would delay it, or that was not strictly legitimate; but the more I think about it the more I believe that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon would not have the effect either of delaying the bill or of defeating it, but, on the other hand, if it were adopted and put into the law, there would be more increased production coming from that $20,000,000 than from any other $20,000,000 in the bill. The machinery is all ready; the overhead expenses are provided for; the projects, a good many of them, are commenced; the bureau is in full working order, and the effect of this amendment, if agreed to, would simply be to increase and extend their operations at once, and what would be irrigated five years from now would be irrigated this year and next year.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator how long it would be before we could expect results from this investment? How long would it be before you would get returns?

Mr. NORRIS. I think immediately. I think on projects where, for instance, they are digging the ditch this year, next year they are going to extend it, and next year they will extend it still further; and every time they extend it, all the land under the ditch is immediately put into the crop.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator think it will affect the crop this year or next?

Mr. NORRIS. Next year; yes. These ditches would be extended further. It would simply increase, and practically at once, the cultivated land under irrigation. Again, there is this to be said in favor of it, Mr. President: The money comes back to the Government. The only thing the Government does is to be without interest on the money; that is all. It gets back every dollar again. The men who do the work, who irrigate the land, pay the Government for it. It comes back. It does not lose the money.

Senators must not get the idea, either, that this is a local proposition. The Senator from Oregon, it is true, gave some very good illustrations of what could be done with it in Oregon; but this money would go to the reclamation fund. That covers the entire United States; and if there is any land in Florida for which it could be properly utilized, the bureau would have the right to use it there without any additional legislation. It simply increases their activities.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator is mistaken in that. I think the reclamation act names the States in which it shall apply.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably it does. I think the Senator from Washington is correct about that; in fact, since he has called my attention to it, I know he is correct; but it applies to any State where there might be a reclamation project.

I presume that the bureau, having in mind the fact that the real object of this is to increase the food supply and production of the Nation as a war proposition, would use the most of it in the extension of projects that are already under way, where the effect of it could be seen almost the next day after it was used. It seems to me that since the Government does not lose anything by the operation, it could be well utilized; and, as far as I am concerned, I should like to see the amendment agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, since the discussion upon this bill has opened up so widely the policy of the Government with relation to the public lands, I want to say a few words with relation to it.

About 10 or 15 years ago there was adopted a policy of withdrawing public lands in the western part of the country, withdrawing water-power sites, coal lands, and forest lands; and while there was no power to make a permanent withdrawal, there was a law that the Secretary of the Interior could fix a price upon coal lands. Instead of fixing those prices at a reasonable figure, however, they were fixed at an exorbitant sum, at such a great figure that in recent years there has been no such thing as the taking up of coal lands in the West; and it is due very largely to that policy that this shortage in coal exists in the United States to-day. In the West it has given to those companies which have title to their coal lands a monopoly of coal production, which has resulted in high prices there. The Geological Survey has reported that in the public lands of the State of Colorado there are 371,000,000,000 tons of coal, enough to supply the entire world at the present rate of consumption for 300 years, and enough in the State of Wyoming to supply the world for 400 years. Had those lands been opened to entry, had they been put up at public auction and sold, there would have been, unquestionably, a great development in the western country in the way of coal production, and this shortage in coal would not have existed, at least to the extent that it now exists. We have always felt that that was a great grievance and a great wrong to the Western States, and we still feel it; and we hope that there will be some legislation during this Congress to relieve that condition.

Mr. President, with respect to this amendment which is offered, I wish to say that the reclamation act was passed some 15 years ago. The object, of course, was the development of lands that were practically worthless unless water could be gotten upon them. Private enterprise had taken all of the lands that were easy of reclamation, but it left many million acres of land that could be irrigated by the construction of large irrigation works. The Government has undertaken some of those, and some of those projects are not completed yet, by reason of the fact that there is not a sufficient revolving fund for the purpose of aiding the construction of these ditches and reservoirs so as to include larger areas of land.

You know that irrigated lands are exceedingly productive. Applying moisture to fertile lands when needed, under almost perpetual sunshine, always yields enormous crops. It is not an uncommon thing to raise 50 or 60 bushels of wheat to the acre upon irrigated lands, and those are the very lands that the Government ought to be most interested in developing. The fund of $150,000,000 carried in this bill is a revolving fund for the very purpose of providing foods and of increasing the growth and production thereof. Now, why can not $20,000,000 of that sum be appropriated for the purpose of putting it into governmental enterprises that are already undertaken, already built, but which have not sufficient money available to complete them? As quick as the ditches are extended, or as quick as the dam is raised a little higher, these lands will be irrigated and then will follow the raising of great crops, crops that yield enormous amounts of wheat and corn and other things. You can not have a more rapid development than that which will occur by reason of finishing these projects, by reason of bringing under cultivation these lands that are now raising nothing, thereby to that extent at least relieving the shortage in food products, and in that which we most need to win the war—namely, wheat.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is a reasonable one, and that it would add greatly to the supply of food products.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think there is a great deal of merit in the suggestion the Senator is making; and I want to ask the Senator—who has given very careful and thoughtful consideration to this bill, as he does to all public measures—if there is more money carried in the bill than will be needed; in other words, if $150,000,000 is no more money than Mr. Hoover will need to administer this bill, would it not be necessary to add to the fund if you are going to divert $20,000,000 to irrigation? Is Mr. Hoover going to have enough money left to carry out the provisions of the bill? Can the Congress afford to limit Mr. Hoover in the amount of money he needs to carry out this stupendous scheme?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it is uncertain as to what amount will be required. Nobody can tell.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It will not be uncertain as to the $20,000,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The bill is still open to amendment, and you can amend that if you think it is inadequate. It is a revolving fund. This is not an appropriation of money; it is a revolving fund; and for that reason it seems to me that it will be one of the great aids in the way of bringing food products quickly into the market and thereby relieving the condition of strain that is now upon the markets of the world.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that there is merit in this proposition; but certainly the Senate committee charged with the duty of bringing in this bill has not put in $20,000,000 more than is needed. Such carelessness in calculating the amount needed to carry out this measure would be inexcusable.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator can amend the bill by simply adding more if he desires. It is not an appropriation of money; it is simply used for the purpose of turning it over again and getting it back into the hands and Treasury of the Government.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the purpose of my colleague [Mr. McNARY] in undertaking to secure an appropriation such as is provided by his amendment for the Reclamation Service. My State would be favorably affected, beneficially affected, by the amendment if it should happen to be adopted. But, Mr. President, I feel that in this great national emergency I must look beyond the advantage that would come to my own State and to the States of the West, where they have large areas of semiarid lands, and look at the question from the national, or rather from the international, viewpoint. So looking at it, it seems to me that this bill ought not at this time to be encumbered with the question of the reclamation of arid lands.

I am satisfied, as has been said here by some of the Senators, that much good would come from the expenditure of this money in bringing under cultivation larger areas of fertile lands in the West; but I doubt very much if they could be brought under cultivation within a year, possibly not within two years, and I think the Western Senators will bear me out when I say that some reclamation projects have been pending now for a great many years and have not yet been brought to their full fruition. I am led to oppose the amendment for the reasons I have stated, as I have opposed amendments which extended the scope of this bill; but I am induced to oppose it for another reason.

On the 6th of April, 1917, I introduced in the Senate a bill known as S. 758. The same bill was introduced in the House by Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It was to increase the productive agricultural area of the United States by the reclamation of arid and swamp lands therein. This bill has been referred to the Secretary of the Interior, and has met the approval of the department. It is constructive in its nature, Mr. President, and supplements and extends the purposes of the reclamation of arid lands to the drainage of swamp lands. I believe that if Senators will look it over they will favor the enactment of this measure, and if it is enacted into law it will tend greatly to add to the agricultural area of the South as well as the West. I hope, too, that Senators will assist me in bringing that measure to early consideration.

Much as I dislike to oppose the amendment proposed by my colleague, whom I hold in the highest esteem, I think the emergency which confronts us now, the necessity for prompt food control, ought to induce us to keep out of the bill nonessentials of this kind or rather amendments which do not have direct bearing upon the subject of food control.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has just referred to a bill which he introduced in the Senate some time ago and which was also introduced in the House by a Representative from Idaho [Mr. SMITH]; and I have prepared this bill in the form of an amendment to the pending bill, which it had been my purpose to offer. After canvassing the situation, however, I came to the conclusion that my amendment, which incorporates the bill to which the Senator has referred and of which he is the author, could not be successfully presented at this time under the 10-minute rule, and possibly would be regarded as an amendment which was calculated to delay the consideration of this bill. It is a very important measure and would likely give rise to much discussion, and a canvass of the situation convinced me I could not succeed. I concluded, therefore, that while very anxious to have that bill become a law, I should not offer it at this time on this food bill.

I wish to say just a word, however, in behalf of the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. I do not see why that amendment should delay the bill at all. I do not see why it should embarrass the bill. It would not modify or change any provision now in the bill, and it would help very materially, not at once, of course, but in a few months, to supply a greater acreage for cultivation and provide greater food production in the country.

I wish to read a telegram here from a section of the country which 10 years ago was a barren waste. It was known in our State as the "desert," and it is now a very large, progressive, active community. It has been reclaimed under the arid-land laws. In my judgment, when you consider the time in which the community has been developed and the wonderful state of development it has reached, the Twin Falls country is the marvel of all the marvelous growth and development of the West. It shows how well it is to take into consideration not the things merely of a day but the permanent things which have reference to the building up of our country and to our food supply. It is dated Twin Falls, Idaho, and is as follows:

TWIN FALLS, IDAHO, June 26, 1917.

Hon. W. E. BORAH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Twin Falls County, with its strictly agricultural population of irrigation farmers, who have redeemed the land from a sagebrush desert within 10 years, have contributed to the Red Cross work $80,000, which is 32 per cent of assessment placed upon entire State. Notwithstanding the lack of adequate water upon the Salmon River segregation to the present year, the townspeople and farmers on that segregation have contributed $5,000 toward the above fund. With proper new legislation concerning district irrigation projects partially completed and new irrigation segregations in the West, with their freedom from extremes of storms, droughts, and freshets, can be depended upon to duplicate this effort and assure enormous supplies of food to our common country and its allies during this great crisis.

TWIN FALLS COMMERCIAL CLUB.

This only shows how these things in a very short time come to be indeed a sustaining part of the country, contributing food, citizenship, soldiers, and all which the country now needs.

In view of the fact that this amendment will in no wise modify or change or alter any provision of the bill and will in no wise delay its passage in any way, I do not see why we should not be making progress in taking care of the reclamation projects in our arid lands.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it will be observed that the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] is not compulsory, but is simply permissive. It enables the President in his discretion to expend from the amount hereby appropriated not to exceed the sum of $20,000,000 on reclamation projects in accordance with the provisions of the reclamation act, and so forth. So, Mr. President, if it should appear that the entire sum of $150,000,000 appropriated by the bill was required for the general purposes of the bill and all those purposes are superior in necessity to that covered by the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, the President will not be compelled to expend any part of this money for the purpose of reclamation.

It seems to me that this discretion might well be left to the President, and that it would be very wise to provide now for the extension of these areas of intensive cultivation, areas which raise enormous crops through the aid of scientific irrigation, crops involving a very much larger yield per acre than the crops of the humid region.

Mr. President, this war has prevented the serious consideration of a great constructive measure, which has been urged for many years, for the general development of our waterways, taking hold of them at their source, leading the flood waters out over the arid plains, storing these flood waters in the plains and thus preventing them from going below to the destruction of lower areas, utilizing the flood waters for water-power development, controlling them for the purpose of reclaiming arid and swamp lands, and everywhere restraining and holding them in such a way as to prevent the destructive use of the water and to promote the beneficial and compensatory use of the water, and including in this plan the scheme of river development, river navigation, and the coordination of rail transportation, river transportation, and ocean transportation in such a way as to promote the commerce of the country.

Those views were advocated by Theodore Roosevelt when he was President. They were advocated by Mr. Taft both as Secretary of War and as President, particularly as Secretary of War in an able report which was presented upon a bill which I had the honor to introduce. They have also received the substantial indorsement of four members of President Wilson's Cabinet and have received the approval of President Wilson himself. He has indicated again and again to the proper committees that his great desire is to enter upon a scheme of scientific development of our waterways.

Mr. President, war has prevented our taking up those matters seriously now, but this involves a part of that general scheme of development which can well be advanced now, because the irrigation works of the West are many of them completed, many of them are requiring additional sums immediately to open up areas that are capable of very high production, and it seems to me that we can well partially aid the general scheme of river development and at the same time meet the demand which this bill is intended to meet.

I urge, therefore, upon the Senate that inasmuch as this amendment is simply permissive and not compulsory, it may well grant the President this power.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. MCNARY. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Because of the general pair I have with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before. I vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not voted, and because I have a general pair with that Senator I am going to ask the privilege to withdraw my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 42, as follows:

YEAS—29.

So Mr. MCNARY's amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. I send to the desk the following amendment relating to the subject of coal and ask for its adoption at the end of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill new sections, as follows:

SEC. —. That it is necessary and proper, in order to execute the powers of Congress to raise and support armies, provide and maintain the Navy, and properly and efficiently provide for the common defense, that the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever, in his judgment, necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of sale, transportation, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission, during the war and for a period of one year thereafter, or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

SEC. —. That if, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations, or to conduct his business efficiently under the regulations and control of the President as aforesaid, or conducts it in a manner prejudicial to the public interest, then the President is hereby authorized and empowered in every such case to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances thereof belonging to such producer or dealer as a going concern, and to operate or cause the same to be operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct during the period of the war and one year thereafter, or for such part of said time as, in his judgment, may be necessary.

While operating or causing to be operated any such plants or business, the President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same: Provided, That whenever any person or persons entitled to receive such wages are dissatisfied with the rate of wages so fixed by the President, he or they shall have the right to have the reasonableness of such wages reviewed and determined by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the act approved July 15, 1913, and the findings of said board fixing the rate of wages shall be conclusive in the premises, and said board shall prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this proviso into effect.

SEC. —. That if the prices so fixed, or if, in the case of the taking over or requisitioning of the mines or business of any such producer or dealer, the compensation or damages fixed be not satisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall be paid the amount prescribed by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such other sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

SEC. —. That any producer or dealer whose plant, business, and appurtenances shall have been requisitioned or taken over by the President shall be paid a fair and reasonable compensation for the use thereof or for damages incurred thereby during the period that the same may be requisitioned or taken over as aforesaid, which compensation and damages the President shall fix or cause to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission or such other agent or agencies as he may designate.

SEC. —. Or if the President of the United States shall be of the opinion that he can hereby better provide for the common defense, and whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, then he is hereby authorized and empowered to require any or all producers of coal and coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their products only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke, and the prices thereof, and to fix the compensation to be paid such producers by the United States, and to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the methods of production, transportation, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic or foreign, and to make payment of the purchase price thereof to the producers thereof, or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment.

That within 15 days after notice from the agencies so designated to any producer of coal and coke that his or its output is to be so purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described, such producer shall cease shipments of said product upon his own account and shall transmit to such agency all orders received and unfilled or partially unfilled, showing the exact extent to which shipments have been made therein, and thereafter all shipments shall be made only on authority of the agency designated by the President, and thereafter no such producer shall sell any of said products except to the United States through such agency, and the said agency alone is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase during the continuance of the requirement the output of such producers.

That the prices to be paid for such products so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit over and above the cost of production, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profits and cost of production to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission, and if the prices fixed by the said commission of any such product purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described be unsatisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall have the right to sue the United States in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code, to recover such other sum as added to the amount so fixed will be just compensation. All such products so sold to the United States shall be sold by the United States as such uniform prices, quality considered, as may be practicable and as may be determined by said agency to be just and fair.

Any moneys received by the United States for the sale of any such coal and coke, may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any moneys not so used shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. —. Then, when directed by the President, the Federal Trade Commission is hereby required to proceed immediately with all possible dispatch to make full inquiry, giving such notice as it may deem practicable, into the cost of producing under reasonably efficient management at the various places of production the following commodities, to wit: Coal and coke.

The books, correspondence, records, and papers in any way referring to transactions of any kind relating to the mining, production, sale, or distribution of all mine operators or other persons whose coal and coke have or may become subject to this section, and the books, correspondence, records, and papers of any person applying for the purchase of coal and coke from the United States shall at all times be subject to inspection by the said agency, and such person or persons shall promptly furnish said agency any data or information relating to the business of such person or persons which said agency may call for, and said agency is hereby authorized to procure the information in reference to the business of such coal-mine operators and producers of coke and customers therefor in the manner provided for in sections 6 and 9 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," and said agency is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by said act for the carrying out of the purposes of this section.

Having completed its inquiry respecting any commodity in any locality it shall, if the President has decided to fix the prices at which any such commodity shall be sold by producers and dealers generally, fix and publish maximum prices for both producers of and dealers in any such commodity, which maximum prices shall be observed by all producers and dealers until further action thereon is taken by the commission.

In fixing maximum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

In fixing such prices for dealers, the commission shall allow the cost to the dealer and shall add thereto a just and reasonable sum for his services in the transaction. There shall be but one such dealer between the producer and consumer or user.

The maximum prices so fixed and published shall not be construed as invalidating any contract in which prices are fixed, made in good faith, prior to the establishment and publication of maximum prices by the commission.

Whoever shall, with knowledge that the prices of any such commodity have been so fixed by the commission ask, demand, or receive a higher price in violation of this section, shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years, or both. Each independent transaction shall constitute a separate offense.

Nothing in this section shall be construed as restricting or modifying in any manner the right the Government of the United States may have in its own behalf or in behalf of any other Government at war with Germany to purchase, requisition, or take over any such commodities for the equipment, maintenance, or support of armed forces at any price or upon any terms that may be agreed upon or otherwise lawfully determined.

Mr. POMERENE. Senators will observe that when the bill was first prepared in its present form it applied to coal, coke, petroleum, and their products. On further reflection those who were responsible for it have stricken out petroleum and its products so as to limit the provisions of the amendment to coal and coke.

I also desire to call the attention of the Senate to line 22, on page 7. By an error the word "minimum" was used instead of the word "maximum." I ask that that be corrected accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Without objection, that correction will be made.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. KNOX. Before the Senator proceeds, will he inform the Senate why petroleum and its products was stricken out?

Mr. POMERENE. For this reason: The bill thus far adopted applies to kerosene and gasoline. The word "products" was broader even than we intended, because it would include perhaps dyestuffs and various chemicals and drugs which are manufactured from petroleum.

Mr. KNOX. Do I understand that you are not moving to strike out "products," but are striking out "petroleum"?

Mr. POMERENE. The word "products" is stricken out. I am striking petroleum out because kerosene and gasoline are provided for in that part of the bill already adopted.

Mr. KNOX. Is not coal also provided for in the same way in the part of the bill already adopted?

Mr. POMERENE. That is true, but we have thought that as coal and coke were so nearly alike and the method of production of the two was so intimately associated they could perhaps be controlled by the one board provided for here much more readily than to have the whole subject cared for and administered by the commission which is created in the original part of the bill. Perhaps our judgment is wrong about it, but that is a matter which the Senate can determine later on.

Mr. KNOX. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that coal is as effectually covered in the bill we are about to pass as petroleum is?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I do not think it is as effectually provided for there. That is just the reason why it seems to me that the control of the production and the price of coal and coke can be so much more easily provided for in the amendment I propose. We feel that the method proposed here will better serve the cause of the country.

Mr. KNOX. I will not take any further time of the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I desire briefly to make an explanation, and I may say this: It is my purpose, if this amendment shall be adopted, to then ask, by such parliamentary procedure as may be proper, the elimination of coal and coke from the provisions of the bill which have already been adopted.

It will occur to Senators, I think, that the subject of coal and coke can be very much more readily administered than can the subject of food, for the reason, briefly, that there is no limit to the amount of coal and coke which can be produced. We know that the quantity is unlimited. There is no uncertainty about its production, save and except the will of man and the amount of labor.

I have shown in a former speech the excessive prices which have been charged for coal and coke throughout the country. My belief is that if the prices of coal and coke can be fixed by the Government the operators will be glad to comply with those prices and the regulations which may be adopted. We have provided in this bill that the President shall have the right to determine the price of coal through the Federal Trade Commission, and also to regulate the method of sale, transportation, apportionment, and storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic and foreign. Then if, after notice, the producers of the country fail or refuse to comply with these prices and regulations, the President will have the right to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances belonging to any such producer or dealer who may have failed to comply with these prices and regulations.

Then, without going into the details of it, there is another plan in the alternative, which is contained in section 5, on page 4. In brief, it provides that the President may, in his judgment——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have understood that there was a unanimous-consent agreement at 3 o'clock to take up the amendment to section 12. Three o'clock having arrived, if that unanimous-consent agreement was entered into, it is the matter that is now properly before the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I must say, while I presume the unanimous-consent agreement was not formally entered into, that was the understanding; and if the Senator from North Dakota insists upon that point, I shall yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall insist upon it if it was the understanding.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that I have just seen the printing clerk, who went down to the Printing Office personally to have the printing attended to, and he informs me that he expects the amendments to arrive in a few moments, but they have not yet been returned. The amendments will be here in a little while, however.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then it is understood that we shall continue the consideration of the present amendment?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no desire to interfere with any understanding that the Senate may have entered into.

We have provided, as an alternative method of procedure, that the President may, whenever in his judgment it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to require any and all producers of coal and coke in any special area or in the country at large to sell these products to the agency to be created by the President. In that way it is thought that not only the price but the distribution of coal can be arranged for so as very materially to improve our industrial and transportation conditions and more readily meet the requirements of our people.

Mr. President, I think this method is very much more desirable than that already provided for in the committee bill, because, in the first place, a Federal Trade Commission, which would be the agent to fix these prices if this amendment is adopted, has already gone into the subject very fully, both so far as it applies to the anthracite region and to the bituminous region.

The questions connected with this food supply are going to be necessarily very involved and complicated, and they will tax the ability of the ablest men who can be named for that commission. Mr. Hoover, who has been considered in connection with that commission or with the food administration, has, as I understand, given almost his entire thought and study to that one particular subject. My belief is that when it comes to the question of coal and coke, the prices can be fixed by this Federal agency and the administration of the production and distribution of food can either be arranged for by that agency or by some other agency to be designated by the President, and the people will thereby be much better served.

I feel that it is necessary that we should take pretty drastic action with these necessaries of comfort and of industrial life. I have pointed out the fact heretofore that the price of coal had been doubled, trebled, quadrupled, and even quintupled. The price of coke has likewise advanced.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. I can not go into these details. I am sorry that I have not more time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want the attention of the Senator from Ohio to two provisions in his amendment. The first provision is found on page 5, line 11, and is as follows:

> That the prices to be paid for such products so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit over and above the cost of production, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profits and cost of production to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission—

Why did the Senator see fit to put such a proposition as that in this bill relating to the purchase of coal for the United States? But a few minutes ago the Senator from Ohio voted against exactly the same kind of a proposition, a proposition meaning exactly the same thing, when it was applied to the farmer's products. There are a great many farmers in the State of Ohio; they produce wheat and oats and barley and other grain and food products. Why, I ask the Senator, is it necessary to so carefully guard your coal operators to see that they have fair and just compensation, to allow them all of the labor charges and all of the other charges that are usual in making up the cost of production, while you deny those things to the farmers of the State of Ohio?

Mr. POMERENE rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then let us turn over another page or two, and we find that on page 7 the Senator has again carefully guarded the interest of the coal dealers in this language:

> In fixing minimum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

That is exactly the rule that I asked to have applied in fixing the value of the products of the farmers of the State of Ohio and of the State of North Dakota. Can anyone give any good reason for applying a certain rule, which so carefully guards the interests of the coal operator in the State of Ohio, and then the Senator by his vote declaring that no such protection whatever shall be given to the farmer in the State of Ohio?

This has nothing whatever to do with the minimum-price proposition, which may come up in another phase of the bill. It is a question where the Government itself becomes the purchaser, where the Government exercises its right of requisition; and where the Government exercises that right, you very carefully guard the interests of your coal operator, while, with the same care, you determine that the farmer who produces food cereals shall not have thrown around him this protection.

Mr. POMERENE. Has the Senator from North Dakota finished?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; but if the Senator from Ohio wishes to answer in my time now, he can do so. If not, I shall go on. I have not got half through, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was not aware that there was anything in this matter that should so excite the irritability of my good friend, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is in part responsible for these provisions, and I am in part responsible for them. I recognize the fact that when it comes to determining the cost of coal, and so forth, there are many things to be considered, as, for instance, depletion, and so forth. We have not provided for the fixing of a minimum price at all in this bill. So far as coal is concerned, we have provided for a maximum price. We expect to protect the consumers when it comes to fixing the price of coal.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Ohio will recall that the Senator from Iowa was consistent, because he voted for the same rule in reference to the farmer.

Mr. POMERENE. I have understood that the provisions of the bill relating to foodstuffs were sufficient to take care of the farmer. The Senator from North Dakota may be assured that I have no secrets from the farmers of Ohio. I am always ready to answer to them for any mistakes I may make. If I have made any mistake in this matter, I am willing to correct it, if they are not protected in this behalf. The farmers are certainly very well provided for when we fix a minimum price for their wheat, and so forth. I assume it is going to be a reasonable price. It may be that I have made a mistake in that behalf; if so, my apologies are due to the lofty-minded Senator from North Dakota, who never makes any mistakes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think apologies are due, Mr. President, not to the Senator from North Dakota, but they are due to the farmers of the State of North Dakota.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I am not a political farmer.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator probably may find some doubt here on that proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, if there is, and the matter is called to my attention, I can retrace my steps, as I have often retraced them. It may be that after I have drunk in wisdom at the feet of the Senator from North Dakota for a few more years my errors may be corrected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, I think by the time that the Senator has absorbed from the Senator from North Dakota a sense of justice—not wisdom—toward the farming element of the State of North Dakota, and even of the State of Ohio, he will not vote to put in the bill one provision for protecting the coal barons of his State and then vote against a provision for taking care of the farmers of the same State.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not yield further now, Mr. President.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator from North Dakota is disposed to put a wrong construction upon what I have done, I can not help it. I am always ready to answer to the voters of my own State. I always have answered to them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we all do that; and we can do it without boasting of it. The Senator says that he has no provision in the amendment for a minimum price on coal. I ask the Senator what he means, then, on page 7, line 22, where it is provided that—

> In fixing minimum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

That deals, Mr. President, with a minimum price, not a maximum price.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not desire to yield all of my time.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from North Dakota has been so bitter and vitriolic that he failed to notice the fact that after the amendment was read I said the word "minimum" was a misprint and asked to have it changed to "maximum," and the Senate permitted it to be so changed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, Mr. President, it may be that I feel a little vitriolic. I confess I do feel that a great injustice has been done the farming element of this country in treating them as though they were not entitled to the same rights and consideration in connection with their products as are granted to those in every other line of business in the United States. It is absolutely true that by a majority vote of the Senate we have deprived the farmer of such right, and then there is placed in another portion of the bill the same rule that we refuse to apply to the sections relating to farming.

Mr. LEWIS and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rather regret that the very suggestion of coal should have imparted such heat to the boilers of the two distinguished Senators that their blood should have run riot with such warmth. [Laughter.] Inasmuch, however, as the provisions of this bill might be construed to comprehend ice, there may be a chance to apply a cooling process for the moment, and return to one consideration which, I think, it is very necessary from my point of view that we indulge.

Mr. President, I am sure the eminent Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], whose solicitude in behalf of the farmer is always the subject of admiration, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], whose industry in the matter of the coal investigation, following his desire to ameliorate conditions so inexcusable, can find approval from this body without regard to any difference these eminent Senators may have as to ways and means; but, Mr. President, I am moved to give my support to the Senator from Ohio respecting his independent proposition for dealing with the coal situation for this reason: I think, Senators, we are making an error—with great respect for all who differ from me in that view, I make the assertion—when we put in this bill fuel. This is a food-control bill. We have tendered enough projects here to convert it into not a food bill but a fool bill; and, unless we shall be guardful, we will destroy this bill and, as I see it, destroy the objects which the bill was framed to effect.

Mr. President and Senators, I take it that we have been considering the qualifications of a certain gentleman whose name has been frequently mentioned here as food administrator. Mr. Hoover has been referred to; some advocating him as eminently fit; others opposing him as not being qualified for the superior task; but, Mr. President, when the time comes to name whoever shall be named, that administration must be conducted by one having the qualifications of a food administrator. The suggestion is that one of these administrators shall be a farmer for the protection of agriculture; but when we come to fuel, Senators, I am impressed with this view: That it partakes of a situation wholly apart from the question of food, the growing of it by the farmer, and the distribution of it by the food administrator. When we consider fuel, the public lands of the Government must be taken into consideration, the mining of coal, the bringing forth of oil, the distribution of them, the retail price for them; and all of that, Mr. President, I am thinking, sir, should constitute a separate subject and should be handled by a separate tribunal. They ought not to be taken out of the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Interior, in so far as the jurisdiction of coal mining upon public lands or the distribution of that coal to the Government, or oil, sir, from the public lands, and the distribution of that oil to the Government for fuel, where its fuel necessities are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Illinois think that the question of our fuel supplies is of such transcendent importance that any remedy which may be perfected now ought to be employed? I dislike very much to think that this question will be eliminated from the present bill, and then take its usual course, without any unanimous consent, and perhaps at a time when there may not be as keen an interest as there is at the present moment. We in the Northwest, as the Senator knows, are very dependent upon a proper supply of coal; and, if I had my way about it, I would exempt every man who works in a coal mine from the draft and allow him to perform that service in the mine, where he can be of more use to the country than he would be in the field.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I may shock my able friend from Michigan by telling him that, so far as I am concerned, I have after great deliberation come to the conclusion that the coal mines of America must be taken in charge by the Federal Government and administered as a public utility, the mining to be operated under the supervision of the Government, and the same as to oil. I agree with the Senator heartily in saying that if something can be done to regulate and ameliorate the conditions of hardship suffered by the whole community, such should be done. But the point I wish to make now, sir, is that, as I see it, if we leave fuel in this bill to be administered by a food administrator, we will have it administered by those who have no personal knowledge of it whatever, who have no qualifications for settling its difficulties, or giving a solution to present problems.

I am in favor of leaving the coal matter to a separate tribunal, and settle it right now in any form any Senator may suggest. The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio meets my approval. Add it to this bill, if you please, as an amendment, and let it be administered by those who know the fuel situation, who have some qualifications, who are familiar with coal and oil production, and not have it so confused as to destroy naturally its operation and benefit by putting it in the hands of those who apparently will be consumed and monopolized with nothing but the question of food. For that reason, sir, I give my support to the independent proposition of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is quite obvious that an adequate discussion of this subject can not be had in 10 minutes. It is the most important phase, I think, of the regulation which is now asked at the hands of the Government. The bill before us is intended, I assume, to do two things: First, to encourage and stimulate the production of certain commodities which are esteemed to be necessary; second, to see that the producer of those necessaries has a fair price for his labor in producing them, and that the consumer of the product shall not be required to pay an excessive price on account of undue profits which attach to the products on their way from the producer to the consumer. I am in perfect sympathy with these objects in the bill. I am not persuaded that in all respects the bill adopts the most effective remedy to cure the evils which have afflicted us or to bring about the beneficent and desirable objects which we all seek to accomplish.

I do not intend to speak now of food, except to say that if I had my way about it I would apply exactly the same remedy to wheat that I seek to apply in this amendment to coal. I believe that the Government of the United States ought to become the purchaser of every bushel of wheat which is raised this year or which will be raised next year, and I think it ought to pay for the wheat and ought to give the farmer the assurance that it will pay a fair and reasonable price for it. I believe that the rule announced by the Senator from North Dakota in his amendment is simply the rule of justice, as it is the rule of law whenever the Government attempts to exercise its power to take property of this character.

I have not, however, sought to change the form of the bill with regard to food products; but the Committee on Interstate Commerce has been now for more than three weeks engaged in an investigation relating to the production and distribution of coal. I have not the time—I wish I had—to recite the evidence that has been developed in the investigation. It is sufficient to say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio grows out of that investigation and is the deliberate outcome of the study which certain members of the committee have given to the general subject. I believe it will accomplish the purpose which we all have in view. I do not believe that the bill as it now is will accomplish the purpose.

The object of section 5 of the bill—and it is the only section which will afford any relief whatever—is to authorize the President to license coal operators throughout the country and to allow them to proceed with their business, and if he finds that the profit which any particular mine is earning is too great, then upon review he may substitute some other profit for that particular mine, and the operator must observe the order or mandate of the President.

Senators, that will not meet the exigency of this situation. If we do not very promptly seize it, a portion of the United States will be without coal during the coming winter, and a great many of our people will suffer the tortures of a cold climate without fuel. At this moment there are, as I am informed, upon the docks at the head of the Lakes about 350,000 tons of coal intended to supply the great Northwest, whereas last year at this time there were 3,500,000 tons of coal in that vicinity; and if we do not get, before lake navigation closes, a very large supply of coal in the northwest part of the country both the railroads and the people will suffer most seriously.

I live in a town in the very heart of a coal-producing region, and such was the situation last winter that the city council of Des Moines was compelled to go into the railway yards and seize, without warrant of law, cars of coal in order to prevent the people of that community from freezing to death. That experience will be witnessed all over this country during the coming winter unless prompt and effective measures are taken for the production and the distribution of coal.

Addressing myself for only a moment to the amendment of which I am in part the author—for this is a compound of two proposals—it contemplates that the United States shall become the owner of all the coal mined, and that it shall pay to the coal operators a fair and reasonable price for it, including the cost of production, maintenance, operation, depletion, and depreciation; that then the United States shall resell the coal, shall determine where the coal shall go, to whom it shall go, and the prices at which it shall be sold

Senators, it is absolutely impossible to fix the price of coal at the mine and secure any relief without pursuing the coal to the ultimate consumer. You can not destroy the laws of business without substituting the Government itself as a factor in the problem and without making the Government itself the distributor of the coal. It is not a radical proposition; it is vastly simpler in its operation than the effort to fix the price of coal—I mean by that, fixing the prices in the way of a regulation. It will enable the Government to do what business now does—to supply competing industries with coal at the same price, even though the cost of production of two mines which may supply these industries is different.

I may say that I have no right to claim credit for this proposal. It is the proposal of the Federal Trade Commission, or a majority of the commission. It is the thoughtful result of the labors of a man who, I believe, knows more about the subject than any other man in the country and who has no purpose to serve except the general welfare. The Federal Trade Commission has been for months engaged in an investigation, and it has now more information than any other board, any other commission, or any other man could accumulate in months to come. It is simply the height of absurdity to take from that commission the administration of this remedy and assign it to some one, however capable, who has not given attention to it and who does not claim to know anything whatsoever about it.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted. I hope that we will at least give the President the discretion of employing the method prescribed in the bill now or the method which is prescribed in the amendment.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, the difficulty that I see about this amendment is that it is importing into this bill a matter of vast consequence upon which we are called to act with very little information and with very little time for consideration and discussion.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has just said that the Federal Trade Commission is in a sense the author of this amendment, and that it is the result of laborious and continuous and minute examinations and investigations. Certainly those investigations and examinations and their results should be laid before us before we can act intelligently upon a matter of such grave consequence.

I wish to say, however, in passing, as the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has been referred to several times in this discussion, that I should like to explain my vote against that amendment. It was not because I did not think that all of the elements named in his amendment should be considered in fixing prices to the farmer, but because I thought, as a matter of law, they were necessarily to be taken into consideration before prices could be fixed, and because I recalled that other principle of law that the fixing of the elements of damage, the rules by which damage shall be ascertained, is not a legislative but a judicial question, and I feared that if we undertook to legislate upon the subject our legislation might be void.

Mr. President, whatever may be the difficulties and the evils and the hardships that exist in the coal situation—and they are many—they arise from one of two causes. They arise either from the fault of the coal operators themselves or they arise from reasons over which they have no control. If they arise from the fault of the coal operators, it seems to me that this bill as it has been perfected up to the present time completely covers every possible fault of which they could be guilty, and makes them guilty of crime, for which they may be punished by fine and imprisonment, because by section 4 of this bill not only do you make it a criminal offense to hoard coal, to raise the value of coal artificially, to try to create artificial conditions, to withhold an ample supply, or in any way whatever to artificially control the markets for coal, but, in addition to that, you vest in the hands of the President of the United States the power to issue a license to them prescribing the conditions under which they can do business. Now, Mr. President, is it possible to conceive any willful fault upon the part of the coal operators that would bring about any hardship to the consumer that is not reached by the provisions of this bill?

Mr. President, if present conditions are not faults of the operators, then the question arises, Should this particular business be selected out and put on a different basis from any other business? As this amendment was originally proposed it applied not only to coal but to petroleum. When I asked the Senator from Ohio why petroleum was withdrawn from the amendment, the reply was, because petroleum was dealt with in the other portion of the bill. Coal is dealt with in the other portions of the bill in exactly the same terms in which we deal with petroleum.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KNOX. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. Suppose that the coal operators simply decline to operate or to produce. Suppose they say, "These prices are not satisfactory to us, and we will not produce." How would the Senator handle that situation under the provisions of the general bill?

Mr. KNOX. I would prosecute such an operator under the fourth section of the bill, which distinctly contains a provision prohibiting artificial diminution of the supply of coal.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator think that would cover a case of nonproduction or failure to produce?

Mr. KNOX. I absolutely think so. I will read that section of the bill if I have the time.

Mr. WATSON. That is to say, does the Senator think that under the provisions of section 4 you can compel a man to produce?

Mr. KNOX. I say that under the provisions of section 4 you can punish him for restricting the distribution of any necessaries or willfully preventing, limiting, or arresting the manufacture or production of the same. If a man willfully restricts the production or willfully refuses to produce, he is liable to be punished under the provisions of this act.

Mr. WATSON. Suppose that a farmer declines to produce?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I decline to yield further, because I have only a few minutes. The Senator from Indiana will have the same opportunity to address the Senate that I have myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield further.

Mr. KNOX. I have only this word to add to what I have already said, that by the fourth section of this bill the same rule is applied to the coal operators that is applied to any other producer of necessities.

Now I come to the question as to how far the coal operators themselves are not responsible for the conditions that exist. Upon this question I have not the time to enter; but I received this morning from a very intelligent coal operator a letter, which I should like to have placed in the RECORD, so that such Senators as may be interested in the question as to how far the operators themselves are suffering for lack of transportation and other reasons over which they have no control may be enlightened.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PITTSBURGH COAL PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION,
Pittsburgh, Pa., July 18, 1917.

Hon. PHILANDER CHASE KNOX,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Legislation proposed in the Senate affecting the coal-mining industry in this State and the Nation is causing operators of the Pittsburgh district and their customers serious concern. We are asking no special favors nor any special treatment. We do desire, however, that Congress shall act in the light of accurate information.

I shall not enlarge upon the conditions causing the complaint. You are doubtless familiar with the difficulty consumers have had in obtaining coal and with the fact that prices have been unduly high. In considering remedies for these conditions it is important to understand their causes and to fit the treatment to the ailment. You have doubtless heard it charged that high prices have been caused by concerted action on the part of coal operators, in violation of the law. Your own understanding will assign due weight to these unfounded and unjust allegations when you consider that the United States Department of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission, and dozens of State, municipal, and county official and grand juries have been constantly inquiring into all the activities of every organization in the business, have examined the correspondence, the sales books, and the records of scores of coal companies, and that the entire business of the coal industry has been conducted for months under the searching scrutiny of all the agencies for the enforcement of the State and Federal antitrust laws.

Briefly, the real causes for the trouble are as follows: Extraordinary industrial demand for coal has coincided with a shortage of available transportation and consumers have bid against each other in a scramble to obtain coal. Such action under such conditions produced the logical effect on prices. This country is asking this year some 50,000,000 tons more of coal than ever before. The United States Geological Survey and the Federal Trade Commission state that the mines can readily produce two or three times that much additional coal over and above the production of 1916 if they have sufficient railroad cars. Railroad cars are essential to steady mine operation, because bituminous coal is not stored at the mines, and hence the mines are unable to run unless they can dump their output constantly into waiting railroad cars. Moreover, storage of coal at the mines is not desired, because such storage ought to be made at the places of consumption so that stored supplies can be drawn on promptly and surely when and as needed.

The mines in the Pittsburgh district alone can ship nearly 1,000,000 tons more of coal each month if they have adequate transportation. The mines here and throughout the country generally have not at any time since last October had sufficient railroad cars to ship the coal which consumers were demanding. The mines in this association, which are only a portion of those in the Pittsburgh district, have a capacity for the current year of 34,200,000 tons of coal, provided they have sufficient cars in which to ship this coal. Contracts with customers dependent on these mines for their coal supplies call for the shipment of approximately 27,000,000 tons during this year, leaving more than 7,000,000 tons which should be available for additional demands. To date, however, solely because of the lack of transportation, production and shipments from our mines have been running at the rate of less than 24,000,000 tons for the year, which is typical of the general conditions. You will understand the results of such conditions too readily to require extended exposition.

It is true that the railroads have moved more coal during the first six months of this year than in a similar period during the preceding year, but the country needed even more coal than they moved. This coal was not supplied simply and solely because the railroads could not move it from the mines. While that condition has improved somewhat, the mines in this important producing region and in many others are still operating at only 70 to 75 per cent capacity because of a lack of sufficient railroad cars. This means that the mines are necessarily idle one or two days each week at a time when the country is clamoring for coal.

As we see it, this is the essential fact in the coal problem: Unless sufficient cars are furnished to permit the mines from their abundant reserve capacity to supply the coal which the Nation needs, factories must inevitably be closed next winter, and people will suffer simply because at the time the coal is needed it will be in the mines instead of in Boston, Springfield, New York, Cleveland, Duluth, Minneapolis, and other places of consumption. No amount of price fixing or regulation or commandeering of mines will change that situation in the slightest particular unless transportation is available to haul the coal required to the points where it is needed. This is the carefully considered conclusion of the Federal Trade Commission as given in its official report to the Senate on the bituminous-coal industry and as amplified and emphasized in Commissioner Colver's testimony on this subject before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Since transportation is obviously the key to the solution of this problem, it is desirable to understand what is being done to improve transportation. You are doubtless familiar with the efforts being made by the railroads themselves. In addition, the recent car-shortage amendment to the interstate-commerce law gives ample authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to stop the transportation abuses and inefficiencies which are primarily responsible for the transportation troubles. The commission is now taking this matter in hand and has organized a new division to administer the authority conferred by this amendment. We are satisfied that the commission, with the assistance of the railroads, will find means to assure the shipment of all the coal which the country is demanding. If the Senate doubts this, permit me to suggest that it should direct the Interstate Commerce Commission, by resolution, to see that the coal mines are given sufficient transportation to supply the country with coal.

If adequate transportation is furnished the mines, it is a plain conclusion that coal prices will return to normal levels, because no buyer will pay exorbitant prices when he can obtain supplies from a dozen different sellers all eager to dispose of their production. As we see it, this is the real remedy for the present coal problem of the Nation, because at one stroke it will furnish the tonnage of coal required and at the same time will reduce prices naturally and without any arbitrary and disturbing interference with the usual business procedure. On the other hand, Government price fixing and regulation can not add one pound to the production, but are almost certain to reduce the output, complicate the distribution of coal, make it difficult for the consumer to obtain the particular kind which his business especially requires, and lead to dangerous disorganization. Tying this industry up with red tape can cause irretrievable disaster.

Coal operators recognize the fact that until the transportation shortage is remedied some control of prices in the interest of the consumer may be necessary. They have already voluntarily accepted the suggestion of Secretary Lane to reduce prices and are observing the prices be fixed pending fuller investigation. They will observe any others that he suggests later. Not another industry in the country has gone so far as this. Through Secretary Lane, the Federal Trade Commission, and the committee on coal production effective temporary control of coal prices can thus be exercised to protect the consumer until adequate transportation renders such control no longer necessary.

For these reasons we hope that Congress will give the Interstate Commerce Commission time to exercise the broad authority which has been conferred upon it for the express purpose of solving just such problems as the coal business presents, and will not, before the commission can even begin its remedial action, add to the difficulties of the coal industry by ill-advised, revolutionary legislation except as a last resort should the efforts of the Interstate Commerce Commission prove unavailing.

Please understand that we do not in any way oppose the efficient organization of industry in this Nation for the successful conduct of the war, but we are genuinely concerned for fear that through failure to understand the real crux of the coal situation Congress may enact hasty legislation which will precipitate a grave coal crisis next winter that should never occur. The causes of the trouble have been clearly pointed out by agencies of the Government commissioned to discover them. Ample authority has been given other Government agencies to remove these causes. We trust, therefore, that the Senate will not disorganize this industry by hastily enacting the legislation proposed.

The fear of such disorganization is already alarming many of our customers. As you know, great industrial enterprises dependent on coal mines in this district have contracted with Pittsburgh coal operators for their coal supplies. The operation of their power plants and of their factories depends upon obtaining the kind and quantity of coal called for in these contracts. But if the entire output of our mines is to be purchased and sold by the Government, as provided for in the legislation now pending, these manufacturers are left with no assurance whatever as to the quantity or kind of coal which they may be able to obtain. The consequences of such disruption of settled arrangements for fuel supply should be too obvious to require discussion.

We are placing these facts before you because we believe the Senate should wait to legislate upon this subject until the competent agencies of the Government duly authorized to solve the coal problem satisfactorily to all parties concerned have completed their efforts.

Very truly, yours,

J. D. A. MORROW, Commissioner.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that the people of the country ought to know just what are the causes of the shortage and the extreme prices of coal.

There are at least three causes for the unfortunate condition in which we find ourselves at the present time. The first and foremost of those causes is the shortage of available transportation; the second is, through that shortage of available transportation, an unusual scramble for the coal that can be delivered to the users of coal in the United States; and, third, there is a shortage of labor.

I was talking the other day to a gentleman who has been in the coal business for at least 30 years, not merely in one of the coal districts of the United States but in many of them, and he told me that the labor situation was such that it was impossible, in his opinion, to furnish the necessary coal the coming winter. He said that when the war in Europe first broke out, 40 per cent of all the employees working in the coal mines operated by him were taken out of his employment. They were foreigners and left for Europe to enter the war. Then, when the eight-hour law was passed, it reduced his production some 12 per cent more. He wound up by saying, "God only knows, when the draft for men takes place in this country, where I am going to get employees in sufficient numbers to work the coal mines to produce coal sufficient to meet the demands."

I have here a letter from Mr. J. D. A. Morrow, commissioner of the Pittsburgh Coal Producers' Association, of Pittsburgh, outlining in detail the coal situation to-day, and speaking of the shortage of available transportation. Mr. Morrow says:

Briefly, the real causes for the trouble are as follows: Extraordinary industrial demand for coal has coincided with a shortage of available transportation, and consumers have bid against each other in a scramble to obtain coal. Such action under such conditions produced the logical effect on prices. This country is asking this year some 50,000,000 tons more of coal than ever before. The United States Geological Survey and the Federal Trade Commission state that the mines can readily produce two or three times that much additional coal over and above the production of 1916 if they have sufficient railroad cars. Railroad cars are essential to steady mine operation, because bituminous coal is not stored at the mines, and hence the mines are unable to run unless they can dump their output constantly into waiting railroad cars. Moreover, storage of coal at the mines is not desired, because such storage ought to be made at the places of consumption so that stored supplies can be drawn on promptly and surely when and as needed.

Mr. Morrow calls attention to the fact that the mines in the Pittsburgh district are not working full time even under present conditions, because of the fact that it is impossible to secure transportation for the coal to the factories and to the customers desiring coal even at this time of the year. In other words, he calls attention to the amount that is being produced, the amount that could be produced, and the amount that they would like to produce if they could possibly secure transportation for the coal. Mr. President, it seems to me that the thing Congress should do is to provide some means to transport the coal that can be produced, and when that is done I think the problem will be solved. It is not because there is not enough coal in the United States; it is not because the owners of the coal mines would not like to produce all the coal that is wanted, not only for this country but for foreign countries as well. If you take the reports of the Geological Survey and study them and see what has been the price of coal produced in the United States for past years, you find that the coal producer has been satisfied, judging from the reports of that department, with a profit over and above actual cost of something like 12 to 13 cents per ton.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Is the Senator advised as to what the profits have been during the last six months?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am perfectly aware that the profits of the producer have been large during the last six months. That comes about for this reason: They have got two or three buyers for every ton of coal that is produced. The manufacturers are fearful that they can not get the coal to run their mills and they compete against each other, and through that fierce competition the price has advanced. There is no question of doubt about it.

I want to say to the Senator that I have no doubt but that many of the coal producers of this country have made more than 12 per cent—yes, more than a dollar—a ton; they have taken advantage of the market conditions. I do not deny that; but I want to say to the Senator that if we had transportation facilities and every coal producer in this country could get all of the cars he needed, then there would be competition, and competition would bring down the price, because the consumer, if he could not buy it from one producer, would purchase it from some other producer that could and would give it to him if he had the transportation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I recognize the fact that transportation has something to do with it; but every one of these operators will tell you, and many of them did tell the committee, that there was more coal mined, more coal transported, and more coal consumed in the last six months than ever before in the history of the country. That being so, the transportation problem has not been the great element in the increase in price which they endeavor to make us believe that it is.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, we all know that there has not been transportation facilities for handling the coal that has been demanded by the manufacturing concerns and by all other kinds of industries in the United States requiring coal. There is no need of denying that there would have been much more coal consumed, and there would have been more coal stored if we had had ample transportation that to-day is lacking.

If there is a shortage of coal this winter it will not be from the fact that the coal producer has any disposition not to store coal during the summer months. It will come from the fact that he can not get transportation to take the coal to the place at which he wants to store it and where he can store it; and the Senator knows that around the mine is no place to store coal.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WATSON. The coal operators in Indiana entered into a verbal agreement with the governor and the public utilities commission that if they would give them complete car service they would reduce the price of coal. The car service was then 50 per cent. Under the operation of the public utilities commission in Indiana, they furnished 100 per cent car service to every coal operator in the State, and have done so for the last 60 days, and yet the price of coal has gone up instead of down.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand, Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Utah has expired.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not imagine that anything I or any other Senator may say will be listened to in the light of logic or of reason in connection with this bill. In my opinion the bill is monstrous in its present shape.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] asked my colleague, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I think, whether under this bill a person could be put in jail for not producing coal. Why, Mr. President, under the terms of section 4, I challenge contradiction of the statement that every farmer of the United States can be put in jail who reduces his production of wheat, and every coal operator can be put in jail for curtailing the production of coal; and there will not be enough jails in the country to accommodate all the persons who are amenable to the very heavy penal provisions contained in this measure, of a fine of $10,000 and two years' imprisonment.

If the American people realized the character of this measure, the storm of protest would be so great as to cause its immediate repeal should it be enacted into law in this shape; and should an attempt be made to carry it into effect, it would cause riot and revolt all over the country.

The farmer and the coal operator are made the objects of this extraordinary measure. A number of articles were put in the bill, and as rapidly taken out. Why should not cotton have been retained in the measure, as well as coal? I get a large number of letters from northern manufacturers demanding that cotton be put in this bill, if control of commodities is to be part of the policy of the Government.

Here is a letter from a representative citizen of Pennsylvania, Mr. Robert P. Hooper. He says:

> I take the opportunity of asking if you will not support the proposed addition to the food bill now before the Congress which calls for Government control of cotton. The various industries which I am connected with use enormous quantities of raw cotton, and we are working with every facility we have with the interests of the Government before us. In order to show our patriotism to the country we are now working altogether on as low a margin of profit as possible, and feel that it is the duty of every man in the country to do likewise. Unfortunately, the cotton grower and those who handle in a speculative way the raw material do not seem to feel this way, and they are continually advancing the price of raw cotton to such an extent that the manufacturers are compelled to advance their prices to the Government accordingly. This is costing the Government a loss of many millions of dollars. It is very evident that cotton is on a fictitious basis from the fact that even the mention of a Government control of the price of cotton caused it to drop a few days ago practically $10 a bale. In my judgment, the raiser of cotton and the speculator should have their prices controlled in exactly the same way as the growers of wheat and the miners of coal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PENROSE. I do not want to be interrupted in my limited time unless the Senator would like to interrupt me as my time is about to expire; then I can answer in his time. I will answer a brief question, however.

Mr. BORAH. I was simply going to say that we made a tactical mistake in framing this bill. We put in too many articles, so that there were too many who were anxious to take articles out.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; that is very evident, Mr. President. There seems to have been some kind of a mysterious, subterranean agreement for mutual protection and defense, which the coal operators and the farmers apparently failed to get into.

The end of this kind of legislation, Mr. President, will be the ruin of the coal industry and the closing of the mines, and neither the Government nor the private consumer will have any coal at all. There has been much hysteria on the subject. Everybody has been supplied with coal up to date; and while, of course, there may be speculators in the coal business, as there undoubtedly are in the cotton business, they are only a small percentage of the trade.

Representatives of the coal producers from over 30 States came here to Washington at the request of Mr. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior, contained in a communication addressed to Mr. Peabody, of the advisory commission of the Council of National Defense. They consulted with the officials of the Government to arrange for a fair and equitable price; and here is what Mr. Lane says of their action:

> DEAR MR. PEABODY—
> I quote in part from his letter—
> I have just learned of the action of the coal operators, and I wish to express my appreciation of the generous, prompt, and patriotic manner in which they have acted. They have dealt with the situation in the way that I had hoped they would, as large men dealing with a large question.

I intend to have the letter put in the RECORD, so I will not read it at length.

Mr. Lane expressed the highest gratification, and no word in the dictionary was too laudatory apparently when he commended the action of the coal operators from all over the country.

Not only that, but they made arrangements to supply the Northwest with coal and the Atlantic seaboard on the basis agreed upon by the Secretary of the Interior. It was the subsequent interference of the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, that upset the whole situation, and humiliated the coal operators of the United States, and is the direct and responsible source of whatever speculation there is in the coal business at the present time, because the Secretary of War attempted to reflect upon the action of the Secretary of the Interior, and he seemed to be joined in that action by the Secretary of the Navy. The consequence was that the speculator was not kept within bounds and resorted to the previous practices which had been complained of.

I want to give the Senate some idea of the knowledge of the coal business displayed by the Secretary of the Navy. Secretary Daniels' support of Secretary Baker rests upon a fact that the Nation ought to know. Secretary Daniels asserted that he purchased coal for the Navy last year at $1.38 per ton, but he did not state the conditions under which the coal was produced. It came from West Virginia and from companies which were willing to sell to the Government at almost any cost as an advertising proposition for the balance of their output. The coal was produced by nonunion miners, all officials of the United Mine Workers being driven out of the region by detectives hired to terrorize the mines. The living conditions among these workers are subnormal and un-American, negroes and the lowest class of southern European labor living together amid conditions which are a shame to democracy and a blight upon the physical and moral life of the Nation.

That is the commercial standard which the Secretary of the Navy saw fit to apply to the adjustment of prices consummated by the Secretary of the Interior, showing a confusion, indecision, delay, and demoralization in the administration of the Council of National Defense, that to my mind is impressively striking.

I know my time is limited, Mr. President, under the 10-minute rule, and I shall not detain the Senate longer. I have prepared some memoranda concerning the coal situation and its relation to the Government. I will ask to add them to my brief statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"MEMORANDA CONCERNING THE EXCLUSION OF FUEL, PARTICULARLY BITUMINOUS COAL, FROM THE FOOD-CONTROL BILL NOW PENDING.

"1. There is absolutely no disposition upon the part of the bituminous-coal operators to hold back from cooperation with the Government in the matter of coal production upon terms fair and just to the three parties concerned, namely, the mine owners or operators, employed labor, and the consuming public, especially the Government. Indeed, it can be stated, as Secretary Lane has already recognized, that the operators have manifested and are still manifesting a desire to cooperate enthusiastically upon patriotic grounds. The only reservation to this is that Secretary Baker has considerably chilled the ardor and undermined the confidence of the operators by his violent attack following the agreement reached June 28. Men who wish to do everything in their power to aid the Government in such a critical period as this are not sure of their standing when one member of the Cabinet violently overthrows the agreement of another, especially when that agreement was simply tentative and pending a further and complete investigation of costs of production.

"2. There are certain facts which should be clearly recognized in this discussion. Under the Sherman law, with its prohibitions and penalties and the threats of overzealous public prosecutors looking for political reputation, it has been impossible for the coal operators even to think of getting together in any way looking toward the regulation of prices and production, even with a view to controlling irregularities detrimental alike to their own and the public interests, as all extremes of prices always are detrimental. The conference held recently, culminating in the agreement of June 28, was upon the invitation of accredited Government officials with a view to securing the assistance of the responsible coal-producing companies in preventing the extortionate prices which had prevailed for spot or free coal; such extortionate prices having been established here and there during recent months by speculative interests keen to take advantage of the consumers who had failed to provide by contract for their usual deliveries of coal. However—and this point is exceedingly important—not 10 per cent of the coal produced in the past six months has realized to the producer the high prices which have been so much criticized and which have formed the basis of more than one attack upon the coal producers. Indeed the responsible coal producers have deplored these erratic price movements as being just as detrimental to their own interest as to the interest of the consumer.

"3. It is a noteworthy fact that in spite of all the wild talk about a coal famine no important industry or producing or manufacturing concern has had to cease business because of fuel shortage. There may have been delays which gave rise to unnecessary alarm for the future, but the delays were due entirely to car shortage; the panic aspect given recently to the coal situation has been entirely fictitious and has been created largely by those men whose political creed urged them to bring as many elements of industry as possible under Government control or into a state of Government ownership.

"The committee on coal production of the National Council of Defense undertook, at the request of the council, to bring order out of chaos, to speed up production, to settle prices upon a reasonable level throughout all sections of the United States, and, above all, to secure promptly the fuel supplies necessary for the Government in war time. The following copy of Secretary Lane's letter to Mr. F. S. Peabody, of the committee of coal production, gives the motive which inspired and regulated the conference:

"JUNE 28, 1917.

"Mr. F. S. PEABODY,
"Chairman Committee on Coal Production,
"Council of National Defense.

"DEAR MR. PEABODY: I feel that the present extremely high prices on coal require immediate action by the coal operators, and therefore would urge upon you that they should be reduced at once and maximum prices fixed which would apply to sales on and after July 1, 1917, and continue until such time as the investigation which you propose into costs and conditions shall warrant a reduction or increase. These prices should not be used to affect present contracts or apply to export or foreign trade. In other words, the people of the United States should have, as I urged upon the operators the other day, immediate relief and knowledge of their disposition to make a reasonable price irrespective of the possibilities of obtaining higher prices. This would be regarded by the people as meeting the situation promptly and wisely if the prices materially cut those which exist.

"Cordially, yours,

"FRANKLIN K. LANE.

"The response of the representatives of the bituminous operators was prompt and unequivocal, as shown in their resolution given below. It will be noted that this resolution on their part authorized the Government to fix a 'tentative maximum price':

"This convention, by resolution heretofore adopted, having requested the Secretary of the Interior, the Federal Trade Commission, and the committee on coal production to fix a fair and reasonable price at which the several operators in the several coal districts of the United States shall sell coal, do hereby further authorize said Government representatives, so named in said resolution, to forthwith issue a statement fixing a tentative maximum price which, in their judgment, is fair and reasonable, as applied to the several coal districts, at which coal shall be sold from and after the 1st day of July next and until the accurate costs have been ascertained and a fair and reasonable price based thereon fixed by said Government agencies designated under said resolution: To this end, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the several States here represented do present to the chairman of this convention a suggestion for use by said agencies in fixing the price which the several interests here represented feel should be the fair and reasonable price to be so tentatively fixed by the said agencies.

"Adopted June 28, 1917.

"Secretary Lane's recognition of this action leaves no doubt whatever that the arrangement was highly satisfactory to the Department of the Interior and the Federal Trade Commission. Mr. Lane frankly recognizes that the coal operators had shown a spirit of cooperation and subordination of their own interests unparalleled in the history of the relationship of Government to an important industry:

"JUNE 28, 1917.

"HON. F. S. PEABODY,
Chairman Committee on Coal Production,
Council of National Defense.

"MY DEAR MR. PEABODY: I have just learned of the action of the coal operators, and I wish to express my appreciation of the generous, prompt, and patriotic manner in which they have acted. They have dealt with the situation in the way that I had hoped they would, as large men dealing with a large question. They manifestly see that this is no time in which to consider primarily the opportunities which the war gives for personal aggrandizement. We must gain for each by gaining for all. The country is in a mood for sacrifice. It is intent upon the success of the war and is willing to do everything needed to give insurance to the world against a repetition of this awful condition.

"Will you not be good enough to express to the coal men my appreciation of the spirit they have shown in determining that their prices shall be reduced so that the industries of the country may not feel hampered and the people may not feel that their spirit is broken down by the thought that this is to be a war for individual advantage instead of self-protection? I felt from the moment of my talk to them that no body of men more truly represented the high purpose to yield personal desire for general good than did they. Now I trust that we shall immediately put into concrete form the spirit of your resolution.

"Cordially, yours,

"FRANKLIN K. LANE.

"The splendid piece of constructive patriotism, to which Mr. Lane refers as a large question dealt with by large men, was carried out, notwithstanding the fact that some of the operators were under indictment charged with an agreement to fix prices and who still feared the possibility of further prosecution by the Department of Justice. Nevertheless, they responded cheerfully to the urgent appeal of Secretary Lane to do something sacrificial to meet the tremendous emergency which had arisen in the Nation.

"4. It immediately was recognized that coordination and cooperation of the transportation and producing interests must be secured promptly in order to bring about instant improvement. The first step taken was in the interest of the great Northwest. In order to secure for that section an adequate supply of fuel at reasonable rates a pooling arrangement was made, under the title of the Lake Erie Bituminous Coal Exchange, whereby during the period of open navigation the classifications of coal were reduced by producers from over 1,000 to 100 grades, thereby greatly facilitating the movement of coal over the docks. This not only expedited its distribution but it resulted in a prompter return of cars to the mines. A similar arrangement was made and will shortly go into effect for all Atlantic tidewater ports whereby it is expected that an additional 6,000,000 tons of coal can be put over the Atlantic docks annually as a result of the pooling.

"In these particulars, as in everything affecting the present situation, the producers responded cheerfully and energetically to the appeal of the coal-producing committee, with the result that adequate supplies for Government use were delivered with unusual promptness.

"5. In order to relieve the consumer of the evil effects of extortionate prices demanded and obtained by a few speculative interests and in order to allay the fictitious feeling of panic upon the part of the purchaser, the committee on coal production invited all the coal operators of the United States to meet in Washington. Their cooperation in correcting the present situation and in guarding against possible future evil was asked by Secretary Lane, Gov. Fort, of the Federal Trade Commission, and Mr. F. S. Peabody, of the coal-production committee. The first thing to develop in this conference was the immediate need of cooperation upon the part of railroads and shipowners. For instance, shipping facilities from the southern coal ports for the northeastern manufacturing districts, where the great munition plants abounded, have been diverted to other purposes and bottoms were not available for coal carrying. Consequently coal had to be shipped by rail, which congested traffic, diverted cars from their usual runs, filled the sidings, and made normal transportation for the other operators a most serious matter.

"6. Evidence is abundant that the one great need to relieve the coal situation is an adequate supply of cars. There is an abundance of available coal. The mines are adequately equipped and labor is ready to do its share, but the cars are lacking. If the distributing facilities were available, 75,000,000 more tons of coal per annum could be mined and shipped to the consumer. The operators are anxious to produce, the laborers are willing to work, but the cry in every coal field is 'Cars! Cars! Cars!' Successful coal-mine operation is absolutely dependent upon a constant, regular, and adequate supply of railroad cars. (Reference: Federal Trade Commission Report and Colver's testimony before Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce.)

"It is obvious, therefore, that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Trade Commission must cooperate with the coal producers to immediately remedy this condition.

"7. Herewith find the statement given out by the Department of the Interior (office of the Secretary) concerning the conference held in Washington at the invitation of the Council of National Defense:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
"Washington, D. C., June 28, 1917.

"As a result of the conference between the mine operators, the Secretary of the Interior, Federal Trade Commissioner Fort, Chairman Peabody, and the committee on coal production of the Council of National Defense, the following reductions were made to go into effect July 1 next in the prices of coal. This, according to the statement of Director George Otis Smith, of the Geological Survey, of the Interior Department, will effect a reduction to the consumers east of the Mississippi Rives of $15,000,000 a month, based on the output of free coal in May of this year. These prices are maximum prices per ton of 2,000 pounds aboard the cars at mine, pending further investigation. These prices do not affect in any way contracts in existence or sales of coal for foreign or export trade.

"The operators tendered to the Government a reduction from these reduced prices of 50 cents per ton for coal that the Government may need.

"No action was taken upon anthracite prices because of the fact that these prices had already been acted upon by the Federal Trade Commission.

"Twenty-five cents per net ton was fixed as the maximum price for coal jobbers' commission, with only one commission, no matter how many jobbers' hands the coal may pass through.

"On account of an inadequate representation of operators west of the Mississippi River, no maximum prices were fixed for coal from those districts. A supplementary statement will be issued within a few days covering prices on coal produced in those districts.

"The action taken at this conference brings about the following results:

"Present prices on bituminous coal mined in Pennsylvania have ranged from $4.75 to $6. Under the ruling the price is reduced to $3 for mine run and $3.50 for domestic lump, egg, and nut.

"The present range of prices in West Virginia is from $4.50 to $6; price reduced to $3 for mine run and $3.50 for domestic lump, egg, and nut.

"The range of prices for Ohio coal has been from $4.50 to $5; prices reduced to: No. 8 district, the thick-vein Hocking and Cambridge districts, $3 for mine run and $3.50 for domestic lump, egg, and nut; thin-vein Hocking, Pomeroy, Crooksville, Coshocton, Columbiana County, Tuscarawas County, Amsterdam-Bergholz district, $3.25 for mine run and $3.50 for domestic lump, egg, and nut; the Massillon and Palmyra districts and Jackson County, $3.50 for all grades of coal.

"The prevailing prices in Alabama have been from $5.50 to $5.75; prices reduced to: Cahaba and Black Creek, $4; Pratt, Jaeger, and Corona, $3.50; Big Seam, $3 for all grades.

"The prevailing prices for coal mined in Maryland have been from $5.75 to $6; reduced prices will be $3 for mine run and $3.50 for domestic lump, egg, and nut.

"The prevailing prices on coal mined in Virginia have been $4.50 to $5; reduced price, $3 for mine run and $3.50 for lump, egg, and nut.

"The prevailing prices on coal mined in Kentucky have been from $4 to $4.50; reduced price, $3 for mine run and $3.50 for the domestic sizes.

"The prevailing prices on coal mined in Illinois and Indiana have been from $3.50 to $4; reduced price, $2.75 for mine run and steam sizes and $3.50 for screened domestic sizes.

"The prevailing prices on coal mined in Tennessee have been from $4.50 to $5; reduced price, $3.50 for all sizes.

"The first thing to be noted concerning the above prices is that they are tentative and are subject to modification by the Federal Trade Commission after the commission has determined the real cost of production. Before making any mention of the actual cost of production your attention is called to the serious blunder made by Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana. Gov. Goodrich has claimed that the tentative rate is in excess of the recent selling rate, which is absolutely untrue. The above memoranda in the last parargaph but one shows the prices on coal mined in Illinois and Indiana to have been from $3.50 to $4, while the reduced price according to the operators' agreement will be $2.75 for mine run and steam sizes and $3.50 for screened domestic sizes.

"At this point it seems advisable to insert Secretary Lane's remarks to the assembled operators:

"Gentlemen, this is a very novel proceeding. I think I am within the fact when I say that no such hearing or gathering as this has ever been held in the United States before, or perhaps in the world. You are, I hope, pioneers in a good movement. I come from the land of pioneers, the far western country, where we look back with respect and admiration and some reverence upon those who crossed the hard and stony and waterless places to the richer spots beyond, and I hope that you will be looked back upon not only by those who succeed you in the coal business, but by the industries of the United States, with respect and admiration for the manner in which you have acted at this conference. You have responded, as men should, to a call made upon you in the name of the people of the United States. You are not a removed class. You are of us. You belong to the people. Most of you are men who were not born to wealth. You come up out of the soil like the rest of us and you have shown a sympathy and an understanding of your relations with the people from which you spring. That is the essential quality in democracy. Unless we can maintain in our minds always a consciousness of the source of power in this country, democracy is a failure. There is a strong contention made that this Government can not so organize itself as to meet to the full the demands that are to be made upon it, that other forms of government in times of stress or, in fact, in any times, are more competent and more efficient, because there is the strong hand of the Government above, threatening, menacing, compelling. If we in the United States are to work out our problems economic, social, as we have worked out our problem political, we must work it out, in my judgment, in the spirit in which you have worked—with sympathy, with recognition of those whom you serve. There is a kind of corporation in this country that we know as a public utility. A public utility is one that is at the service of anyone and must render him the kind of service that it holds out to give. In the biggest and broadest sense, each one of you in running a coal mine is managing a public utility, because the public is dependent upon you. And this world is going forward and not backward; it is going to keep its confidence in democracy, if the men who have the management of industry and the men who give direction to the thought of the country have in their hearts always the welfare of the people. The one thing that will turn us back is the exercise of arbitrary power by those who have power and who exercise it ruthlessly. You have been up against an extremely odd situation. And now you have gathered here and met that situation in man fashion. I think you have reason to be proud of what you have done. Speaking for Gov. Fort and for Mr. Peabody and his committee and for myself, we are proud of what you have done. You have said to the American people that within your power, exercising your judgment, protecting yourselves, you will not be oblivious to the rights of those whom you serve; you will, within your power, protect them. That is the spirit that makes for the success of our country. And if all the industries of the United States will have that same spirit, there will be no question as to our ability to mobilize the resources of this country and carry this war to a successful conclusion. Good sense, common sense, vision, the judgment of large-minded men—those are the things that must characterize us if we are to carry on this great venture. We must not work singly and alone, for selfish ends, in the hope of reaping rich rewards which will distinguish us merely as men who are in industry as makers of money. We must work as the men that the papers said landed in Europe yesterday will work. We must work in companies, in battalions, in regiments, and we must have in our minds the purpose that we are going to march forward to victory, victory not for ourselves, but victory for the country that is dearer to us than anything we have except our own families. This war is not a war of a day. It is not a war upon which we entered lightly. It is not a war in which any man, no matter how old he is, no matter what his resources may be, will not be compelled to play his part. We are the greatest business Nation on earth, and therefore we must look to the business men of the country to lead our people in spirit. And I think that the word that comes out from this gathering will be an inspiration to the people of the country.

"8. When Secretary Baker repudiated and denounced the agreement made with Secretary Lane it was an act hardly short of a national catastrophe. Backed by Secretary Daniels, it disclosed a glaring and ominous crevice in the national administration, but even that was the least important feature of the situation. Secretary Baker's repudiation undermined and probably demolished the foundations upon which cooperation could be built up between the Government and the great industrial interests of the country. What encouragement could there be for any other body of producers to negotiate or cooperate with one department of the Government when all the work could be knocked to pieces by another department? Confidence has been shot to shreds. Men who a few weeks ago were enthusiastic to make vast sacrifices of time and money for the Government now are afraid to lay themselves open to the humiliation which has overwhelmed the coal operators.

"9. Secretary Daniels's support of Secretary Baker rests upon a fact which the Nation ought to know. Secretary Daniels asserted that he purchased coal for the Navy last year at $1.38 per ton, but he did not state the conditions under which that coal was produced. It came from West Virginia and from companies which were willing to sell to the Government at almost any cost as an advertising proposition for the balance of their output. The coal was produced by nonunion miners, all officials of the United Mine Workers being driven out of the region by detectives hired to terrorize the region; living conditions among those mine workers were subnormal and un-American, negroes and the lowest class of southern European labor living together amid conditions which are the shame of democracy and a blight upon the physical and moral life of the Nation.

"10. Unconscious or malicious misinformation has been spread broadcast concerning the cost of producing coal. Such information has been accepted as correct even by Government officials and responsible legislators. There is hardly a coal-producing region in the United States which can actually mine coal at a labor cost of less than $1.50 per ton. In some regions where the veins are thin and the mining conditions exceptionally bad the cost runs considerably above this, but these figures take into consideration only the actual work of mining. There are a number of very material elements of cost which do not appear on the operator's books at all.

"SOME COSTS NOT ON THE BOOKS.

"First. Capital investment cost.

"(a) Sinking fund to refund capital.

"A sinking fund must be created to return the money the plant cost and the size of this fund is 20 cents a ton.

"(b) Interest on capital.

"On almost any reasonable capitalization this interest charge will be 24 cents per ton.

"(c) Leasehold value, 15 cents per ton.

"Second. Selling cost.

"Some operators pay 10 cents per ton while others pay 10 per cent of the sales price. A fair estimate throughout the coal regions would place the selling cost to the producer at 16 cents per ton.

"Third. Managerial cost.

"Very many operators manage their own property, their only return being the interest on their capital if such be earned. Whether it is earned or not a charge for management should be made which would amount to 7½ cents per ton.

"Fourth. Pensions and charities.

"In the last few years the larger producers have inaugurated pension and sickness benefits for their workers, but at the present no definite percentage can be worked out for this.

"Fifth. Welfare work. It is now recognized that one of the most important things in the coal regions is to stabilize the industry. This can be done not only by guaranteeing continuous employment at fair wages but by thoroughly humanizing the conditions of living. Every operator of importance now recognizes that tenements must be really habitable; that there must be recreational and educational facilities for the workers and their families; that the mining population must live in a community that approximates to the conditions enjoyed by other industrial workers in the larger communities. The cost of this can not be worked out to-day on a per ton of coal produced, but every month it is becoming a more important factor in the coal-mining world.

"The position of the bituminous operators respecting Government action now pending and legislation in Congress is that the agreement reached with Secretary Lane should be allowed to stand because it is eminently fair and just. The prices agreed upon are only tentative and are subject to revision or confirmation based upon the findings of the Federal Trade Commission regarding the cost of coal production. The alternative proposed, namely, to handle the entire coal of the country by a separate Federal commission in which no experienced coal operator shall have a part is a step toward catastrophe. It is inconceivable that improvised bureaus and drafted officials from other walks in life can handle such a vital and basic interest during a period which is straining the strength of even the most experienced coal operators. Government control of coal should be stricken out of the food-control bill and the agreement reached between Mr. Lane, the Federal Trade Commission, the National Defense committee on coal production, and the coal operators should be allowed to continue, subject to such revision as the investigation of the cost of production may justify."

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the coal question is about the most intricately involved of all the questions treated in the bill. In my judgment we can supply food products sufficient for the needs of the people of the United States and for all the shipments abroad for which we can find transportation. The coal question is different, and it is especially different in the section of the country which I represent.

New England obtains all its coal from the West Virginia or Pennsylvania fields, about 36,000,000 tons a year—12,000,000 tons of hard coal and about 24,000,000 tons of soft coal. Last winter soft coal reached the price of $12 a ton and was sustained at that price for a considerable time. It was not due to the cost of coal at the mine or the profit that the miners made as much as it was to the question of transportation. What the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has said about the importance of transportation in connection with this question is of the utmost importance and is quite correct.

The cost of coal at $12 a ton in New England as divided up last winter, and the price will be as high again this winter, was about $3 a ton at the mine. The transportation from Norfolk to New England ports was $6 a ton. The railroad transportation from mine to water $1.40 a ton, and about 50 cents a ton from the port in New England to the manufactory or other place where it was used, leaving a profit of perhaps half a dollar a ton or three-quarters of a dollar a ton. It is water transportation that is the greatest difficulty to the New England consumer, and as such it is one that influences and affects the business of the whole country and the prosecution of the war.

Very largely the New England manufacturing industries are engaged in manufacturing for war purposes and unless they are supplied with sufficient coal to carry on their operations it will be impossible for them to carry out their contracts to supply the Government's needs.

This whole question is so disjointed that it is pretty difficult to place the responsibility for any failure. For example, at one time the Navy Department enters the field and takes the tugs belonging to a transportation company and turns them to naval uses. At another time the owners of shipping sell their shipping because they can make more money in some other operation and so divert it to some other purpose. There must be some strong hand if New England is going to receive a fuel supply this winter that will provide transportation sufficient to get the coal from the mines to the market.

I think that last year there were probably 15,000,000 tons of coal taken by water from New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk to the New England ports. There is not more than two-thirds of the amount of water transportation that there was last year. The business of that section of the country is greater than it was last year; therefore the demand for coal is greater and the means of getting it are less. It is quite likely that the requirements will aggregate 40,000,000 tons this year. So unless transportation is furnished we must close down many of the most important industrial concerns of that section of the country, and, as I have said, that means a failure to supply the Government with its needs to carry on the war.

So the question itself is most involved. It can not be charged that the coal miner is alone responsible or in many cases even largely responsible for this situation. The needs of New England are not the needs of Ohio, which mines it own coal, or the needs of Illinois, which mines its own coal. The transportation questions are much more involved than in those States.

When I listen to these amendments and the propositions of the committee I feel like saying, "A plague on all your houses!" I do not know how any one of them can answer the purposes which they claim to be able to do. It is utterly repugnant to me to think of the Government taking over the coal mines and operating them. In my judgment it would curtail rather than increase the coal supply of the country.

On the other hand, I do not see how any man is going to be wise enough to fix a price for coal which will not do a material injustice to one section of the country even if it does justice in another section. I do not believe there are men living who are wise enough to handle that kind of a question without doing as much harm as they do good. If we were doing the wise thing, or if we had done it months ago, we would have undertaken to prepare this country for the transportation of its products. If we had devoted our money and our time to the transportation questions and forgotten all these other correlated ones, we would to-day and next winter be infinitely better off than we are going to be. It is too late now to build cars, it is too late to build vessels for this purpose, and it does not make any difference how many committees or commissions you have—the only possibility of relieving the New England situation is for the railroads to stop doing one kind of business and devote their equipment to the coal business.

I presume to some degree that may be done and will be done under the direction of the committee connected with the advisory commission as it has been in other cases, but this very advisory commission may not be all wise.

The New Haven Railroad has just been asked to send 1,500 freight cars to Florida to transport the products of Florida which are ready for market to the northern market. That delays every kind of business in New England, because the New Haven has not any more equipment than it needs, probably less than it needs. So while we are saving one industry or one product we may be doing irreparable damage in another case.

I never was as much at sea on what seems to be the best course to take on any question as I am on this one relating to fuel. I think in the final analysis if we would do what we can now to provide transportation facilities, if, for example, Congress would appropriate $100,000,000 to build coal cars, we could not spend that money as wisely in any other way, because the car industry of the country is not overworked. If that industry could obtain material, without any question it could turn out a great many cars before the snow flies next winter, and if the motive power could be obtained and those cars were available we could care, very largely at least, for the situation as it exists.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he knows that we already have enough coal cars to do the business of the coal transportation. The difficulty is that the railroads are using the coal cars for other kinds of traffic.

Mr. WEEKS. That is because they have been directed to do so by the railroad committee of the advisory commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know anything about that. The railway committee, I suppose, can not change it in a moment, but the real difficulty is not the scarcity of coal cars, although there may be a shortage of cars of all descriptions.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly there is a shortage of all kinds of equipment, and if you use coal cars for another purpose you simply prevent the possibility of transporting sufficient coal for the needs of the country.

Mr. CUMMINS. For that reason I think the amendment I proposed on the floor will do some good.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that the coal question is an exceedingly involved one. But we are called upon now to unravel this tangle. The first question that arises is as to what committee has made the most thorough investigation of this subject. This bill emanates from the Agricultural Committee, and was originated, I understand, as a bill for the control of foods and feeds. I heard the examination of Mr. Hoover before that committee, and whenever reference was made to any commodity other than food my recollection is that he indicated that that was outside of the bill which was originally contemplated, and he knew nothing or little about those subjects.

The examination and the investigation related almost entirely to food and feeds in that committee. The bill was reported covering all three—food, feed, and fuel. Then an investigation was commenced in the Interstate Commerce Committee upon the bills introduced by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and an exhaustive inquiry was made covering some five or six hundred pages. At that inquiry the operators of the mines, who had gathered here at the invitation of the advisory commission, presented their views. The Federal Trade Commission, represented by the new members, Gov. Fort and Mr. Colver, presented their views and the views of that commission after a very thorough investigation not yet completed of this subject. Before that committee also appeared Mr. Thorne, of Iowa, the transportation expert, who had made a very thorough study of this subject, and gave very valuable information and views regarding it.

Now, then, as a result of that investigation we find an amendment to the pending bill offered as the joint product of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and I submit that that amendment represents as thorough an investigation as has been had of the subject by competent men, and that it is entitled to the careful consideration of the Senate.

Mr. President, with reference to the question of transportation, to which the Senator from Massachusetts has alluded, of course shortage of cars has had a great deal to do with the rise in prices and the scarcity of coal, the rise in prices being caused by the scarcity of coal in different localities, precipitating upon the free or spot coal an extraordinary demand and raising that coal to skyrocket prices. The operators who had contracts at low rates, all the way from $1.10 to $1.40 per ton at the mine, saw the opportunity of making some money in an industry which for five or six years had not been a profitable one; perhaps profitable to some, but not profitable in its entirety, and we know how split up the industry is. It is not concentrated, as is the anthracite industry, but is divided among thousands of operators throughout the various bituminous fields operating either in a large or a small way.

They were eager to make up some of their losses, and some of them violated their contracts for the delivery of coal and turned their coal into the free-coal market, and as new contracts were sought they raised the price or refused to make contracts, reserving their coal for the free-coal market. The result was that these men, yielding to a natural impulse urging them to recover losses that they made in the past, availed themselves of the prices which they could get in the market, and all they had to do was to accept the high prices offered by the purchasers, who were becoming hysterical and alarmed.

Take New England itself. Deprived of its usual supply of two and a half million tons from Nova Scotia, the factories there rushed into the Ohio and Indiana fields and demoralized the market by their offers for coal, and inflicted an injury upon local consumers of coal in those States. So it has been throughout. This extraordinary demand precipitated upon a somewhat restricted supply has raised the price of coal to an abnormal figure.

Mr. President, the coal operators are now in a position where they can get high prices and they are not going to yield, in my judgment. They have made a moderate concession in response to the appeal of the Secretary of the Interior, but not such a concession as wisdom should have dictated, in my judgment. They agreed to lower the current price from $5.50 to $3, but they ignored the fact that only the year before the price at the mine was less than $1.50, and that under these conditions the cost of production having increased but little, $3 a ton was unreasonably high.

The result, Mr. President, of the scarcity of transportation has been that certain sections of this country are to-day without a coal supply. The great Northwest has only 10 per cent to-day of its usual coal supply, and there is a supreme necessity now of a thoroughly organized and coordinated effort to save sections of the country from coal famine.

The thing that is now operating upon the minds of the coal operators is not so much the necessity of the various sections of the country as their own desire for a large profit to take the place of the losses of the last five years. By limiting production slightly they can maintain high prices. We can not therefore trust to them for a solution of this question, and the Government must intervene.

The industry is not such a very large one when you measure it in dollars. Five to six hundred million tons annually is the normal production.

We could buy up the entire soft-coal crop of the country at a less cost than the entire wheat crop; and not a large sum would be needed, because a revolving fund could take care of it. As the coal is purchased, it would be sold and the money would be restored to the fund, so that a moderate revolving fund would take care of the business.

Now, undesirable as it is that the Government should go into the business of handling coal, it seems to me that there is no alternative. The Government must either control the prices or purchase the coal, and then set it moving in the ordinary channels of commerce. This bill provides, in the alternative, for both of those plans.

To whom should this work be intrusted—the food commission under this bill, headed by Mr. Hoover, a very capable man, who is absorbed entirely in the study of the food question and has little time to apply his great organizing capacity to this question, or should it be the Federal Trade Commission, organized by us years ago for the consideration of all these economic questions, and which, at the request of the President, has, I may say, for some weeks been, by a trained corps of men, making a thorough study of this question; a commission composed of capable men, a commission recently reenforced by two very strong men—Gov. Fort and Mr. Colver—both of whom appeared before our committee and indicated that they had a thorough knowledge of the situation and were animated by a desire to solve this difficult question? It seems to me that the task should be, without question, intrusted to the Federal Trade Commission, originally organized for just such work, with its experienced corps of investigators and experts, its accumulated knowledge, and its records of previous inquiries made by the Bureau of Corporations, to which it succeeded, and composed of able and experienced men, who have for weeks been familiarizing themselves with the present situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, this is a bill for the control of food and fuel, which are prime necessities; but there is one great difference between them: Food is produced only by the farmer, who goes out and adds to the gifts of nature his own judgment and labor, and thereby raises a crop; the coal was placed in the bowels of the earth by the Creator, and all that man has to do is to go and get it and distribute it. There is therefore a great difference between undertaking to run all the farms in the United States and undertaking to run the coal mines of the country.

The Committee on Agriculture very carefully considered the question of food control in the bill, but it was not equipped to consider carefully fuel control under the bill. We have a Committee on Interstate Commerce, one in which we all have confidence. The chairman of that committee, Mr. NEWLANDS, has just given his views in regard to this amendment. The amendment was produced by the joint efforts of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. When those two men consider a subject, listen to the testimony of those who understand the situation, and collaborate on an amendment which they present to the Senate, I feel not only glad to follow them, but bound to follow them.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] has explained to us the very serious situation in New England so far as coal is concerned. A committee of very prominent men from New England were in Washington last week, or the first of this week, I think, explaining the situation. The manufacturers in New England are desperate because of the prospect of having a small supply of coal next winter. I see no way to relieve that situation but for the Government to take over the coal mines and to mine the coal and distribute it throughout the country according to its legitimate needs.

Moreover, it is true that the question of transportation plays a very leading part in the distribution of coal, and under the priority of shipment bill, which passed the Senate a few weeks ago, the Government will have control of the railroads of the country, so that it can send the coal where it ought to go and where it is the most needed. Thereby each section of the country will have a fair chance.

Considering further the question of transportation, we can remember that the Government now has control of the shipping; that it has control of it because it has the right to take off tugs and steamboats from the work which they have heretofore been doing, and to apply them to the public use of transporting troops and munitions and other supplies for troops.

This amendment does not provide that the President shall take control of the coal mines; it does not provide that the President shall fix the price of coal; but it does give the President authority to set such machinery in motion, if he decides that the fuel problem is not being handled for the best interests of the country.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish to address myself to this particular question, but I understood that we should at 3 o'clock take up section 12 of the bill, and I therefore ask for the regular order.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, some days ago I presented, and it was read to the Senate, a letter from Gen. W. L. Welcker explaining the coal situation in the district of Tennessee. I have now a letter, not very long, from a prominent operator of that district, who presents some facts tending to illustrate the conditions of the coal situation in that section, and, to some extent, being an answer to the letter of Gen. Welcker. I ask consent that this letter be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 13, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I feel it is due you that some reference should be made to the communication of W. L. Welcker, of this city, addressed you recently in respect of the coal situation, and which, the press reports, was read to the United States Senate.

The communication is an unwarranted and unjust attack upon those engaged in the production of coal and those dealing in coal products, and is so replete with erroneous and misleading statements that it deserves the condemnation of all who are acquainted with the merits affecting coal production and trade conditions.

Gen. Welcker's criticisms of the President and a member of the Cabinet and others with conferred authority concerning their action in respect to the adjustment and modification of coal prices is without justification, and it is evident that he did not inform himself, as it is inconceivable that he would willfully indulge such criticisms of the Government authorities, and offer such a tirade of maledictions against the operators, denouncing them as robbers, etc., unless he believed the statements he made to be justified. At the same time one should not be excused for such carelessness.

As you know, the coal interests of our whole country, by invitation of the Government authorities, were in a convention at Washington during the latter part of June for the purpose of stabilizing the prices of coal, and if consistent with the cost of production, conditions, etc., secure some modification from the then prevailing prices, which resulted in a voluntary agreement on the part of the coal producers that the Government might name the maximum price for the sale of its product to apply under the present crisis, and so far as is known is the only industry in the United States that has taken such action.

This arrangement provided a reduction in price of coal from $1.50 to $2 per net ton, and, as Secretary Lane properly stated, it means that the coal producers, who were engaged in a legitimate business—and which for the past 10 years has been substantially without any profit—and which has been operating without any monopoly or combination in restraint of trade, voluntarily surrendered to the people of the United States from the gross proceeds of its sales a sum aggregating $180,000,000 per annum, regardless of the fact that the prices of all other commodities, including material and mine supplies that enter largely in the cost of production of coal, as well as foodstuffs and other items generally, were then and are still without limit of restriction.

As a matter of information I recite that the price of other industrial products, foodstuffs, etc., began to advance practically 12 months before there was any advance whatever from the extremely low coal prices that then prevailed, there being no advance whatever in the price of coal until about October 1, 1916, and while the advance subsequently became material, it was the inevitable result of the law of supply and demand, accelerated by the fact that industrial plants and purchasers generally apparently anticipated further advances and made a practice of offering more for coal than the producers were asking.

However, the percentage of advance in the price of coal has not kept pace with the percentage of advance in other products, the present price of coal being 75 to 100 per cent advance as compared with the prices obtaining 12 months ago (that advance applying only to such coal as was not under contract), while the average advance of all other staple products is substantially 300 per cent.

Mr. Welcker makes reference to the price paid for coal by the Southern and Louisville & Nashville Railroads prior to a year ago as $1 and $1.12½ per ton, respectively, but does not mention the fact that both railroad companies, notwithstanding each of them had contracts with the producers for even a lower price than Mr. Welcker states, realizing the material increase in the cost of production was materially more than their contract prices, voluntarily offered and did increase the price they should pay, and at present each of them is paying above 100 per cent higher price than prevailed 12 months ago.

His reference to the previous and present cost of production of coal indicates he is altogether ignorant of the facts. As a matter of fact, the wages of operatives of the mining companies generally throughout southeastern Kentucky and eastern Tennessee have been advanced variously from 50 to 100 per cent, while the advance in the cost of material termed as "mine supplies," and which is a considerable item entering into the cost of production of coal, has advanced from 100 per cent to 060 per cent—reduced to an average means substantially 300 per cent.

As further information I recite that for the past 12 months substantially 75 per cent of all coal produced throughout this entire section has been applied on contracts made under normal conditions as to the coal trade and before any increase accrued in the cost of production, and which condition precluded any profit whatever to the coal interests, and in the majority of cases offered material losses.

Added to the increase in the wage scale, the unprecedented advance of material entering into the cost of production of coal, the unusual shortage of cars as well as the shortage of labor resulting in an important restricted output, was a more potent factor in increasing the cost of production per ton.

In conclusion, I beg to state that, so far as we are advised, the public and the trade generally approve of the action of the Government and the operators in the convention referred to. The maximum prices determined are reasonable and just, and which will preclude the necessity of disturbing the present high wages paid to the miners and laborers, and the only complaints and criticisms are from chronic agitators and those with socialistic tendency, and business disturbers generally.

The coal interests and the informed public generally here feel that more or less harmful results may have resulted from such a communication as Mr. Welcker's, in that it may have a tendency to incite prejudices of those who follow blindly or who do not take into consideration the integrity of such attacks against an important industry; an industry that needs encouragement rather than condemnation; that employs more labor for the same amount of capital invested than any other industry in existence; an industry that is a legitimate business and that is entitled to reasonable profits in order that the production may be at least maintained and, if possible, stimulated commensurate with the Nation's needs, together with the needs of our allies.

I am inclosing herewith a clipping from the Knoxville Sentinel of the 13th instant containing reference to President Wilson's appeal to the business interests of the country, and the response of the coal operators in this territory, and which is followed by reference to the coal convention at Washington, and the remarks of Secretary Lane at the conclusion of that conference, and which you will note is a justifiable variance from the attitude of a few agitators and self-constituted regulators.

With kindest regards, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

JNO. L. BOYD.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I have some other letters from the same district and from other places which concur with Gen. Welcker's views. I ask that they may also be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

GREENEVILLE, TENN., July 7, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: After reading some extracts from W. L. Welcker's letter, I certainly agree with him on the outrageous prices on coal.

This great concession of the coal operators looks to me like these "Jew sales," goods marked up very high one day, then marked down about one-half the marked-up price, and in flaming letters the advertisement reads, "Great reduction sale!" This wonderful concession of the coal barons is something that will not go down the common people's throats.

Last September I was quoted by the United Colliers (Inc.), St. Charles, Va., run of the mines, at $1.35. The year before I bought same coal from same company at $1.10. Now, with their great concession, they want $3 or $3.50. Has the wages of the miners been increased so much that this exorbitant price is demanded?

I can send you last year's quotations should you so desire.

Very truly,

A. J. PATTERSON.

ROGERSVILLE, TENN., July 6, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have read the letter which Mr. Welcker, of Knoxville, wrote you and Senator MCKELLAR with regard to the price of coal as agreed upon by certain parties and the coal operators. The people here generally—in fact, everyone that I have heard speak—agree with Mr. Welcker to this extent, that the price of coal as fixed by these parties is outrageously high and an extortion upon the public.

We who live in these parts near the coal fields know that the price for labor in the coal mines has not been increased by the coal operators to any considerable extent the past year—at least nothing in proportion to the increased price of coal. And while we realize that materials for mining coal have increased, yet the price of coal as represented by this agreement is outrageous, and to fix it at the price agreed upon for the coming winter plus the freight rate and other overhead charges as therein agreed will be prohibitory to a large element of the people and will bring about great suffering, and this applies even to us who are so near the coal mines.

It seems to me that these coal operators, who I personally know are making enormous profits, should be forced to sell coal to the people at a reasonable price, and at a much less price than was agreed upon at this conference. Otherwise the Government should take charge of the mines themselves, pay the operators a reasonable profit on their investment, and furnish coal to the people at an equitable price; and something of this kind will have to be done, else there will be great suffering and the people will be heard from.

Again, while writing you upon this question, on which I know you are well advised and are thoroughly conversant with the facts, some restraints ought to be put upon the farmer along with the balance, because I am able to foresee that in this county—and I know it is the same everywhere else—the farmer is preparing to hold back and to charge extortionate prices for the products of his farm. The farmer should not be permitted to rob and extort from the people any more than the coal operator.

So I trust that you will see your way clear to assist in bringing about the passage of the food-control bill as well as the control of a lot of other necessities of life, as, of course, it is not fair to force the farmer to sell at a reasonable price when at the same time he must pay exorbitant prices for the things he buys.

Living here in an agricultural section, I am satisfied there will not be the slightest complaint among the farmers if a reasonable maximum price is fixed for his products, as well as a minimum; and most certainly it seems to me that this ought to be done along with the other necessities of life, as above stated.

I write you this in order that you may be advised of public opinion along these lines generally in this county.

Respectfully,

C. W. MARGRAVES.

DYERSBURG, TENN., July 9, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have read with interest the letter of Mr. W. L. Welcker, of Knoxville, to you, and by you furnished to Senator POMERENE and afterwards published in Memphis Commercial Appeal.

I am not informed as to conditions in east Tennessee coal fields, of which Mr. Welcker writes, but I would like to give you some facts concerning the fields contiguous to this market and the so-called "sweeping reductions" agreed to by the 400 bituminous mine operators east of the Mississippi River and the Government officials in Washington on June 28.

In May, 1916, acting for my company—Dyersburg Ice & Coal Co.—I made a contract with ——— mine, issuing one of the best products of the southern Illinois field, adjoining some of the most popular mines in the Franklin County district, covering our wants until April 1, 1917, at $1.50 per ton for domestic grades, and while we got only about 40 per cent of our requirements, I am satisfied the shipper did for us the best he could under the very great car shortage then existing.

In April, 1917, I again contracted with this same mine for our needs for the months of May, June, and July, at $3 per ton for domestic sizes—100 per cent increase in price, mark you—and in the first two months, when we should have gotten 65 per cent of our purchase, we received less than 25 per cent of this amount, due to car shortage.

This week I have received a communication from this same corporation, from which I quote: "At present the price is * * * $3.50 for domestic sizes," a raise of 16⅔ per cent since the wonderfully magnanimous agreement on the part of the operators in June.

I send you herewith a circular, Illinois Coal Prices, issued by the different associations of that State. You will note the universal price for domestic sizes, $3.50 per ton at the mine.

I have in my files quotations offering us the choicest products in domestic grades of the Franklin County field for July and August, 1916, delivery at $1.60 to $1.75 f. o. b. the mines. At the same time, many mines that now ask $3.50 per ton would have jumped at contracts for $1.25 to $1.50.

It looks to me that the coal operators in their excessive patriotism and generosity have put a home run over on Uncle Sam and the people.

Very truly,

W. O. BRANDON.

BRISTOL, VA.-TENN., July 7, 1917.

Judge JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: There is so much talk now about the high cost of living and that the Washington Government is going to take charge of regulating and reducing prices. You and I live in a section of the country that produces coal. And many of our friends are in the coal business. In my judgment the lowering of prices on coal is just as important and necessary as the reduction on wheat, potatoes, corn, etc. Coal can be put on cars at the mine from 90 cents to $1, and yet the poor people of Bristol, Knoxville, and elsewhere have been paying from five to six dollars a ton. A laborer working at $1.25 per day and paying $6 for coal has all of his patriotism destroyed on account of this high price. I have some friends in the coal business who have been making from $3.50 to $4 per ton; about $200 a carload. I have a friend who says that he is making about $3 a ton and is hauling it on wagons about 2 miles to the railroad. Soft coal on cars at the mine should not be over $2 per ton; this will give them fully a hundred per cent profit. I call your attention to these facts, and I hope you will give it your very serious consideration.

Very truly,

J. M. BARKER.

THE JACKSON ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE
FOR JACKSON AND MADISON COUNTY,
Jackson, Tenn., July 6, 1917.

Senator JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you about the coal situation. I have talked to numbers of citizens who must have coal to keep themselves and their families from suffering, if not freezing next winter, also to manufacturers who must have coal to keep their plants going. Numbers of our people work in these factories and depend on their daily wage to live. All must have coal. Without exception they think the Congress should take immediate action in the matter and pass some law or laws to protect them from the rapacity and greed of the mine owners. If something isn't done for relief much misery will be the portion of thousands of your fellow citizens the coming winter. May we not have an expression from you?

With best wishes, I am,
Cordially, yours,

S. P. ANDERSON, Secretary.

Mr. SHIELDS. I also present resolutions adopted by citizens of Knoxville, Tenn., and a clipping from the Knoxville Sentinel, which I ask to have incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 6, 1917.

Whereas we are involved in a world-wide war for the cause of humanity—a greater and wider democracy—which is calling for the strongest and best manhood of the country; and

Whereas our country is being taxed and drawn upon as never before: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Lincoln Park, in mass meeting assembled, who live within 50 miles of enough coal to supply the entire South for a hundred and more years, are in favor of keeping this coal for our own consumption and giving it to the consumers at a fair and reasonable price; that we are unalterably opposed to the prices fixed last week at Washington and New York City; that they are unreasonable, unjust, oppressive, and that we refuse to abide by them; be it further

Resolved, That the said prices, purported to be fixed upon the coal of the Nation, is without authority and not binding, and that we denounce the coal operators who attended this meeting and fixed said prices to be oppressors, disloyal citizens, and in rebellion against struggling humanity; be it further

Resolved, That we are opposed to oppression and unjust legislation everywhere, at nome as well as abroad; that we favor giving every man a fair opportunity to live; that this guaranty comes from the Ruler of all governments and worlds, and that it is what our fathers fought for; and if it is revolution to live and enjoy what we have at a reasonable price to all men, let us have revolution rather than starve and freeze to death or be unreasonably oppressed; be it further

Resolved, That we call upon loyal citizens everywhere to come together in mass meetings, as we have, and protest against the price fixed upon coal by the coal operators and send delegates to Washington at some future day and prevail upon the Government to fix a price that will not be burdensome or oppressive to the people; be it further.

Resolved, That we favor organizing a cooperative coal company and invite all loyal citizens of Knoxville to join with us in this movement, and that we are in favor of not buying any coal for the present from any of the companies doing business in Knoxville; be it further

Resolved, That we furnish each of our Senators, Messrs. SHIELDS and MCKELLAR, and Congressman a copy of these resolutions; be it further

Resolved, That we furnish each of the daily papers and the Knoxville Plain Dealer a copy of the same.

C. W. LESTER, Chairman,
W. K. WOLF,
W. M. HENRY,
Committee on Resolutions.

[From the Knoxville Sentinel, July 13.]

COAL OPERATORS PLEDGE TO HELP—PRESIDENT WILSON GIVEN ASSURANCE OF THEIR CORDIAL COOPERATION.

At a meeting of the coal operators in the city, reference was made to the appeal of President Wilson to the business interests of the country, and a committee representing the Tennessee and Kentucky coal operators wired President Wilson as follows:

"Your appeal to business interests of the country is heartily indorsed by the Tennessee and Kentucky coal operators, and they feel will find a no less ready response from every coal industry in our whole country than will be offered by other lines of business. We challenge all other interests to do even as much as was determined at the coal convention at Washington on June 28."

"It will be recalled," said a coal operator after the meeting, "that by invitation of the Secretary of the Interior Lane, the chairman of the Federal Trade Commission, ex-Gov. Fort, and the chairman of the coal-production committee of the National Council of Defense, F. S. Peabody, the coal operators and the Government officials above mentioned met at Washington, and on June 28 concluded an arrangement whereby the operators voluntarily agreed to permit the Government to name the maximum prices for which coal should be sold beginning July 1. This agreement provided a reduction from the market price of $1.50 to $2 per ton, and which Secretary Lane estimated to be in round numbers $180,000,000 per year.

"As showing the spirit of the Government authorities and their attitude toward the operators for their generous and patriotic action, Secretary Lane spoke as follows:

"'Gentlemen, this is a very novel proceeding. I think I am within the fact when I say that no such hearing or gathering as this has ever been held in the United States before or perhaps in the world. You are, I hope, pioneers in a good movement. I come from the land of pioneers, the far western country, where we look back with respect and admiration and some reverence upon those who crossed the hard and stony and waterless places to the richer spots beyond. And I hope that you will be looked back upon not only by those who succeed you in the coal business but by the industries of the United States with respect and admiration for the manner in which you have acted at this conference. You have responded as men should to a call made upon you in the name of the people of the United States. You are not a removed class. You are of us. You belong to the people. Most of you are men who were not born to wealth. You come up out of the soil like the rest of us, and you have shown a sympathy and an understanding of your relations with the people from which you spring. That is the essential quality in democracy.

"'Unless we can maintain in our minds always a consciousness of the source of power in this country, democracy is a failure. There is a strong contention made that this Government can not so organize itself as to meet to the full demands that are and are to be made upon it; that other forms of government in times of stress, or, in fact, in any times, are more competent and more efficient, because there is the strong hand of the Government above, threatening, menacing, compelling. If we in the United States are to work out our problem economic, social, as we have worked out our problem political, we must work it out, in my judgment, in the spirit in which you have worked—with sympathy, with recognition of those whom you serve.

"'There is a kind of corporation in this country that we know as a public utility. A public utility is one that is at the service of anyone and must render him the kind of service that it holds out to give. In the biggest and broadest sense each one of you in running a coal mine is managing a public utility, because the public is dependent upon you. And this world is going forward and not backward, it is going to keep its confidence in democracy, if the men who have the management of industry and the men who give direction to the thought of the country have in their hearts always the welfare of the people. The one thing that will turn us back is the exercise of arbitrary power by those who have power and exercise it ruthlessly. You have been up against an extremely odd situation. And now you have gathered here and met that situation in man fashion. I think you have reason to be proud of what you have done.

"'Speaking for Gov. Fort and for Mr. Peabody and his committee and for myself, we are proud of what you have done. You have said to the American people that within your power, exercising your judgment, protecting yourselves, you will not be oblivious to the rights of those whom you serve; you will, within your power, protect them. That is the spirit that makes for the success of our country. And if all the industries of the United States will have that same spirit there will be no question as to our ability to mobilize the resources of this country and carry this war to a successful conclusion. Good sense, common sense, vision, the judgment of large-minded men—these are the things that must characterize us if we are to carry on this great venture.

"'We must not work singly and alone, for selfish ends, in the hope of reaping rich rewards, which will distinguish us merely as men who are in industry as makers of money. We must work as the men that the papers said landed in Europe yesterday will work. We must work in companies, in battalions, in regiments, and we must have in our minds the purpose that we are going to march forward to victory, victory not for ourselves but victory for the country that is dearer to us than anything we have except our own families. This war is not a war of a day. It is not a war upon which we entered lightly. It is not a war in which any man, no matter how old he is, no matter what his resources may be, will not be compelled to play his part. We are the greatest business nation on earth, and therefore we must look to the business men of the country to lead our people in spirit. And I think that the word that comes out from this gathering will be an inspiration to the people of the country.'"

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the arrangement made a while ago was that as soon as the proposed amendment to section 12 had been printed it would resume its place for discussion. I ask now that section 12 be taken up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon as a substitute for section 12.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Oregon which is now before the Senate proposes to give the board the power to fix the minimum price of wheat, and contains a clause guaranteeing a minimum price of $2 per bushel for No. 1 northern at the principal primary market. I desire to say a few words upon that amendment, because there seems to be a general impression that $2 per bushel is a very high price for wheat. I think I can demonstrate, taking the price of wheat to-day and the prices of other products in the country, that it is a very low price for wheat.

It does not mean $2 to the farmer; it means $2 for the highest grade at an interior market point, like Minneapolis or Chicago. From that is deducted the elevator charges of at least 4 cents a bushel, the railway freight from 5 to 10 or 15 cents per 100, and the difference between the first grade and the other grades of wheat, varying from 4 to 6 cents per bushel for each grade. There are four or five grades of wheat, and very little of the No. 1 northern grade on the market. The farmer, under this clause, will not receive $1.90, but probably will receive something from $1.66 or $1.70 to $1.85 a bushel for his grain.

Mr. President, that, compared with the price of other products in this country, is not conferring upon the farmer any benefit or any great boon, when we compare it with the price of wheat to-day in the market. Wheat is selling to-day in Oklahoma at $2.35 a bushel at the station of the farmer.

I have telegrams from many elevator men and farmers all over the country as to these prices. I have not time to read them into the RECORD, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one, which is as follows:

Washington dispatches indicate a so-called minimum price for standard grades of wheat, one seventy-five at interior terminal markets. As I understand the plans of the food administration, this would represent the price which Government agents would pay for wheat in these markets. If this is the case you will find the farmers will refuse to sell their wheat, and in my judgment they would be entirely warranted in so doing. The world wheat situation justifies a materially higher price. In this opinion I have the indorsement of a number of Canadian board of grain supervisors.

I might say here that the Canadian supervisors referred to are fixing the price in Canada at $2 or above to the farmer—

Suppose you are aware that southwestern farmers are holding their wheat, although in Oklahoma two thirty-five per bushel is obtainable for such quantities as mills require for current use.

I might remark, in passing, that the elevator companies are not buying because they are afraid to buy. They can not hedge their purchases in the market, and therefore will not invest in wheat. The mills are buying some, but they are paying the farmer to-day much more than $2 at his market town.

That telegram was sent to me by a man having a large line of elevators in the Central West and in Canada, one of the largest grain buyers in the country. Every telegram from every grain buyer and mill recommends at least $2 a bushel for wheat, and from that up to $2.25 a bushel.

Now, the crop in the Northwest is not a bumper crop. I have a telegram from a man who has just returned from an extensive trip through Minnesota, North Dakota, and Canada who estimates the crop at about 50 per cent normal.

In my judgment, in Minnesota it is better than that. I do not think it is much better than that, if any better, in North Dakota, from the telegrams I have received, but I know that the crop conditions throughout the Northwest, so far as wheat is concerned, are below normal.

Mr. President, when the price of wheat to-day is compared with the price of other products in the country, $2 seems very cheap; and let it be remembered that that means $2 at the terminal market; the farmer must take much less than that. Compared with the price of coal, $2 wheat is very cheap. Compared with iron, it is the same. Pig iron was selling last October at $18 a ton; to-day it is selling to the manufacturers throughout this country at $55 a ton; and structural steel and clothing and many other things in this country are bringing prices corresponding to those—much higher than the prices of wheat.

Mr. President, I believe that these elevator men and these farmers are correct when they say that if a low price is paid for wheat the farmer will not market it, and he will not raise it another year. In 1914, in three days of about the same time as the present, there were 10,733 cars of wheat marketed, and in the three corresponding days of this year only 733 cars of wheat. The farmer is not asking you to single him out and to guarantee him a minimum price. All he asks is that you will leave his market the same as all the other markets in the country—free and open. If you are not going to do it, if you are going to take away his market and control the prices, then it is for the interest of the whole country more than it is for the interest of the farmer that the President be authorized to guarantee him a good, liberal, minimum price.

Of course the farmer's market will be in the control of the Government when this bill is passed. The embargo bill, of course, took away his entire foreign market and placed it in the hands of this Government. We thought it was necessary to pass that bill. I believe it was, and I should vote for it again. It was necessary as a war measure in this great conflict, but nevertheless it took his market. Now we propose to give to the food-control board the power to control the purchasers of his grain at the terminal markets, to wit, all the elevators and all the mills; and of course the food commission can, therefore, fix his price. If you would leave this an open market, the farmer would much prefer to have it done; but if you think it is necessary to pass this bill and to confer these powers—and I do not say it is not, nor do I argue against it—then you should not be at all niggardly in placing the minimum price where it will be liberal. I do not believe $2 a bushel at the terminal market, less the freight charges and less the elevator charges and less the difference for lower grades of wheat, is a liberal price to the farmer. In fact, in view of the world's crop condition, the demands of the allies and foreign countries, the shortage of the world's crop and the shortage of our crop, it is a very small price, and much less than he is receiving to-day or would receive if his market were left open.

I do not wish to argue as a general proposition for fixing minimum or maximum prices. I am aware that as an economic proposition it is indefensible.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator submit to a very brief question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator believe it wise for the Congress to attempt to fix a minimum price?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Congress has not attempted to fix the minimum price, but it says that it shall not be less than $2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask permission to print a letter as a part of my remarks, without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF FARMERS' COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS,
Hotel Bellevue, Washington, July 19, 1917.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am writing you at this time in regard to the minimum price which the Senate proposed to fix for wheat in the food-control bill. I note that the price of $1.75 is being considered. If the purpose of the minimum price is to stimulate production, I have no hesitancy in saying that $1.75 will not tend to produce that result under present conditions. My conclusion is based on the following reasons:

Since coming to Washington I have received many telegrams direct from organized grain farmers indicating what they consider a fair price for the next crop of wheat. Thirty-three telegrams coming from the 12 leading grain States average as follows: Twenty-five telegrams $2.11, Chicago; eight telegrams, $1.90 at the farm. These telegrams speak the mind of a very large number of farmers. So far as I am able to determine, this is the minimum price which the farmers of these States think they should have for their next wheat crop, so that a minimum price of $1.75 will be no inducement for them to sow more wheat.

As an expression of my second reason, I quote from to-day's New York Commercial:

"Trading in the wheat market was again of limited volume yesterday, but there was a big bulge in prices. The gain was attributed to the strong cash wheat markets, particularly in the Southwest, where overnight advances of from 10 to 30 cents per bushel were reported, this in time resulting from the unwillingness of farmers to sell at the present level and the limited receipts of new wheat. A good deal of attention was also given to the report that in the food-control bill a minimum price of $1.75 for No. 1 northern wheat is to be included. Of course, as a market factor it had no value, for cash wheat is well above that figure and in the Southwest is selling at from $2.30 to $2.45 a bushel, despite the absence of demand. The crop news as a rule is favorable, in many cases the yield being above expectation."

The time is almost at hand when the farmer of the winter wheat belt must decide how much he will sow this fall. His idea of the future price is going to have much to do in determining his decision. Evidently, he believes that prices are going higher than those mentioned above, because he is not selling freely. Receipts at the three principal winter wheat markets for the last three days of last week, compared with the receipts for the corresponding periods one, two, and three years ago, show that very plainly. By car loads, they are as follows:

1914	10,733
1915 (wet year)	1,056
1916	2,532
1917	733

This convinces me that $1.75 will not look attractive to the farmer.

The third reason why this minimum price of $1.75 is too low is because it is proposed to eliminate any control over the prices of the necessaries which the farmer has to buy. If this be done, the farmer will naturally expect a higher minimum price than would satisfy him if the control of those other necessaries were to be retained in the bill.

I will say in conclusion that there is no doubt in my mind that a minimum price of $1.75 for the next crop will not encourage the farmers of the winter wheat belt to increase their acreage of wheat this coming fall. Nothing less than $2 for No. 2 hard winter or No. 1 northern will tend to produce that result, and if present prices of cash wheat are maintained, the guaranty of a minimum of even $2 will not be considered by the farmer in deciding the acreage that he will sow, because farmers like all others are strongly influenced by present conditions.

Since you represent one of the greatest of the wheat producing States and that you are much interested in this legislation, I ask your careful consideration of this letter and beg to remain,

Very truly, yours,

J. W. SHORTHILL, Secretary.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I believe it is a mistake to fix the price of wheat in this bill; but if the price is to be fixed, the farmer should not be paid less than $2 a bushel for his wheat.

There are a good many reasons why the farmers this year should have that amount of money for their wheat. In our State this year the crop is about 45,000,000 bushels. The crop last year was about 98,000,000 bushels, the year before it was about 106,000,000 bushels, and the year before that 177,000,000 bushels. I am told by reliable farmers in Kansas that this year's crop will cost them more than $1.75 a bushel to produce.

It must be remembered that a large part of 6,000,000 acres of wheat in Kansas was winter-killed; this, as I am informed, covers about two-thirds of this year's crop, and accounts for the small yield. Then, again, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] tells the Senate that the Canadian commission had fixed the price of Canadian wheat at above $1.80. I am informed to-day that the price to the farmer has been fixed at $1.87. This is true all over Canada, so I am informed. I am also told that the price has been fixed to the producer in England at $1.80. It does not cost as much to produce wheat in Canada as it does in the United States. It will not be necessary for me to give the reasons for this. If the farmers of Canada are to receive $1.87 per bushel, then the farmers of this country should have at least $2 a bushel for their wheat.

Again, a day or two ago No. 2 winter hard wheat was selling for $2.45 a bushel in Kansas City. No. 1 northern was selling for $2.61 a bushel in Duluth. If that is so, then why should the price be fixed at $2 at the market place in this bill, which means about $1.85 to the farmer?

I have proposed two amendments to this bill—one in reference to the grade. The bill fixes the price of wheat at $2 per bushel for No. 1 northern. I have asked the Senate to accept an amendment in these words, "or its equivalent," and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept that amendment. I have also offered an amendment to the original provision fixing the price at $2.25, because if the price is $2.25 at the market place that would bring the farmer about $2 or $2.10.

As I said a minute ago, I believe it is a mistake to fix the price in this bill; but if it is to be fixed, I hope the Senate will fix the price at not less than $2 per bushel to the farmer.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to know from the Senator to what time he would have this guaranty continued?

Mr. CURTIS. Only while it was necessary.

Mr. PAGE. To cover the crop of this year and the crop of next year?

Mr. CURTIS. It should cover this crop and the crop of next year, if necessary.

Mr. PAGE. Until what time would the Senator think it was necessary to continue the guaranty to fairly take care of the crop of 1918?

Mr. CURTIS. That would depend upon circumstances.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question. If the price of wheat is fixed either by statute or by a board or commission, ought it not to be a price varying with the season of the year? In other words, the wheat must be held by somebody. It can not be consumed at once, and if you fix a price the 1st of September that is the same as the price the following January, if that should become the prevailing price—as seems to be the judgment of a great many, if not most, of the Senators—it would mean that all of the wheat would be put on the market immediately, because there would be no object in holding the wheat. I had supposed, earlier in the consideration of this question, that if the board or some individual fixed it, he would fix a price commencing soon after harvesting and increase it month by month a few cents until about the time of the next harvest.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator from Nebraska is right, and that is one of the reasons why I believe it would be a mistake to fix a flat price in this bill, and think it would be better to leave it to the judgment of a board who would be governed by circumstances and fix the prices as the circumstances at the time justified.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wanted to make this suggestion to the Senator: This being a minimum price, I can not see why there should be a graduated minimum price. If we were fixing the maximum price, the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska would be absolutely right; but the farmers expect and no doubt in many, many cases and in many parts of the year will receive more than $2 per bushel. Therefore, it seems to me that one price, and that being a minimum price, is the proper policy to pursue; but if we were naming a maximum price, then, as I say, I think the suggestion of the Senator would be proper.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire to read just a few words from this amendment:

This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President or said board under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; it is an absolute minimum price, and that is what it ought to be. If those words were not put in the bill, then, under the provisions of the bill, there may have been a change even in that minimum price, less than $2; but the minimum price is made absolute at $2.

Mr. CURTIS. That is at the market center. The original provision fixes a flat price, and the amendment offered by me was drawn with that provision before me. I notice that the new amendment, the one just printed, contains the words "not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary market." The words "not less than" have been added to the original provision.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I want to say just one word in explanation of my vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota. As he is aware, I think, I am opposed to any price fixing in this bill; but if a price is to be fixed I think that the price for wheat under all the conditions should not be less than $2 per bushel. Hence I shall vote for his amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me first dispose, if I can, of the objection raised by the Senator from Kansas, which is that if there is a fixed price for wheat all of the wheat might be delivered immediately after harvesting.

That objection or difficulty can be easily met under the bill. Two dollars is named in the bill as the minimum price below which the board can not go, but the board can go above that price if it sees fit; and therefore if the board sees fit to regulate the flow of wheat by raising the prices a little from month to month, or fixing graduated prices applicable from month to month, the board can do so. That difficulty, therefore, ceases to be a difficulty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. Yes. I have only a moment, however, so I will ask the Senator to be just as brief as possible.

Mr. NORRIS. I was going to ask the Senator what, in his judgment, line 2, page 3 of the amendment means when it says "at the principal interior primary market"? Does not that confine it to one place?

Mr. REED. That should be "principal interior primary markets."

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me it ought to be plural.

Mr. REED. I have just spoken to the Senator in charge of the bill about it, and clearly the words "the principal interior primary market" ought not to be in the singular; they should be in the plural. I ask the Senator from Oregon to accept that amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have looked at it since the Senator spoke to me. It is intended to be "market." That is the price at the primary market, and the differences are adjusted by rules and regulations that may be adopted.

Mr. REED. Well, that would be highly unfair. I shall move the amendment, but I do not desire to speak of it now.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I make a brief statement?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CURTIS. I read from the original amendment, and the words "not less than" were not in it. It fixes the price at $1.75, which caused me to make the statement I did in regard to the flat price. I did not know that the words "not less than" had been added in the new amendment until I read it a few moments ago. The new print only reached our desks a short time ago.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that clears up that matter. Let me state this case very briefly as I see it.

World conditions are making high prices—high prices for everyone. When I say "world conditions" I eliminate therefrom unjust speculative movements, which ought to be, of course, reached by law, and hoarding and forestalling, which ought to be reached by law. But eliminating those conditions, world-wide conditions have made high prices for almost everything.

The farmer, like everybody else, buys his products affected by those world conditions. If you let the American farmer alone, and leave to him the world markets, he will accept them without complaint and will ask no favors or patronage at the hands of Congress. But, as everybody knows, we have taken away from the farmer his world market. We have done this first by giving to the President the right to declare a general embargo upon all exports, and that embargo is already being employed, so that it will control the products of the farmer. It was necessary to give this power in order to prevent our own food products being employed by our enemies to perpetuate the war against us.

In addition to the power of embargo and to its employment, we find that the allies have agreed upon a common agency through which to purchase their supplies, and it is pretty well understood that all neutral countries will purchase through that same agency or through some common agency. Thus, so far as the foreign market is concerned for the farmer's surplus, it is completely brought within one control, and that of course is equivalent to denying him the world competition. When we come to local conditions, home conditions, it is proposed in this bill to place in the hands of the food controller $150,000,000 to be used as a revolving fund so that he may go into the market and buy, and likewise he may go into the market and sell. Thus it is proposed and it is the intendment of the bill that the home market shall be controlled artificially. So we have taken away from the farmer both his foreign and his domestic market.

Mr. President, that might be done, and so far as the present crop is concerned it might result and probably would result in a low price for wheat, but if you were to so treat the farmer this year, then it is as certain as anything can be in the future that next year he would protect himself against further injustice or injury by limiting the amount of his product. Thus we would find that in the end the evil would fall upon the consumers in our great cities. They would be compelled to pay exorbitant prices because of underproduction.

In order to meet these conditions it seems, therefore, only fair and just that we shall by law guarantee to the farmer immunity from injury by virtue of the laws which we have enacted, for as we by law have taken away from him his open market by a law we ought to guarantee him something in lieu of that open market—a fair equivalent.

Mr. President, it is my opinion that it would be a mistake to place the figure in this bill at less than $2. If perchance that shall produce an unusually large crop next year, then we make it certain that the wheat can be kept, that the hungry world can be fed, and if there is a surplus it can be carried into the next year's crop; it will not be lost.

I believe that no greater mistake can be made than to alarm the great agricultural population of the country. Mark you, the farmer to-day is paying $60 and $65 a month for farm labor where a few years ago he paid but $15 a month. Mark you, he is paying an enormous advance upon everything that he consumes. Remember that the farmer is a consumer the same as all the rest of the people are consumers; and bear in mind, if you deprive the farmer of the assurance of good prices on his wheat the result will be that instead of planting a greater acreage he will plant only that which he and his family can harvest and care for, because he will not go to the hazard of employing exceptionally high-priced help in order to take care of his crop.

Mr. President, the last thing we ought to do is to disturb the source of supply. The one thing we can best do by such a bill as this is to assure a large production, and if too much is happily produced then the result will be reduced prices to the consumer.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have had the impression that the primary inspiration of the pending bill is the world's shortage of food supply. If that be true, the American farmer and the world farmer have the best guaranty of price that can be given. It is far more valid than any act of this body, omnipotent as we have assumed ourselves to be.

In passing, Mr. President, I must speak of that assumed omnipotence. Not a little has been said here about the omnipotence of the Executive. A Senate which undertakes to perfect a system of food regulation down to the last detail must assume omnipotence. Nay, more, any legislative body that seeks to reform human nature must be doubly omnipotent. I venture to make the remark now that the best-intentioned Congress in the world can not alter the tendencies of human nature. If any man thinks that Congress can legislate so that there shall be no profiteering, he is as much mistaken as the Kaiser was when he thought to eat his Christmas dinner in Paris in 1914. If any man thinks that there can be enacted a law for food control, for war taxation, to meet the exigencies of these difficult times and have it apply equitably and justly to all alike, he is very much mistaken.

I share the anxiety to strike at greed. I should like to strike at the greed for power. I would be agreeable to strike at the manifest greed in some agricultural sections of the United States. I am willing to join in striking at the greed of some of the great industrial institutions of the United States. Sometimes I am inclined to utter a warning to them that he who is in business in these difficult times, who expects to make an abnormal profit, is riding to his own destruction, because in the turmoil of the world this sort of thing is not going to be tolerated.

It does not make so very much difference what we say just now about the American Constitution. Government is a failure if it does not meet the requirements of the people who constitute that government. I do not know whether that is a Wilsonian doctrine or not; but in times like these the popular will is going to be very much insistent; and, manifestly, there has been created in this country an impression that food control will relieve a difficult war-time situation. Because of that, Mr. President, I am inclined to give my vote to a food dictatorship, because a food dictator can do what the Senate might well put aside as an impossible thing.

But, Mr. President, if Congress itself means to write into this law minimum or maximum prices we will fail, and I doubt if I can in good conscience give it my support.

Now, let us see where we arrive. All these problems of existence have an intimate relationship. Primarily this bill is designed for the American consumer. It is designed to meet a condition incident to the inordinately high cost of living that comes from the war, even more than to encourage production to meet the needs of war. Let us take the workingman whose wages, we will say, are $25 a week. Now, we are proposing to either adjust the price of wheat to that wage or higher than it ought to be for that wage. If you fix the price by law then there must be a readjustment of wage throughout all the lines of employment in this country, so the toiler may pay for bread at the prices established by legislative enactment.

Now, what difference does it make to that workingman whether he gets $25 a week and under the present cost of living has a margin, we will say, of $5 at the end of the week—I am putting it too high—or whether he makes $50 a week and has $10 left at the end of the week, when the $10 has only the purchasing power of $5 under former conditions? It is not what a man earns in the activities of life, it is what he has left after he has paid his expenses in earning it. If you fix the minimum price on wheat, which forms the great staff of life, then you must necessarily bring about a readjustment of wages throughout the country, which rate of wage conforms to that cost of living. Now, assume that we fix a $2 minimum price on wheat, and you readjust the wages in the United States of America to the basis of $2 wheat, double the normal top price in peace, then you will have doubled the cost of employment throughout the United States and will have fixed a scale 100 per cent higher than we had prior to the war. I should like to have some Senator on this floor, before we are called to vote on this question, tell me what the harvest will be when the war is ended—when readjustment comes.

Mr. President, I know what the country is calling for. I know at the same time that the country is very much mistaken in the impressions it has as to what will result from this bill, but there has been created a state of mind throughout the United States that Congress is going to provide for an adjustment of the food situation. The American farmer, so far as I know him, is reconciled to this proposition. He is the one first affected. I have a letter on my desk from an Ohio farmer who tells me that $1.50 wheat would be highly acceptable to the farmers of our State, but he closes his letter very significantly and says, "In the name of God, why does not Congress act?"

I do not think it will bring about the desired relief; but I venture to say, Mr. President, that if the qualities of American patriotism are such that you must guarantee the American farmer a price for his wheat in the face of a world famine, then there is not patriotism enough in this country to win the war.

Mr. President, I saw a letter yesterday from one of the executive or administrative departments of the Government to a great industrial institution, and, without my giving to the Senate now the name or the particular article ordered, let me say that that official letter said, "Gentlemen, you are directed and hereby ordered to deliver to the United States, at such and such a point, so many tons of a certain article, for which you will be paid so much per ton. We will allow you approximately 80 per cent of the price named for this article, and if you are not satisfied with the price the balance can be properly adjusted." I have not the exact language. In short, Mr. President, the Government takes the captain of industry and says, "You are hereby directed to do so and so," and the captain of industry to whom this letter was addressed said to a Member of this body, in writing concerning it, that a previous contract at the same rate had been executed at a loss.

Mr. President, if America is going to win this war the workingmen of the United States, the captains of industry of the United States, the farmers of the United States, and the professional men of the United States must say, "These are our offerings of material, of strength, of talent, of industry, of cash, and of blood; take them in the name of our common country; let us win this war for continued American nationality."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment. I shall vote for it because it does fix some standard of value, and that standard of value, to my mind, is a reasonable standard. I am not deceiving myself one moment with the belief that that standard will ever be put into effect. It is simply discretionary with the President of the United States, and he may exercise that power to encourage the production of crops if he sees fit.

There is another section—section 8—of the bill that does subject every bushel of food cereals in the United States to condemnation or to seizure under the war power to requisition or commandeer. I believe before we get through with this war section 8 will be put into force. I have no assurance that section 12 will be left in the bill at all. It may be destroyed entirely in conference, but the influence that it will have in producing in the minds of the Senators and Representatives what is considered to be a reasonable price for grain will have some effect. I do not desire to place the price very much higher than that.

There is another feature that has not been considered by the Senate. You do not fix any price for corn; you fix no price for barley or rye or oats. If I were a farmer and no price was fixed for corn or oats or barley, next year I would put every acre into wheat at the minimum price of $2 a bushel, and I would plant no corn; I would plant no rye and no barley. I am fearful that if you put in too much and make the price of wheat too great you will have an enormous surplus of wheat without a corresponding production of corn and rye and oats.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he is not aware of the fact that the price of wheat fixes the price of corn and barley and rye; that the prices are ever maintained in the same relation?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not always, Mr. President; but there is some relation.

Mr. NELSON. The price of corn to-day is $4 a bushel. The distillers are buying it at $4 a bushel. The price of wheat is only $2.30 a bushel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have stated that I do not believe section 12 will ever be put in force. I am especially desirous of bringing to the attention of the Senate again the propriety of placing in section 8 the same provision that we have placed in a provision for commandeering the coal of the country. You who by your votes stated that you would not fix the same rule to measure the farmer's product say to him, what? You say that he shall not be treated with the same consideration which you accord to the producers of anything else which you may take for the benefit of the Army and the Navy.

I know what the meaning is, Mr. President. You say to the farmer, "You have heretofore lived for your bed and your board and your clothing. You can get along with one suit of clothes a year, and you can wear it two years with necessary patching, as you have done in the past, and one suit for Sunday. That is sufficient for you. You never had anything to the good at the end of the year heretofore. With a mortgage upon your farm, why should you be so presumptuous as to ask now that the Government by any rule should put you in any better place?" A boy is sent to the nearest little town to hire labor, and he brings home a man, and the one whom he selects is from the I-won't-work class. You have got to pay him, according to the latest returns from my State, from $3.50 to $4.50 per day, and he works leisurely five or six or seven hours in the day. You say to that boy, who works 16 hours per day, "We will not allow you a compensation of $60 a month; we will not allow you such a price for your products as will assure you what you pay for these tramps." You say to the good housewife, "You have got along heretofore with one calico and one gingham dress and two gingham aprons a year; if you have lived in the past and got your board and that much, and have raised a family by working 14 hours a day, and then sent the family into town to make a living, why, that is all you are entitled to." I want to say to that wife, "You shall receive for your labors as much as you pay," as I said yesterday, "to your colored cook in the city of Washington or any other city."

Mr. LEWIS rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not yield now. When you do that you bring your wheat up to more than $2 a bushel, and I want to assure you that that will be the result.

My good friend from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] stated yesterday that he could raise wheat in Ohio with the land they have there at $1 a bushel and make money. Oh, Mr. President, I would advise my State to hire the Senator from Ohio next year, and to pay him a million dollars for his services, to teach our farmers how to raise wheat in the State of North Dakota for a dollar a bushel.

But let us analyze that proposition. Good farm land in Ohio is worth from $100 to $150 an acre. Six per cent upon that investment means from $6 to $9 an acre, merely upon the money invested in the land alone. Then you have got to add a dollar or two dollars an acre besides that, for the money invested in farm machinery. Then you hire these I. W. W.'s on that farm for $4.50 a day. Do you then tell me that you can raise wheat for $1 a bushel? You can not raise it for $4 a bushel. Of course, if you say to the farmer, who has already earned his farm by the savings of a hundred years on his part and on the part of his ancestors, "You work for your board and get nothing else but a suit of clothes and a pair of overalls"; if you say to the good wife, "Be satisfied with your gingham and your calico dress and your board," of course, you can raise wheat for that price.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I was merely intending to ask a question of the Senator from Minnesota or the Senator from North Dakota, if I should be recognized, but the Senator has taken his seat, and, of course, I can not ask him unless I am recognized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I only want to ask the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Minnesota, did I correctly understand the statement that corn is $4 a bushel?

Mr. McCUMBER. I did not make that statement.

Mr. NELSON. I make the statement that the cash price of corn to-day in Chicago is $4 a bushel—not the future price.

Mr. LEWIS. I was merely seeking information. I represent a great corn State, and I was interested in that fact, in view of my vote on the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have the quotations here.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if I can have the floor, as I have the market reports in my hand, I shall be delighted to read them, because I esteem the Senator from Minnesota so highly that I want him to be set aright. Spot corn sold in Chicago to-day at $2.02; September corn at $1.62¼ to $1.62¾; December corn at $1.15¼ to $1.15½.

Spot corn in Baltimore——

Mr. NELSON. Those prices, I think, refer to futures.

Mr. HARDING. No; I have the price of spot corn right here in the Baltimore market for to-day, July 20. I think perhaps this is authority. Baltimore, as I understand—I am not defending the distillers—is in a distilling district. Spot corn sold to-day in Baltimore at $2.02¾ per bushel, and the receipts were 63,000 bushels.

Before I take my seat, Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who has talked about farm wages, calico dresses, and all that, that I know of nothing more beautiful in all the world than a charming country girl in a fresh calico dress starting out for a Sunday ride.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is taking my time, but I am willing to allow him to make these observations. I have not had the experience which seems to have been his, but I am willing to appropriate that which has been his, if I can experience the joys of the Senator. This is where I "acknowledge the corn." [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDING. I hope I do ample credit to the junior Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the object of this bill is to stimulate production and to conserve the food supply. It is not meant to be wholly in the interest of the farmer but in the interest of the consumer as well. It is expected to adjust the prices equitably both to the producer and the consumer.

Mr. President, I am thinking a good deal to-day of the people in the densely populated sections of the country. This discussion has proceeded as if we were only considering the farmer. In this Nation perhaps 65 per cent of the people are engaged in industries and 35 per cent in agriculture. I live in the great city of New York and represent in this Chamber a State which is first in population, first in industry, and among the first in agriculture. Because of our great population this bill means more to my people than to any other State in the Union. Much has been said here, Mr. President, of the wage of the farmer. Do you realize, Senators, that at least one-fourth of the men in the city of New York, of its population of approximately 6,000,000, receive an average year-around wage of less than $13 a week? The distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] remarked a moment ago that the farmers in his State receive $4.50 a day.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; 20 cents.

Mr. CALDER. I understood the Senator to make that statement in his colloquy with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

Mr. McCUMBER. I said the farmers of my State had to go to town and hire one of your I. W. W.'s and pay $4.50 a day to him.

Mr. CALDER. At any rate, Mr. President, the farm laborer to-day receives wages equal to, if not greater, than many of the laboring men in our large cities.

I am in favor of this measure; I am in favor of giving to the food commission the right to fix the minimum price on certain farm products. I shall vote for that because I believe the very fact that we give the right to fix a minimum price will stimulate industry. I shall not vote to fix a price here, because perhaps within a month the price we fix may be too low or it may be too high. If we fix a minimum price of $2 a bushel for wheat, that does not necessarily mean that the farmer will only get $2 a bushel. He may get $3 a bushel; he may within a year get $4 a bushel for wheat. If we fix the minimum price at $1.50 a bushel, perhaps it may be deemed unwise almost before the bill becomes a law.

So I say, Mr. President, in the interest of the whole country, in the interest of the producer, who, after all, we must encourage to produce the things that the people in the cities need—in his interest first, and in the interest of the great consuming masses of this Nation, it seems to me that the best interests of all will be conserved if we leave to the food commission, in its judgment, the right to fix the minimum prices as we go along in the years before us.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has touched upon the thought that has been agitating me during the day while I have listened to this particular discussion. This question seems to me two-sided. It is not alone a question which involves the stimulation of production by fixing a price to the farmers of the Nation, but as well there is involved the consideration as to what the fixing of that price may mean to all the others of the Nation; for it would be of little value to us to stimulate production, to fix a minimum price, and then have flour manufactured and bread made that the rest of our citizens, who constitute the great majority, could never obtain under the price that we fix.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FLETCHER in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I am advised by those who control the food administration that at $2 a bushel to the farmer for wheat bread can be sold to the consumer at 5 cents a loaf.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That was exactly the inquiry that I desired to put to those who are experts upon the subject. I confess that I am not. What does $2 per bushel minimum price for wheat mean when it comes to the price of flour? What does it mean in bread to the great body of consumers of the Nation? I will be very glad to have a response from any of those who are familiar with the subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. It means the equivalent of 75 loaves of bread for each bushel. The Senator can figure it out for himself.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. What does it mean in the price of flour?

Mr. McCUMBER. There are 4½ bushels of wheat to one barrel of flour.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I will say that it takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. Therefore, $2 a bushel for wheat would be the equivalent of $9 for a barrel of flour, but about 70 pounds of feedstuffs, bran and shorts, are derived from the wheat in the milling process. During the present year, on account of the scarcity of feed, that millstuff or feedstuff has averaged from 1½ to 2 cents a pound. So, taking four bushels and a half of wheat to a barrel of flour, it costs the millers $9, but they have the profit derived from the sale of the bran and shorts, which under present prices would bring them upward of $1.50 for every barrel of flour milled.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. So I take it that those of us who are interested in the subject of the inquiry may understand then that a minimum price of $2 per bushel for wheat would mean an actual cost of flour in the market of about $9 per barrel, and would mean bread at 5 cents a loaf.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I may say, if the Senator from California will permit me, that several weeks ago in a talk with Mr. Hoover he told me that $1.75 a bushel would mean about $9.50 for a barrel of flour.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If that estimate be correct, then with $2 wheat the price of a barrel of flour would be about $12.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; I would be very glad to secure information. This is something that we wish to know about, so that we may justly decide both sides of this question.

Mr. GRONNA. I care not whether made by Mr. Hoover, the Senator from New York, or anyone else, the statement that $1.75 wheat means $9.50 for flour is absolutely untrue. It is incorrect. The Senator from Minnesota gave the figures. It takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. I have figured it out, and taking the bran at $20 a ton—and it never sells for less——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will pardon me, my time is very limited, but if the Senator will answer me a question I will be delighted.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Would $2 per bushel for wheat enable us to buy flour at $9 a barrel?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir, and it will pay the miller a good profit—$1.05 a barrel.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is the exact point I wanted to know. That will enable us to have bread at 5 cents a loaf, as I understand the Senator from Kansas. We settle, then, those two propositions. It would be perfectly absurd for us, of course, to endeavor to fix a minimum price which would stimulate production and then make it impossible for our great purchasing public to obtain the very thing the production of which we are endeavoring to stimulate.

I have just sat, Mr. President, for six long weeks on a committee investigating a strike of the street railway employees of the city of Washington. I found in that investigation that men who had worked 25 and 30 years as platform men for a street railway company received in this city, the Capital of the Nation, between $60 and $70 per month, and some of those men had families of three, four, five, and six children. I am very glad to fix a price of wheat profitable to our farmers, but I am not prepared to fix a price upon wheat in this Nation which will not enable a man working for between $60 and $70 a month in the Capital of the Nation to obtain bread during this period of crisis and of peril.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I shall first support the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], who is not only a practical farmer but who has given careful study to this problem. If that amendment fails, I shall support the substitute offered by the committee, with the amendments tendered by my distinguished colleague [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. President, I offered an amendment to this section providing that the minimum price of wheat from the passage of this act to the 1st day of January, 1919, shall be $2 per bushel for

No. 2 northern, based on the Chicago market. I shall not press that amendment, because I think the other amendments tendered better meet the present situation, and I am not particular whose amendment I vote for, just so it accomplishes the desired purpose.

Personally, Mr. President, I would prefer not to fix the minimum price of wheat in the bill. I believe that not to do so would give better general results in the long run; but I feel that the sentiment of the Senate, which is responsive to the sentiment of the country, is to the effect that the price should now be fixed owing to the present situation and the unreasonable delay in the passage of this bill. The farmers are demanding to know what the price of wheat will be next year. They are getting ready for the coming crop, and I think they now prefer that Congress itself fix a definite reasonable minimum price rather than leave it to the uncertain arbitrary action of some board.

As bearing on this question, I have here a letter from Prof. Henry J. Waters, president of the Agricultural College of Kansas, and who is also chairman of the Kansas State Council of Defense, which I ask, Mr. President, to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, as I have not the opportunity in my limited time to read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 19, 1917.

HON. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Answering your inquiry regarding the necessity of fixing a minimum price on wheat, will say that because of high-priced seed, labor, and machinery, the farmers of Kansas will hesitate to sow a normal wheat acreage unless they are protected against a possible decline in price if the war should end before the crop is sold.

The farmers in the wheat belt consider that $2 at their station or $2.25 at Chicago as a reasonable minimum price. This is about equivalent to $1.75 last year, and perhaps no more than $1.25 at their station two years ago.

An accurate survey made by the defense council shows that Kansas farmers will seed a million acres less of wheat this year than last unless a reasonable price is fixed. Preparation of land and arrangements for the purchase of seed must be made now, hence a minimum price that will stimulate winter-wheat production for next year must be fixed immediately.

Comparison is frequently made between wheat prices in this country and in Europe. Wages, rent, machinery, and standards of living are much higher here than there. It would be just as fair to try to base American wages on European wages as to attempt to base the American wheat prices on European prices.

Very cordially, yours,

H. J. WATERS,
Chairman Kansas State Council of Defense.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, one of the principal objects of this bill is to increase production. The farmers of the hard-wheat belt of Kansas, Oklahoma, and Nebraska suffered severe losses last winter by winter killing. In many counties of my State they produced less than the seed they planted. While the original total acreage of the State was about 9,000,000, which is a good average for Kansas, it was reduced by winter killing to only 3,325,320 acres.

Mr. President, to stimulate production under conditions when the farmer has lost nearly two-thirds of his crop we must offer some special inducement. I think this bill will accomplish the purpose, and, notwithstanding their losses and despite the very high prices of feed, labor, seed, and machinery, I believe that the farmers of Kansas are more than willing to do their part in the present emergency. As evidence of this, I want the country to know that they are now planning, through the help of the State council of defense, to double their acreage, so that it will next year amount to about 18,000,000 acres, hoping and fully expecting to produce 200,000,000 bushels of wheat, and thereby lead the States of the Union in contributions to the world in the most needed product at this time. While we have this great loss of crop this year, it gives some encouragement for the future, for Government statistics show that in Kansas one failure has not followed another in the last 20 years. So, although we produced only 42,000,000 bushels of wheat this year, there is every reason to believe that with this increased acreage and the bright prospect we will be again the banner wheat State of the Nation, which is the agricultural ambition of Kansas at this time. If we pass this bill as amended, according to the suggestions which have been made here, I have no doubt but Kansas will again bountifully respond to the call of the Nation in this great crisis.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I shall not discuss the amendment before the Senate. I wish, in a few minutes, to discuss another amendment, the only one I have proposed or shall propose. That amendment is as follows:

The sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to aid in the support and proper maintenance of educational sanitariums or other like institutions organized for the care and industrial education of soldiers and sailors of the United States crippled or disabled as the result of injuries received by them in the line of duty. The President is hereby authorized and empowered to distribute said funds hereby appropriated to such sanitariums or other like institutions in such amounts and in such manner as in his judgment will best promote the purposes for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. President, I desire to read a part of an article appearing in a St. Louis paper. I am not able to give the name of the paper. It came to me as a clipping:

WHITE CROSS FOUNDED IN ST. LOUIS—ORGANIZATION OF NEW RELIEF BODY APPROVED BY "AD." CONVENTION—CARE FOR MAIMED SOLDIERS—ORGANIZATION EXPECTED TO SPREAD ALL OVER THE UNITED STATES.

A St. Louis movement, which is expected to become national in scope, to take care of the soldiers maimed and crippled in the war, yesterday was indorsed at the convention of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World. It is planned to call it the "White Cross."

The National Hospital-School for Cripples was organized by a score of St. Louis women several weeks ago and was granted a charter by the State on June 2.

The organization, which has gained more than 1,000 members in a remarkably short time, has the following officers—

And then it gives a list of among the leading and most prominent ladies of the city of St. Louis. The remainder of the article I will ask to have inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

President, Mrs. J. G. Nugent; treasurer, Mrs. Colin M. Selph; chairman, Mrs. A. E. Morgan; secretary, Mrs. Charles H. McDaris; corresponding secretary, Mrs. F. H. Littlefield; vice presidents, Mrs. W. H. Hudson, Mrs. John C. Roberts, and Mrs. E. P. Melson. Gov. Fred D. Gardner and Postmaster Selph are members of the advisory board.

The plan of the organization is to retrain and reeducate all of the soldiers who return from the war crippled. The association also has pledged itself to educate all crippled children of sound mind who are not taken care of through the present educational system of the schools.

The present medical staff of the hospital are Dr. Alexander E. Horwitz, Dr. Julius Rotteck, Dr. Cleveland H. Shutt, Dr. I. Lee Kelly, jr., Dr. Max W. Jacobs, and Dr. J. J. Houwink.

A campaign to get a membership of 25,000 and to raise funds to establish a permanent hospital will be started in a few weeks, following the drive of the Red Cross.

Mr. STONE. I also have a copy of a letter sent to me from St. Louis, addressed to the Council of National Defense. I will ask to have that inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., June 25, 1917.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: A news report in this morning's St. Louis Globe-Democrat advises that a number of physicians have made a report to the medical board of your body with reference to the education and training of maimed and crippled soldiers and sailors.

Inclosed is a copy of the constitution of the National Hospital-School for Cripples, which is self-explanatory.

This organization was incorporated by the State of Missouri as a benevolent corporation on June 2, 1917. Since that time and while the general plans were being worked out its membership in the city of St. Louis alone has grown to nearly 5,000 without any intensive effort. Within the next two weeks the St. Louis membership will have totaled more than 25,000. A definite working organization has been evolved. It is now ready to forge ahead. It has already been established and proven that the idea, which is known as the White Cross, finds a ready response in the hearts of our people. Within the next 90 days the White Cross idea will have spead throughout the entire United States and its membership will have reached the million mark.

An organization has been perfected. The advisory board in St. Louis is composed of 150 of the most prominent citizens—male and female. Among others are the governor of the State and the postmaster of the city of St. Louis, and others as influential though perhaps less prominent.

The idea has received the enthusiastic indorsement of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World, the United Spanish War Veterans of Missouri, the Egyptian Hustlers (an organization of traveling salesmen of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Kentucky), and many minor organizations. All of these have not only pledged themselves to membership but have agreed to put forth their individual efforts when called upon.

Inclosed you will find clippings from the various papers showing the impetus that has already been given to the movement. The idea has sprung from the existence of a similar organization in England and to which the English public has subscribed the sum of £700,000. The inceptors of this movement felt it to be a subject for private charity and that inasmuch as the governments of other lands had left the matter to the initiative and generosity of their citizens, such should be done in the United States.

If, in accordance with the above-mentioned newspaper item, it is the council's intention to take up the matter in addition to its other arduous duties, the National Hospital-School for Cripples desires the cooperation of the council, or should the matter be considered a proper subject of direct governmental action, then it desires to cooperate with and aid the movement whenever and wherever possible.

It should be noted that the idea of the White Cross is feasible as a private charity since the Red Cross, an organization operating on identical lines, has just raised a sum of money in excess of $100,000,000, thereby relieving the Government and administration of all expenses and responsibility.

Inasmuch as the National Hospital-School for Cripples is at present directing most of its work to prepare for the care and retraining of the crippled soldiers and sailors, it would appreciate an immediate and direct advice as to what action is to be taken by the Council for Defense, to the end that should the Government take up the work, the energy and finance of the National Hospital-School for Cripples can be devoted to its more permanent end—the care and education and training of the crippled child, whose numbers in the United States count up to approximately 300,000.

Very truly, yours,

NATIONAL HOSPITAL-SCHOOL FOR CRIPPLES,
MRS. J. G. NUGENT, President.

Mr. STONE. The letter gives a history—a brief history, of course—of this movement organized in St. Louis, and which has the indorsement of a number of organizations of greater or less importance. Among other things, attention is called to the fact that in England £700,000 have been appropriated to support institutions of this kind. I have asked to have the letter inserted in the RECORD, because I have not time to read it, and I do not think many Senators would listen to it if I did.

I also ask to have inserted the articles of incorporation of the organization, headquarters of which are located at St. Louis, known as the White Cross. I wish to have these papers in the RECORD for future reference at least, whether anything comes of it now or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ARTICLES OF AGREEMENT OF NATIONAL HOSPITAL-SCHOOL FOR CHILDREN.

Know all men by these presents:

That the undersigned residents of the State of Missouri, desiring to establish hospital schools for cripples for educational purposes, as in these articles set forth, do hereby associate themselves together and form an association to be incorporated under and pursuant to the provisions of article 10 of chapter 33 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, 1909, and acts amendatory thereof, and do hereby adopt for the said corporation the following:

CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I.

Name: The name of the corporation shall be National Hospital-School for Cripples.

ARTICLE II.

Location: The location of this corporation shall be at the city of St. Louis and State of Missouri.

ARTICLE III.

Objects: The objects and purposes of this corporation shall be:

First. For the purpose of reducing mendicancy, vagrancy, and pauperism; to promote the educational, moral, mental, spiritual, and physical betterment of all crippled children of mental power, and of all persons who may be now or hereafter become crippled or disabled on account of having participated in any lawful war to which these United States shall be or become a party.

Second. To promote social service among crippled children and crippled soldiers as above.

Third. To promote the employment of crippled children and crippled soldiers as above under the name of the National Hospital-School for Cripples.

Fourth. To initiate, promote, and aid in the passage of such legislation—municipal, State, or National—as will further the educational facilities and opportunities of crippled children and crippled soldiers as above and concerning any other matter conducive to the needs, objects, and purposes of this corporation.

Fifth. To own, operate, erect, or maintain, or assist in the erection, maintenance, and operation of schools, industrial colleges, universities, and hospitals, wholly or in part especially constructed, equipped, and fitted for the training, education, and medical and surgical treatment of crippled children and crippled soldiers, as above, in which shall be taught such trades, occupations, or professions as in the discretion of this corporation may be suitable and practicable to the physical and mental needs of the individual requirement.

Sixth. To solicit, receive, hold, manage, and dispose of all money and property—real, personal, or mixed—which may from time to time be given, loaned, conveyed, devised, bequeathed, or endowed in any manner to the said corporation for the objects and purposes aforesaid, and to sell, pledge, transfer, and mortgage the same. And the said corporation shall have the power to recognize or cause to be recognized, affiliate, or cooperate with such auxiliary persons, societies, associations, or corporations as in its judgment may be useful to promote or further any or all of the objects and purposes of this corporation.

Seventh. To provide or aid in providing the necessary medical or surgical treatment for any crippled child and crippled soldier, as above, in whose welfare this corporation is concerned.

Eighth. This corporation shall be forever exclusively charitable, nonsectarian, and nonpartisan, and shall be operated solely through humanitarian motives and for the purposes heretofore set forth, and, as it is not formed for pecuniary profit, all money and property and income and the increase thereof, if any, shall be held by the corporation upon express trust to apply and use the same for the purposes aforesaid.

ARTICLE IV.

The membership of this corporation shall consist of the signers hereof and such other persons as may be hereafter admitted as members of this corporation under and in pursuance of the by-laws of this corporation.

ARTICLE V.

The first officers of this corporation shall be: President, Mrs. James J. Nugent; secretary, Dr. Julius Rotteck; and treasurer, Mrs. Colin N. Selph.

ARTICLE VI.

In the event that it should become necessary, in the judgment of the membership of this corporation, to dissolve this corporation and abandon the objects for which it has been formed, then in that event all of the assets, both real and personal, of this corporation shall be sold and the proceeds thereof applied in payment of the debts of this corporation and the remainder, if any, shall be given to the Red Cross Society in part or all or to any other association or society that this corporation may choose: Provided, That in the absence of any other choice the Red Cross Society shall receive same.

ARTICLE VII.

First meeting: The first meeting of this corporation for the adoption of by-laws and for the transaction of such other matters and business as may properly come before it shall be held at the city of St. Louis, Mo., at 10 o'clock a. m., on the 14th day of June, 1917. No further notice need be given of such meeting. Other meetings of this corporation shall be held as provided by the by-laws.

ARTICLE VIII.

This constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote of the membership present at any annual meeting or any special meeting called for that purpose: Provided, That notice of the proposed amendment or amendments shall be given as provided by the by-laws.

Mr. STONE. Now, Mr. President, just a word.

This bill is a conservation measure. You are proposing to conserve coal and fuel for the factory, to conserve feed for animals, and to conserve food for men. I propose here, by this amendment, to aid organizations, established and being established, for the conservation of men themselves.

We can well anticipate that out of this war in the very near future thousands of men will be sent home from the fields and the hospitals of Europe, blind, armless, legless, or in part so; so wounded and disabled as to be unfit to earn a livelihood. The purpose of these good women is to establish a sanitarium school devoted to the education or reeducation of these unfortunate soldiers of the Republic, to aid them to live, to earn a living in the future, and, by earning a living, by having employment, to enjoy life to a degree far in excess of what would be possible if they should become mere dependents upon the charity of the Nation.

I wanted to say this much now, for I shall have no chance to say it to-morrow. I shall have a chance to have the amendment voted on; whatever is the result. I wish to make this feeble, humble effort to encourage the most laudable movement among the good men and women of the Nation.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, unless the Senate desires to keep this bill before it this evening, I was going to suggest an executive session. I do not want to do it, however, if there is a desire that the Senate remain in session to-night.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I simply wish to inquire of the Senator from Oregon what disposition, if any, was made of the Pomerene amendment. Has that been acted on? I was called out of the Chamber.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It has not been acted on.

Mr. KNOX. It has gone over until to-morrow, has it?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator in charge of the bill will permit an evening session. Otherwise, those who have had independent amendments to offer will have no opportunity to say a word about them, because at 2.30 o'clock to-morrow we begin to vote on the amendments, and there will be no time then to explain them.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was going to suggest to the Senator that if we take a recess I shall ask that it be until 10 o'clock to-morrow. My only reason for suggesting an executive session now is that I do not believe we can keep a quorum here to-night if anybody suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think anybody will suggest it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Well, those who have amendments will not have a chance to explain them.

Mr. PENROSE. You will not get a quorum for an evening session, Mr. President.

AURELIO COLLAZO (S. DOC. NO. 65).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Acting Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point at the expense of the Government of Cuba.

The Acting Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of Cuba, and that it would follow established precedents.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 20, 1917.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—SHIPPING BOARD.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to a question which is of personal privilege. On the 17th of this month, while I was addressing the Senate on the food-control bill, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] interrupted me and made a statement relative to the Navy Department in connection with supplies. In the heat of debate I made reply, thinking at the time that the Shipping Board was under the control of the Navy Department and that the proposition to purchase ships was in control of that department. So I replied that there were reported scandals in connection with the building and purchase of ships and the purchase of supplies connected with the Navy.

I also had in mind the fact that the naval program which had been adopted during the last two or three years had been greatly delayed and that insufficient progress had been made. As to supplies purchased by the Navy Department, I do not think its efforts in this direction are publicly known. I repeat, I was also thinking of the transactions which have occurred and been reported in relation to the Shipping Board, and such transactions prompted my reply to the Senator from Tennessee.

That was an injustice to the Navy Department, because I knew then, if I had thought, and I know now upon deliberation, that the Navy Department has nothing to do with the transactions of the Shipping Board. Therefore I desire to make this correction, because I am not a "muckraker" and I do not wish to make any statements that are contrary to the facts or which would improperly reflect upon any man, in or out of the Government. I make this statement now in order that the statement made by me in the heat of debate and without due consideration shall not improperly reflect upon the Navy Department.

MOBILIZATION OF STATE TROOPS.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, day before yesterday the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] had inserted in the RECORD an editorial from a Boston newspaper relative to a protest which had been made by New England Senators in regard to the transfer of New England National Guardsmen to the South, a proposal which created more or less controversy, and which protest at the time had not been answered by the Secretary of War, as I stated during my discussion of the subject. When I returned to my office I found a reply from the Secretary of War to the protest which had been made, and I think, in justice to the War Department, that the reply should be put in the RECORD.

I desire to call attention to one paragraph of the reply, giving, in fact, the only practical reason for sending these troops to the South, and that is that a considerable expense will have to be incurred if these troops are to remain in Massachusetts. I think I ought to say that the Commonwealth has provided ample camp grounds and it has armories sufficient to house all its National Guardsmen, so it would not cost the Government any considerable amount, if anything, to retain these troops in Massachusetts until they are ready to be transported to the front in Europe.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, let me inquire of my colleague if the National Guard, as a matter of fact, are not now in camp there?

Mr. WEEKS. A large portion of the National Guard, at least two regiments, are in camp at Framingham now, and two regiments of light artillery are at another camp. There is ample provision made in this respect for all the Massachusetts troops.

Mr. LODGE. And they will be kept there until the National Government is able to take them elsewhere in September.

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. LODGE. So that the grounds can be used?

Mr. WEEKS. Undoubtedly.

I want to emphasize the fact, Mr. President, that, if cold weather comes on before these men are sent to Europe, the Commonwealth has ample armory facilities for every man in the National Guard. I ask that the letter from the Secretary of War be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, if there is no objection.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 16, 1917.

Hon. JOHN W. WEEKS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The letter of July 12, 1917, signed by yourself and other Senators from the New England States, has received the careful consideration which its subject merits. I am very glad to furnish you the following information concerning the plans of the War Department for the training of the National Guard after it has been drafted into the military service of the United States under the second paragraph, section 1, of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917.

It is intended to send the National Guard, or such units thereof as are properly equipped and trained, to join the American expeditionary force in France before the additional forces authorized by the act above, now called the National Army, can be sent. When the plans for mobilizing these two forces were drawn it was not known how soon the National Army could be assembled under the draft. The National Guard having already in its possession some equipment and having, after several months service on the border, received a certain measure of training, it was believed that that force could be more promptly dispatched to France than the National Army, which at the time the plans were approved had not been authorized by Congress.

Plans for the dispatch of our forces to France depend not only upon their training and equipment, but also upon the availability of sufficient tonnage for transportation. Had it been possible to assure before winter transportation to France for the National Guard of all States in the North it is quite possible that my advisers would have recommended that the National Guard be placed in cantonments in the North. Had such plan been proposed and given effect, and tonnage been insufficient, the approach of winter would have found the National Guard in a climate where out-of-door training would have been impracticable. It would then have been necessary, after considerable expenditure for the construction of cantonments, to transport them to the South, build new cantonments, and possibly return them to a northern harbor for embarkation. Hence it was decided to construct cantonment shelter for the National Guard in the South.

After sites had been selected for many of the divisions of the National Guard and the National Army it was reported by the officer in charge of cantonment construction that, due to the price of material, the sum of money appropriated for cantonment construction would be sufficient for only about half the number (32) of cantonments planned. It was also reported that the construction of half the number of cantonments could be completed by September 1, 1917, but not by July, the month in which it had been planned to call the National Guard into the military service. This month was selected because, due to the lack of clothing and other equipment, it was believed impracticable to complete the equipment of the Regular Army with all its increments before July, and it was not desirable to call the National Guard before it was possible to supply the necessary equipment.

Because of the impracticability of constructing 32 cantonments with the funds appropriated it was decided, as the National Guard had then in its possession a certain amount of tentage and the War Department could reasonably hope to supply the necessary complement by the end of July, to place the National Guard under canvas, in order that their training might not longer be delayed, and to confine cantonment construction to the sites selected in various divisional areas for the National Army.

You correctly assume that it is hoped to send the National Guard to France within a reasonable time, but it is manifestly impracticable with the limited tonnage available to transport all the National Guard of the Northern States to France before cold weather, even if the dispatch of the divisions of the Regular Army be postponed for that purpose. If the National Guard of the New England division should be camped in New England considerable expenditure will be necessary at the site selected. On the approach of cold weather it will be necessary to transport them to the South and to spend an equal amount on the construction of a camp there. In the sites which have been selected training of the National Guard may be continued throughout the winter. During the winter, if not before, it is hoped that sufficient tonnage will be available for the dispatch of most of the National Guard to France; namely, those divisions properly equipped and trained for service in war.

I can assure you that every step taken by the War Department for the organization and training of all our military forces has been prompted solely by the desire to further the prosecution of the war in such a manner as to effect the best results. It is impossible to foresee what difficulties may arise in the future, but the present plans of the War Department are so framed as to provide for the training of each portion of the Army as soon as equipment can be furnished, and to dispatch each portion of the Army to France as soon as it is trained and equipped and tonnage becomes available.

Very sincerely,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR POMERENE (S. DOC. NO. 66).

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, on the 29th of June last the Michigan State Bar Association invited the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] to deliver an address at their annual meeting in Grand Rapids, and that address has been commended so highly by everyone who heard it that I feel it ought to be widely circulated, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NATIONAL DEFENSE.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I submit the following proposed amendment to Senate bill 1786, proposing to amend the national defense act by fixing the ratio of Army medical officers with a memoranda of facts and argument justifying the proposed amendment, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD, together with the memoranda.

The health and the sanitary, medical, and surgical care of our beloved young men we are sending to battle is vital.

The history of all past wars demonstrates conclusively that the line officer, whose mind is steeled and trained to defy danger, can not realize the vital importance of the advice of the Medical Department, and must have the advice come from officers of high or like rank before he will realize the advice must be respected.

There being no objection, the amendment and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On page 7, line 20, insert the following at the end of section 10:

Provided, That hereafter the commissioned officers of the Medical Corps of the Regular Army shall be distributed in the several grades as follows:

	Per cent.
Major generals	0.25
Brigadier generals	.25
Colonels	4.00
Lieutenant colonels	8.00
Majors	23.5
Captains	32.0
Lieutenants	32.0
	87.5
	100.00

Provided, That when called into service the numbers of the officers of the Medical Reserve Corps shall be seven to the thousand of men in the National Guard and National Army and the relative grades of the officers of the Medical Reserve Corps shall be the same as the grades of the Regular Army.

The President shall have authority to appoint officers of either corps as "consultants," with the duty of acting in an advisory capacity, making inspections and reports on medical, surgical, or sanitary questions, and such other duties as may be required by the chief of the Medical Department.

Memorandum relating to amendment proposed by Senator OWEN to the Senate bill 1786 (amending national-defense act as reported June 8, 1917) to fix ratio of Army medical officers.

The following memorandum comprises editorials from Victor C. Vaughn, M. D., editor in chief, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, Mich., professor of hygiene, and data justifying proposed amendment.

Prof. Vaughn is the chairman of the legislative committee of the general medical board of the Council of National Defense, and his views represent the views of the medical profession of the United States without a known exception. These views are supported by every member of the executive committee of the general medical board of the Council of National Defense, including such men as Dr. Franklin Martin, of Chicago, chairman, one of the most distinguished men in the United States; Dr. William J. Mayo, Rochester, Minn., no abler surgeon in the world; Dr. William H. Welch, of Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md., formerly chairman of the American Medical Association; Surg. Gen. William C. Gorgas, of the United States Army; Surg. Gen. William C. Braisted, of the United States Navy; Surg. Gen. Rupert Blue, United States Public Health Service. Indeed, the members of the medical profession of distinction in every State in the Union and, for that matter, throughout the world:

ARE WE TO FORGET THE LESSONS OF 1898?

This is a question now being asked by medical men all over this country. We have no desire to recall the sad story of typhoid fever epidemic among our soldiers in 1898 unless we may profit by doing so. It may be well for us to remember that out of a total of 200,000 enlisted men in that war, more than 20,000 developed this disease. But, says one, vaccination now prevents altogether or greatly lessens the chances of developing typhoid fever, and such an epidemic can never again occur. This may be true, and is undoubtedly partly true, at least of typhoid fever; but there are other diseases for which, unfortunately, we have no protective vaccination. Some of these diseases are diarrhea, dysentery—both bacillary and amebic—scarlet fever, measles, various forms of meningitis, poliomyelitis, pneumonia, tuberculosis, etc. All infections have not yet been conquered. Among the causes of the fearful diseases of 1898—and the causes were many—was the lack of authority on the part of the medical officer. There is abundant evidence of this in various Government documents. In the "Report on typhoid fever in United States military camps in 1898" the evidence that the superior authority of the line officer was responsible in many instances for the insanitary condition of the camps is abundant. This report tells us that many commands were unwisely located, and often this was done in the face of remonstrances in the part of the medical officer. Medical officers of the Seventh Army Corps generally condemned the location at Miami, and yet regiments were kept on this site until they were much reduced by illness, and at Chickamauga some regiments were placed on ground so rocky that the construction of latrines of proper depth and width was impossible. Other camp sites received the surface washings from adjacent commands. Some were contracted into half the regulation space. Many regiments were compelled to remain on the same site until the soil became badly polluted, notwithstanding the fact that there were many broad acres around about, and no hostile army was nearer than Habana. From this report we make the following quotation: "There were regiments at Chickamauga that did not move a tenth of an inch from the time of arrival in May to that of departure late in August. Requests for change in location made by medical officers were not always granted. As an illustration under this head, we may call attention to the official records of the Fifth Pennsylvania. This command reached Chickamauga Park May 20, and was, unfortunately, located on low ground. Requests for a change in location were repeatedly sent in during June and July. The soil became muddy, the camp received the washings from camps above, the sinks rapidly filled with water and overflowed, and still requests for change in location were not heeded until August 12. As we have seen, some of the regiments were improperly located from a sanitary standpoint. This was done by superior line officers, and sometimes in the face of protests from the medical officers."

This report advised that greater authority be given medical officers in all questions relating to the hygiene and sanitation of camps, and now, as we are going into another war, the line has one general officer for every 167 commissioned officers, while the medical corps has but one, whatever the number of commissioned officers may be, and in an army of 1,000,000, the number of commissioned medical officers will be not less than 7,000.

The medical profession requests that one-half of 1 per cent of commissioned officers in its corps have the rank of general officers. This seems a modest request and is allowed in the Navy; but, for some unknown reason, has so far been denied the Army. One who has served in the Medical Corps can understand and thoroughly appreciate the hesitancy with which a lieutenant in that corps may recommend to a colonel of the line that a camp site be changed or that some other sanitary improvement is desirable; and one who served in the Medical Corps in 1898 knows full well the reception such a recommendation frequently met at that time, and he can guess at the reception it is likely to receive in the future under similar conditions. If anyone has doubt concerning the attitude of many line officers of high rank in 1898 toward the recommendations of medical officers, he should read the testimony of Maj. Gen. Brooke and other officers in command in the camps in 1898. This testimony may be found in the volumes of the congressional inquiry into the "Conduct of the War Department in the War with Spain," generally known as the Dodge report.

The commanding line officer at Chickamauga took no pains in his testimony to show his contempt for the advice of his own medical officers, and this contempt and disregard constituted large factors in filling the hospitals and graves with typhoid cases. We have not place here to quote largely from his testimony, but a few sentences of the testimony of Gen. Brooke may be given:

"Q. Had any of the wells, General, been condemned by the Medical Department prior to your leaving [Chickamauga]?—A. By alleged Medical Departments. Two of them were erroneous, I believe, after investigation made by myself. The one in front of a South Carolina regiment, which, I believe, really to have been perfectly pure water. There was afterwards discovered a surface well which had been walled up and water slipped in from which this regiment—this was reported to me—used the water. That well was not far from a large sink, and possibly on lower ground. I never could understand from my knowledge of rocky strata how that well could have been contaminated. Another well lying on the road between Alexander House and Jay's mill was also condemned. I drank of that well water every time I passed it until somebody broke the pump to pieces. I suppose it was some of our energetic medical fraternity who had spent their time in finding that there was a suspicion of these two wells, and then I did not bother further about it." (Conduct of War Department in War with Spain, vi, 3080.)

In this camp there were about 10,000 of Gen. Brooke's troops affected with typhoid fever, about 700 of whom died. This was 25 per cent of his command.

It probably took a large part of the remaining troops to take care of those who were sick. This excellent general of the line could not understand the folly of medical officers who pointed out that the water was infected and himself drank from infected water, and notwithstanding this, by the providence of God he escaped, because he had had a previous attack of typhoid fever and was himself immune. God bless the line officer and God save the soldiers of the United States from his ignorance of sanitary law.

On the following page there is a statement of the insanitary condition of Camp Thomas made by the medical officer of the Twelfth New York Infantry. The commanding line officer was so incensed at this report that he said: "If you will give me a copy of that report, I will see that that young man goes before a court-martial for the sort of statement he has made there, if he is not protected by this commission."

This reminds me of the case of Lieut. Edger, in the Philippines, who stamped out an attack of cholera in an adjacent village near Santa Cruz, where 80 cases occurred the first day and where half the people in the town died in less than 60 days, approximately 1,000 in number. This young medical officer so far protected the American soldiers adjacent that not one of them was lost with cholera, but in his vigilance and strenuous effort to protect them he was court-martialed by the officer of the line in charge and punished on the ground of insubordination when he insisted on taking what he deemed necessary sanitary precaution.

This young lieutenant is now in the Medical Department, and is available as a witness if any statesman desires to summon him.

On July 17, 1898, the chief medical officer at Chickamauga addressed a letter to the Adjutant General containing recommendations concerning the improvements of sanitary conditions. In brief, the letter contained the following recommendations:

1. That the Signal Corps, which had occupied the same site for several months and which was crowded, should be moved.
2. That selected places should be designated as dumping grounds and all the waste should be collected and deposited on these places instead of being scattered through the camp.
3. That so far as possible all camp sites should be changed.
4. That the hospital of the first division of the corps be moved from the unsanitary position they occupied to a more healthful location.
5. That the village of Lytle, which was a sanitary menace to the troops, should be cleansed.
6. That all condemned sources of water supply should be effectually closed.
7. That only filtered or boiled water should be used by the soldiers.
8. That all hucksters selling doubtful food or drink should be expelled from the camp.
9. That there should be careful supervision of all food and drink sold in the canteens.

These recommendations made in July were unheeded at the time.

In his testimony, Gen. Brooke spoke of the letter containing the above recommendations as follows: "I did not regard his letter in a very serious sense. I do not know how he came to write it. There was much complaint in that camp from men of his own profession as to his action. He caused me more trouble and annoyance than anyone ever did."

Had the recommendations contained in this letter which annoyed the senior line officer been taken seriously in July the fearful harvest of sickness and death in August might have been averted.

Nineteen years have passed since our little war with Spain, and we have crossed the threshold of a great war with Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey. This war begins with the medical officer possessed of no more authority than he had in 1898. Will his recomendations be as futile as they were then? The medical profession has always been responsive to its country's demands, whether in war, in pestilence, in flood, or in famine. Conscription has never been necessary to fill its quota. Medical officers will do their best and will present their recommendations to superior line officers, but they realize that these recommendations are likely to receive scant attention, and that the medical officer will be compelled to work under a heavy handicap. The Government stamp placed upon the medical officer indicates the opinion that the Government has of the value of his services, and that his recommendations will receive from line officers any different consideration from that accorded them in 1898 is not probable. At present the Army Medical Corps has no representation on the General Staff or in the War College

Will it be possible that camp sites, both small and great, will be selected as they were in 1898, without consultation with the Medical Corps? And are we justified in feeling that we may have some reminders of the experiences of 1898? According to the testimony of the Surgeon General recently, given before a medical committee, the relative number of trained medical officers is not as great now as it was at the beginning of the Spanish War. We had then seven per thousand. We have now about five per thousand.

THE ENGLISH RECOGNIZE THE IMPORTANCE OF GIVING AUTHORITY TO MEDICAL OFFICERS.

In 1904 the English war office was reorganized by a committee, the chairman of which was Lord Esher. In this reorganization no provision was made for a representative of the medical army corps on the general staff, or what corresponds to our War College. At the time the surgeon general complained of this a tion. In reply to this complaint Lord Esher's committee stated that while too much importance could not be attached to the sanitary service of the army in peace or in war, the committee could not accept the views of the surgeon general. Lord Esher's committee continued: "The army council is not and can not be a representative body as regards the several arms and departments. The royal army medical co ps exists to serve the army in a most important capacity, but the first object must be to create and maintain an army, and this is the function of the army council. To admit the principle of representation would destroy the character of the council."

This was the opinion of Lord Esher in 1904. Recently (London Times, Feb. 3, 1917) Lord Esher writes as follows: "How much of the suffering undergone by our soldiers since the war began has been due to the shortsightedness of my committee, and notably of myself, will never be known. Certainly the control of the adjutant general's branch over the royal army medical corps was and is responsible not only for the early failure to grip the medical factors of the war, but they hampered conditions under which the surgeon general has worked. His triumphs and those of the royal army medical corps have been achieved in spite of obstacles that the subordination of science to ignorance and of elasticity to military discipline explains but can not justify."

THE RANK AND AUTHORITY OF THE MEDICAL OFFICER.

When Stanton was Secretary of War and Hammond Surgeon General early in the Civil War, the latter made a request of the former for advanced rank for medical officers. The great Secretary of War replied with a question: "Will increased rank make your medical men better doctors?" The Surgeon General replied with another question: "Does increased rank make line officers quartermasters, and those in other corps more proficient?"

There are two important considerations in regard to the rank and authority of Army medical officers. In the first place, the higher the rank obtainable the better the class of young physicians attracted to the corps. When a young man knows that whatever he may do, however skillful and energetic he may be, whatever discoveries he may make, whatever sacrifices he may undergo, the rank of colonel, with a pay of about $5,000, is the best that he can possibly look forward to in his old age, it must be acknowledged that the temptation to enter the Army medical service is not great

In the second place, and this is of more importance, rank in the Army necessarily means much. A request or a recommendation from a colonel or a general will receive more consideration than when it comes from a lieutenant. Much of the disgrace of 1898 and the disregard shown their recommendations by superior line officers was due to the lack of rank and authority among medical men.

THE BRITISH AND FRENCH MEDICAL SERVICE.

The following is a list of the lieutenant generals and major generals in the British medical service as of October, 1916, taken from the British Army list of October, 1916:

1. Director general of the British medical service, Sir Alfred Keogh.
2. Director general of the British forces in France, Sir Alfred Sloggett rank lieutenant general.
3. Lieutenant general and director of the British medical service in India, Surg. Gen. O'Donnell, rank lieutenant general.
4. Director general Indian medical service, Sir Thomas Pardey Lukis, rank lieutenant general.

ON THE KING'S STAFF.

5. Hon. William Flack Stevenson, surgeon general.
6. Sir William Babtie, surgeon general.
7. James Cleghorn, surgeon general.
8. Hon. Thomas Grainger, surgeon general.
9. Hon. Peter Stephenson Turnbull, surgeon major general.

SURGEON GENERALS RANKING AS MAJOR GENERALS.

10. Hayward Reader Whitehead.
11. James Gaussen MacNeece.
12. William Burney Bannerman.
13. Thomas Martin Corker.
14. Sir David Bruce.
15. Louis Edward Anderson.
16. Harold George Hathaway.
17. Walter George Augustus Bedford.
18. Robert William Steele Lyons.
19. Richard William Ford.
20. Tom Percy Woodhouse.
21. William Grant Macpherson.
22. Robert Porter.
23. Thomas Joseph O'Donnell.
24. Menus William O'Keefe.
25. Richard Henry Stewart Sawyer.
26. John Chislett Culling.
27. William George Birrell.
28. Francis John Jencken.
29. Francis Harper Trehern.
30. William Rice Edwards.

Since the expansion of the British Army this list has increased, but data are not available. The above data were taken from the Library of Congress, Book G7 A2, Class U 11, pages 4, 19, 45, 46, and 1921.

In the report of the Crimean War, there was an enormous mortality due to defective service in sanitation and in the medical, surgical, and hospital services.

The medical officer had no authority whatever, and the line officer did not realize the effect of disregarding medical advice, and the medical officer had no rank or dignity to emphasize his advice. The same distressing consequences ensued from the same causes in the American Civil War, in the South African War, in the Spanish War, and recently in the Mesopotamian campaign. (See report below.)

I submit a very brief extract on the recent British disaster in Mesopotamia, due to neglecting health of men:

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION APPOINTED BY ACT OF PARLIAMENT TO INQUIRE INTO THE OPERATIONS OF WAR IN MESOPOTAMIA, 1917.

[Extract from the Vincent-Bingley Commission's report on the Mesopotamia expedition (sec. 110, pp. 133–163), Library of Congress.]

* * * * * * *

There is abundant evidence that * * * lack of coordination have been important factors in the situation. Conferences were held at headquarters from time to time, and plans were considered. It is stated, however, that Surg. Gen. ——— did not attend these conferences, except when the subjects discussed related directly to the medical administration. He was thus less in touch with the general situation than other heads of administrative services, and we think that this had an unfavorable influence on the working of his branch.

Section 111: The chief of the general staff, India, made special inquiries as to whether he was satisfied that the general staff was in sufficiently close touch with the medical services to insure that the latter knew when extra demands were likely to be made on them. Gen. ——— replied that he was "perfectly satisfied." We regret that we can not indorse this view, as there is evidence that on this and on other occasions the want of coordination and cooperation between the different branches of the staff, particularly between the inspector general of communications and the medical services, was the source of great inconvenience.

* * * * * * *

Section 58: We doubt whether the military authorities in Mesopotamia treated the medical services with much consideration in this matter, or whether they sufficiently realized the need for such steamers.

Paragraph 175: The medical personnel and subordinate staff have always been deficient in numbers * * * and it has only been the continued and untiring labors of a devoted but overworked staff that has again and again prevented an absolute breakdown.

Paragraph 176: We consider that the rigid economy which before the war was exercised and the spirit which this policy has engendered as to the comparative merits of economy and efficiency have contributed materially to the breakdown.

Paragraph 172: We are satisfied that the failure in the medical organization had a material effect on the morale of the troops.

Part section 123: Surg. Gen. ——— did not represent with sufficient promptitude and force the needs of the services for which he is responsible, and in particular failed to urge the necessity * * * with that insistence which the situation demanded. Decision: We indorse the finding as regards Surg. Gen. ———, who, in our judgment, showed himself unfit for the high administrative office he held.

THE SENIOR RANKS OF THE BRITISH MEDICAL SERVICE.

[Memorandum obtained from British medical officer of high rank on my request for it.—H. S. O.]

In the British Army at present there are three surgeons general with rank of lieutenant general; that is, the director general (Sir Alfred Keogh) at the war office, the director general of British forces in France (Sir Arthur Sloggett), and the director of British medical services in India (Surg. Gen. O'Donnell).

Another officer, Sir Thomas Pardey Lukis, with rank of lieutenant general, is the director general of the Indian Medical Service.

There is also a considerable number of surgeon generals with rank of major general. I think the actual number is 19, but I have not a recent army list in my possession. These officers all hold important posts, the following are some of the principal appointments:

(a) Each army on the western front (we may assume an army to consist of about 200,000 troops) is furnished with a surgeon general as director of medical services of that army. This officer commands and is responsible for the entire medical service in the army to which he is appointed; he is on the headquarters staff of the army, and is the responsible advisor of the general commanding the army on all questions relating to the care and welfare of the troops, the prevention and dealing with epidemics, arrangements for the collection and evacuation of casualties in sick and wounded, the provision and establishment of field ambulances, casualty clearing stations and hospitals in the army area, the provision of ambulance trains, the establishment of convalescent camps, and very numerous other important matters.

(b) A full colonel, army medical service, is with the headquarters staff of each corps and division, and his duties relate to all sanitary and medical matters in the formation to which he is appointed. He is also the medical advisor of the general commanding the corps or division.

It would appear very advisable, in fact absolutely necessary, that the above officers hold the senior rank which they at present do.

An enormous amount of responsibility rests in their hands, and they are daily called upon to give opinion or advice on matters involving very weighty consideration and vital importance not only of vast importance to the well-being and efficiency of the army but also inceptions and schemes involving the expenditure of millions of pounds, e. g., the defensive measures against gas attacks, and the provision of gas masks and respirators have throughout been carried out by the medical service of the army, this being only one—and a comparatively minor—example of the many questions which have arisen.

Let us suppose—for the purpose of argument—that these officers did not hold the senior rank which they do at present; would their opinion carry sufficient weight? For example, suppose that the director of medical services of an army held the rank only of colonel every general commanding a division in that army, and also even every brigade commander, would be senior in rank to him. Could it reasonably be expected that the opinion of the director of medical services for the army would then carry the weight and authority which it does at present?

In my humble opinion there can be only one answer, especially when it is borne in mind that these officers are specially selected for their high rank on account of their abilities and previous experience.

(c) Other surgeon generals, with rank of major general, are serving in the following appointments:

1. As director medical services on the lines of communication in France.
2. As deputy director general at the war office.
3. As director medical services in Egypt.
4. As director medical services in Salonica.
5. As director medical services in Mesopotamia.
6. As director medical services in three commands in India.
7. As director medical services in command in England, etc.

Similar arguments in favor of high rank hold good with regard to all these appointments.

Lastly, and this is a point which is deserving of sympathetic consideration, surely it is advisable to provide a certain number of higher ranks in the medical service, as in other branches of the army.

The provision of these higher ranks and appointments which would be filled absolutely by selection, would furnish a goal for laudable ambition and an incentive to strenuous scientific work throughout the whole of an officer's service, and can, in my opinion, be productive of nothing but the very best results.

The present campaign has furnished innumerable instances of the vast importance of the Medical Service and of the high standing and authority which it holds with the rest of the army.

The French Army also dignified the medical department by providing for officers of the rank of major general and lieutenant general. This is also true of the Italian, Austrian, German, and Japanese Armies for the same reasons.

On January 16, 1917, Secretary of War Hon. Newton D. Baker strenuously urged upon Congress legislation to give the Army equalization of rank in the higher grades with that of the Navy on the ground that otherwise the detrimental effect on the Army would be too clear to require more than a statement. He said:

"I wish to strongly emphasize that without legislation giving the Army equalization of rank in the higher grades with that of the Navy, the branch of the Government of which I am in charge will be done an obvious injustice, the detrimental effect of which to the Army is too clear to require more than a statement. All the reasons which have been urged for the creation of these grades in the Navy so as to efficiently handle the units properly composing a command to be under the direction of such officers of the Navy are present in at least an equal degree in the Army. As Congress, after a full consideration of the subject, wisely decided on the advisability of giving the Navy these grades in order that it may be properly and efficiently officered, for similar reasons it should now provide similar grades for the Army.

"The embarrassment which arises in every branch of the service when brought in contact with other officers of foreign service of superior grade but not existing in our service is identical.

"But the constant embarrassment arising between the two services in the disparity of rank is too apparent to call for more than mention.

"If in all those joint matters in which the Army and the Navy are concerned the Navy, by reason of the position of the superior grade is entitled to outrank the Army, the Army must perforce regard itself and be looked upon as a subordinate branch, and this is too inequitable."

This argument of the Secretary of War applies with precisely the same force to the organization of the Medical Department, which should not be put in the attitude of being subordinate in the field for which it is responsible. It should have a commanding position of dignity and responsibility, and when the recommendation is overruled it should be overruled by an officer of equal rank in the line for military purposes only, and then that officer should be personally responsible for the consequences, and if he errs should be subject to immediate court-martial.

There is here submitted a comparison table of the percentage composition of the Medical Corps of the United States Army (existent and proposed) as compared with the principal foreign armies and the United States Navy, from which it will be seen that the Navy already has the proportions which I have proposed in the pending amendment and with the percentage of major generals proposed is surpassed by the Italian Army, the French Army, the British Army, the Austrian Army, and the Japanese Army, and that Italy, France, Great Britain, Austria, and Japan all have officers of the rank of lieutenant general under the medical department of the army, while the United States has none.

[1] Figures based on the percentage composition of the Medical Corps, U. S. Navy, assimilated rank, as per the act of Aug. 29, 1916: "The total number of commissioned officers of the active list of the following mentioned staff corps at one time, exclusive of commissioned warrant officers, shall be distributed in the various grades of the respective corps as follows: Medical Corps, one-half medical directors with the rank of rear admiral to four medical directors with the rank of captain, to eight medical inspectors with the rank of commander, to 87½ in the grades below medical inspector."

[2] In Russia the law authorizing the giving of commissioned rank is very broad and does not specify any definite numbers for each rank or for the whole corps. Medical officers are commissioned in the medical corps in the various grades of lieutenant general, major general, colonel, lieutenant colonel, captain, and lieutenant.

ARMY MEDICAL MUSEUM AND LIBRARY,
Washington, June 13, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington.

DEAR SENATOR OWEN: In compliance with your request of this date, I have pleasure in handing you herewith the desired data on medical organization in foreign armies. These data have been compiled from the latest sources at our disposal. The library receives only printed literature on the subject as it is published from time to time. It is thought that the Army War College might have in its possession recent confidential reports by military observers in Europe which might considerably modify the figures found by us. I trust, however, that upon the inclosed sheets you will find the information which you are seeking.

Very sincerely, yours,

C. C. MCCULLOCH, Jr.

The Army List and Directory of the United States, May 20, 1917, shows:

GENERAL LINE OFFICERS.

Seven major generals of the line.

One major general in the Quartermaster's Corps (subject to detail from the line at a later date).

One major general in the Coast Artillery Corps.

A total of nine major generals pertaining to the line.

There are 21 brigadier generals of the line.

There are 2 brigadier generals of the Quartermaster Corps, 1 brigadier general of the Signal Corps, 1 brigadier general of the Ordnance Corps, 1 brigadier general of the Inspector General's Department, 1 brigadier general of The Adjutant General's Department, and 1 brigadier general of the Bureau of Insular Affairs. (All of these officers are subject to detail from the line when the permanent officers shall have been exhausted.)

There are 28 brigadier generals pertaining to the line.

There are 7,220 commissioned officers in the Army. Of these, 17 belong to the Judge Advocate General's Department; 994 to the Medical Department (including in this strength 135 Medical Reserve officers and 117 dental officers; the officers of the Veterinary Corps are not included here, nor are they apparently included in the authorized strength of the Army in this Army List). There are 302 officers of the Engineers. This makes a total of 1,313 officers. This subtracted from 7,220, the total number of officers, leaves 5,907 officers.

Nine major generals of the line to 5,907 line officers.

One major general of the line to 656 line officers.

There would be 15 major generals of the line to 10,000 line officers on this proportion.

Twenty-eight brigadier generals of the line to 5,907 line officers.

One brigadier general of the line to 211 line officers.

There would be 47 brigadier generals of the line to 10,000 line officers on this proportion.

Fifteen major generals of the line to each 10,000 line officers.

Forty-seven brigadier generals of the line to each 10,000 line officers.

Sixty-two general officers for each 10,000 line officers.

The above general officers are in command of 137,855 enlisted men and must be expanded as the Army is enlarged. The bill for this expansion is now pending as Senate bill 1786. This bill, if unamended, would provide only 1 general officer of the Medical Department for over 10,000 medical officers of the Medical Department, including the officers of the Medical Reserve Corps for the National Guard and National Army.

The above record justifies the amendment which I now propose. The amendment meets the cordial indorsement of the medical section of the Council of National Defense.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—APPROPRIATIONS FOR AVIATION.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, day before yesterday I occupied the time of the Senate for about seven minutes in proposing an amendment to the aviation bill to the effect that there should be named by the President of the United States a committee expressly charged with the duty of safeguarding these aviation contracts. This morning I was complimented by an active head of the aviation work calling on me and approving the principles I suggested of protecting these contracts. There was a fairly correct account of what transpired on the floor of the Senate, I am told, in the Washington Post; but the compositor's thoughtless headlines stated that I had opposed the passage of the aviation bill. The New York Times this morning comes out with a long and somewhat virulent editorial—based, I suppose, on some compositor's headlines—charging that I had the object of defeating the bill, and in effect charging me with being a public enemy.

I rise merely to correct in the RECORD any such public impression. I have and have had no desire to retard, and have not retarded, the aviation bill. I do desire to safeguard the expenditure of $640,000,000, and I intend to insist upon this money being properly safeguarded; but it will take very little time to say what I have to say about it. I favor rigid cloture, after fair debate, and have voted to speed all the war measures.

What I rose for especially, Mr. President, was to point out the inconsiderate conduct on the part of an editor occupying a position of great responsibility, giving publicity to a falsehood against a public servant, and indulging in gross, unmerited abuse of a United States Senator and to correct the impression made. Such editorial conduct is a gross abuse of the high position he occupies, a gross abuse of the freedom of the press, which we all cherish, and deserves severe condemnation. An editor of a great paper should not write a phillipic without informing himself of the facts. Any man in the public service who allows himself to be seriously disturbed or to show bad temper because he is unjustly criticized or even abused impairs his own opportunity to serve the public. From a personal standpoint I would not complain. But while the Senate knows the charge of the New York Times editor is untrue, the false representations made by the editor of one of the greatest newspapers in the world is mischievous and has a tendency to impair the confidence of the people in a faithful public servant and to weaken the cooperation between the people, the press, and Congress that is one of the essentials in the successful conduct of the war.

However, Mr. President, editors are but human, and all men incline to be intemperate in war times; and I do not really believe this editor, whoever he is, intended to be unjust, and if he did I have neither the time nor the inclination to retort in kind or to harbor malice in exchange for injustice. "It will make but little difference 40 years from now."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m., Friday, July 20, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, July 21, 1917, at 10 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 21, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, July 18, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Shields
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Simmons
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Cummins	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Curtis	Kenyon	Owen	Sterling

Hardwick	McLean	Shafroth	Watson
Hollis	McNary	Sheppard	Weeks
Husting	Martin	Sherman	Williams

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is absent on official business for a few hours.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Sixty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe the pending amendment is the substitute for section 12, to which, so far as I recall, two amendments have been offered, one by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who desires to add, after the words "No. 1 northern," the words "or its equivalent." So far as I am advised and so far as I am able, I am willing to accept the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment?

Mr. PENROSE. What is the amendment to the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 9, after the words "No. 1 northern," insert the words "or its equivalent."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment to the amendment will not be adopted. Section 12 was carefully drawn in such a way as to give one definite standard by which all other grades of wheat might be imposed. It does not make any difference whether you take No. 1 northern or No. 2 northern or any other one grade, but it seemed advisable to take the highest grade that is generally known. If there is any other that is better than that, there is no harm in taking it; but when one grade is fixed at one place, then the price of all other grades at all other primary markets will be fixed under rules and regulations by the food commission. It would be just the same as saying that the standard value in this country shall be the gold dollar or its equivalent. Then some one must go to work and discover what is the equivalent of the gold dollar. If there is an equivalent to No. 1 northern, the food commission will know it. The food commission may say the price of No. 1 northern at such a place is $2, and the price of this other grade which is the equivalent is $2. I am afraid that it will lead to confusion, and I certainly can not believe that it will do any good to adopt this language. I hope the language in the amendment will be allowed to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment inserting the words "or its equivalent" will be adopted. In the Northwest, where they have the spring wheat, the terms of the bill would be applicable, but out in our part of the country, where we have the winter wheat, No. 2 hard winter wheat is the equivalent of the northern wheat. Because in the markets of our part of the country we sell from that grade, we ask that the words "or its equivalent" be inserted. It is not like the gold dollar, because the gold dollar, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, has one value. Here are two distinct grades. They are sold in the market. We pay no attention in the Central West to the market grades of the Northwest, for we have a grade of our own. We claim that the wheat we produce in that section is the equivalent of No. 1 northern, and for that reason I offered the amendment to include the words "or its equivalent."

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator allow me. If this language is adopted, who will decide what is the equivalent of No. 1 northern?

Mr. CURTIS. The board will decide.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then why will not the board decide without any language of that kind in the bill and fix the same price for that grade of wheat that it fixes for No. 1 northern?

Mr. CURTIS. Because you do not direct them to do it and the amendment which I have offered does.

Mr. HOLLIS. How else can they do it but fairly. They are the ones to decide whether this grade is the equivalent, and if they find that it is, then the same price is imposed.

Mr. CURTIS. Then what is the objection to putting in the words "or its equivalent" when it will give us that protection?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not see that it does any harm.

Mr. CURTIS. Then why object?

Mr. HOLLIS. But it does seem to suggest that they may be required under this language to do something which they would not do unless this language was here. It will do no harm to anyone if the language is left as it is.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if I thought that the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas to the amendment would clarify this situation I would support it. I believe it will not clarify it, but that it will confuse it. In the market everyone knows what No. 1 northern wheat is, and the price of all other grades of wheat is based upon the price of No. 1 northern. It is similar to cotton, as every purchaser knows what middling cotton means, and all other grades of cotton are based on the price paid for middling cotton. If we should strike out "No. 1 northern" and put in "No. 2 northern," the same result could be accomplished, because the equivalent values thereof are always known in the market with wheat just the same as with cotton.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment. It we name No. 1 northern or its equivalent then we have two standards and there is no necessity for doing that. If the Senator wanted to name No. 2 Kansas, then, of course, it would be no more than simply saying No. 2 Kansas is equivalent to No. 1 northern, and it would only lead to confusion. I do not believe the amendment to the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to say in answer to what the Senator from Utah has said, that the people of Kansas, Oklahoma, and Nebraska have had trouble because of the different grades of wheat. The No. 2 hard winter wheat produced in Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma is the equivalent of No. 1 hard northern wheat, and therefore we ask that the amendment to the amendment be adopted. It can do no harm and it will protect those who raise wheat in the western part of the country.

Mr. SMOOT. It can do harm if we are to adopt two standards instead of one, and that is what we will be doing if we undertake to amend the amendment by inserting the words "or its equivalent."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very sure that if Senators understood the wheat business a little better there would not be a single objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas. No. 1 northern is one of the standard grades of wheat, and it is a very high standard. That is the kind of wheat that is raised in the northern part of our country, the spring wheat. There is another standard grade of wheat just as much a standard grade as No. 1 northern, and that is No. 2 hard winter wheat. There are two or three other grades of wheat, each substantially the equivalent of the other, but a wheat that is raised in a different section of the country. It will be left to the board if the words "or its equivalent" are placed in the bill to determine what is the equivalent, so that no injustice can be done to the public. If you undertake to fix a price of $2, or any other figure, per bushel for No. 1 northern and do not put in the words "or its equivalent" it might work a great discrimination against other grades of wheat that are equally good in the market.

There is not a wheat man, I think, in the country who will deny the truth of what I am saying. The illustration which was given by the Senator from Utah of middling cotton is not in point, because middling cotton is the same all over the United States. There are some 50 or 60 varieties of wheat and there are certain well-known standards of wheat. One of them is No. 1 northern, another is No. 2 red, and so on. Therefore I beg that this amendment, in the interest of common justice to all parts of the country, so that there will be no discrimination, may be adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kansas is in error when he speaks of any particular kind of wheat being the equivalent of any other standard. As a matter of fact, there is no equivalent. There may be that which, under certain circumstances, brings a price very nearly what may be given for a different kind of grain. No. 1 hard grain brings more at any market in the United States, other things being equal, than any other grain. Therefore there is no equivalent. No. 1 northern is the next important standard, and unless there are peculiar conditions in the trade in the matter of speculation or supply and demand to meet the speculative requirements No. 1 northern brings a higher price, because the flour made from it sells for a higher price. Therefore I think those things would naturally adjust themselves. While I have no serious objection to the word "equivalent," I think it ought to go upon record that there is no such thing as an equivalent of No. 1 hard as applied to the northern grain, or No. 1 northern as applied to the northern grain.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, just a word. I shall be compelled to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. It is true, as my colleague [Mr. McCUMBER] has stated, that actually there is no grain the equivalent of No. 1 northern or of No. 1 hard, but that is not what this language "or its equivalent" means. It simply means that if the grade is not No. 1 northern—if it is No. 2 northern or No. 3 or No. 4 or rejected or feed grade, as we call it—it will simply be based upon the milling test, and the price will be based absolutely upon the grade named in the bill, which is No. 1 northern. I believe that the word "equivalent" should go into the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the junior Senator from North Dakota yield to his colleague?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I said that I had no objection to the use of the word "equivalent," but I simply desire to place upon record that, as a matter of fact, there is no such thing as an equivalent between two different standards, the flour from two different kinds of grain, so long as the flour itself made from one wheat or the other sells for a different price. There is a relation, of course, between the prices, and the word "equivalent" may be all right, and I should have no objection to it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, my colleague's statement is absolutely correct and in accordance with my understanding, but my attention was diverted for a moment, and I did not hear the first statement of my colleague.

Mr. President, I believe that this amendment should be adopted, that there should be no objection to it. While I am on my feet, however, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] to the fact that I have just taken up the question with the Agricultural Department through Dr. Brand as to where these prices should obtain, whether we should leave the language in the singular, "market," or have it in the plural, "markets," and I desire to say that I shall have a report from Dr. Brand in a few minutes.

I know the Senator wants to get all the information which can be had, for this is important to all of us. When we speak of the markets of the country, I find that there are a great many. I find that there is a market in the State of Utah—Ogden—which is a principal interior primary market. I find that there is a principal interior market in the State of Oregon—Portland; and that there are more than 30 of these principal interior markets. Spokane, Wash., is a principal interior market. Senators can readily understand that if we make a law compelling this board to fix a price at a certain market—say Chicago, for instance—you would have to discount the freight clear from Chicago to Seattle, or to Spokane, or to Ogden, Utah, or to St. Louis, or to any of these primary markets. That would certainly be an injustice to those people. I do not think the Senate is willing to go on record as favoring such a plan as that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that what he has stated is not the intention of the framers of this amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. No; and I am glad that it is not.

Mr. SMOOT. The intention of the framers of the amendment, and what I believe it means, is that whatever is the price at the principal interior primary market would be the price which would be fixed at all markets, not taking into account freight charges; or, in other words, if the primary market is Minneapolis and wheat is $2 a bushel at Minneapolis, and if the market price at Ogden, Utah, was only $1.50, under the amendment the price at Ogden would be $2; but if the language is changed to the plural, I can not see but that the market might be selected at which the price of wheat is the lowest.

Mr. REED. But the law fixes it at $2.

Mr. SMOOT. It fixes the price in the primary market.

Mr. REED. Exactly; it fixes it at the primary market. Do you propose to say that it shall not be fixed as to other markets?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not care whether they have it at all of the primary markets or not. I am only calling attention to the effect of this amendment. I do not care whether the amendment reads "markets" or "market." All I have in mind is to protect the wheat grower in all parts of the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. Whatever the price is at the principal market ought to be the price at all of the markets.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand that, and that is the intention of all of us—to do justice to all people alike.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me an interruption?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Just one word. The Senator makes the mistake of thinking that we are picking a market at which the market price is to control. Not so. The bill fixes the price, and if it fixes it at only one market, and does not make the same price for other markets, those marketing their wheat at the other markets must bear the freight. So, if Minneapolis was picked as the primary market, and the price is fixed at $2 there, and we did not fix the same market price at Omaha, Nebr., the man at Omaha, Nebr., would get $2, less the freight rate. Undoubtedly that would be the result.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, that is the way I undertand it.

Now, I will say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and to the Senate, that Dr. Brand said that his impression was that the word "market" ought to be in the plural; but he also said that he wanted to be given time to study the matter very carefully, and that his report would be sent up here immediately. I think that all of us are interested and that we want to do justice to the whole country alike; but we do not want to give the people of my State an advantage over the people of the State of Missouri or over the people of the State of Utah or those of the State of Iowa.

The principal wheat market might be fixed at Minneapolis; but the principal grain market might be fixed at Chicago or New York. I asked Dr. Brand about that, and he said he was not sure.

Mr. SMOOT. This amendment only applies to wheat, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota; there is no grain other than wheat involved.

I want to accomplish exactly what the Senator from North Dakota desires to. I do not think the price of wheat at the market of Ogden should be different from the price at Minneapolis or anywhere in North Dakota or in Omaha, Nebr. The price ought to be the same. What I am fearful of, however, is that if the word is made plural that will not be the case, but I am perfectly willing to have Dr. Brand decide the question, as he is an expert on the subject.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, in order that I may understand the purpose of this language, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if it is his understanding that it means an absolute guarantee to the farmers of $2 a bushel for wheat, whether a proclamation is issued by the President or not?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I so understand, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. If that is the understanding, then the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon and my amendment are exactly alike in that respect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Let me say to the Senator that it is not proposed by this language in the bill to change conditions as they are now. For instance, the market of the Senator, who is a wheat grower in North Dakota, is Minneapolis or St. Paul, I presume.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In other words, he would be guaranteed a price of $2 a bushel at St. Paul or Minneapolis, less what he would pay for freight. That is exactly the position that he is in now. If one of those cities should happen to be named as the primary market, that will be the primary market, and whatever place the Government has seen fit to establish as the primary market will fix the price. There may be more than one primary market; there are others; but the price will be fixed just like the price of the Senator's wheat is fixed now at the other primary markets. There would be a corresponding deduction because of the freight paid. So that, in the last analysis, the Senator would be left in exactly the same position he is in now; in other words, there is one primary market, where the price is fixed, and the prices at the other primary markets are fixed, taking the freight rates into consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further?

Mr. GRONNA. I presume my time is nearly up, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the reason I thought we ought to use the singular number, because if we have more than one primary market, then, of course, they will be able to select the lowest market.

Mr. GRONNA. I think that the Senator from Oregon and I agree absolutely as to what we intend to do; but I am afraid that the language the Senator uses in his amendment does not do that. If it is the intention to do what the Senator suggests, and I believe it is from what he has said, then I think we ought to say that the price shall be fixed in the primary market—I have no objection to that—but that the adjustment for freight and all that shall be based on the interior primary market.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator can occupy my time, because I only interrupted the Senator, and I had not addressed myself to this amendment.

Now, let us assume, by way of illustration, that we had used the plural instead of the singular, and the food controller or, under the bill as it has been changed now, the board saw fit to establish a primary market in the State of North Dakota, for instance. I do not suppose they would do so; but assuming, for illustration, that they would establish one along the line of the railroad running through the State of North Dakota. It would guarantee a price to the North Dakota farmer of $2, whereas under the conditions as they exist now he would get $2 less the freight rate. That is the price he gets now, and that is the price he would get under this bill.

Does the Senator think it would be fair to establish five or ten or a dozen primary markets, and guarantee a price of $2 at each of those markets and work a change in conditions as they exist to-day? My understanding of the purpose of this bill—and that is certainly what I had in view—was to leave practically the conditions as they are now under the ordinary law of supply and demand with the change of a guaranteed price of $2 fixed at the primary market.

Mr. GRONNA. May I reply to the Senator briefly in his time?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] suggests that it would be fair to leave this to the board, because they could not afford to do such an injustice to the people of Oregon as I have indicated in my argument by having the freight rate deducted clear to the city of Chicago or the city of Minneapolis. We would receive a much larger price for our grain in North Dakota than the people of Oregon would receive, and it would be unfair. I think it is safe to leave to the board to say where the primary markets ought to be established. While I agree that the price could be made in the principal primary market, so as to have just one price——

Mr. REED. The price is made in this bill. What is the use of talking about making a price? This bill fixes the price at $2.

Mr. GRONNA. Exactly.

Mr. REED. That ought to be made the price, not for one town but for every town.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree with the Senator. A minimum price not to exceed $2 is fixed, and that, of course, will be the price; but if the price of $2 is fixed at Minneapolis, the farmers of Missouri would suffer, the farmers of Nebraska would suffer, the farmers of Iowa would suffer, the farmers all over the country, except in Minnesota and the Dakotas, would suffer, and it would be unjust to the grain growers of the western, southern, and eastern sections of the country.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the difference between the price at the Minneapolis market and, say, the Omaha or the St. Louis markets? According to reports they seem to be about the same.

Mr. GRONNA. They are about the same, I will say to the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This discussion is in the time of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me we ought to determine first what this language means and then see whether or not in the judgment of the Senate it ought to be changed. To my mind it is perfectly clear, although there seems to be a disagreement between two of the leaders who prepared this amendment. We must bear in mind that this amendment is not one from the committee; it is one of those that have been prepared since the committee has had anything to do with the bill, and two of those Senators do not agree as to what the bill means as it stands now. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] very fairly, I think, states what, in my judgment, is a correct interpretation of the bill. If we leave the word "market" in the singular, there will be just one place in the United States where the minimum price will be $2 for No. 1 northern. If there is another market, the price in that other market will be reduced for the same grade of wheat by the amount of the freight between that other market and the one market that is fixed.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says that that was not the intention of those who framed the substitute, but that they intended that there should be the same guarantee for the different markets in the United States. I think the Senator from Utah is wrong, that the Senator from Oregon and the other Senators who helped prepare this amendment are right, and that there can be no possible misunderstanding as to the meaning of this language.

Now, let us suppose that this is passed as it is, with the guaranteed price for No. 1 northern; and let us say that the board fixes Minneapolis as the principal primary market. There the minimum price of No. 1 northern would be $2. Let us assume now that between Minneapolis and Omaha the freight on wheat is 10 cents a bushel. Then the price of the same grade in Omaha would be 10 cents less than it would be in Minneapolis. If in the plural——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is mistaken in his assumption.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not yield now, but will in a moment. If the word was in the plural and Omaha was fixed by the board as one of the primary markets, which it undoubtedly would be, then the price of the same grade of wheat in Minneapolis would be necessarily the same. If we want to do that in the law, then this language ought to be changed and the word ought to be in the plural. I now yield to my colleague.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, my colleague is mistaken, because he assumes that wheat goes from Omaha to Minneapolis. He is in error, because wheat goes to Omaha as a primary market, and goes to Minneapolis as a primary market, and goes to Kansas City as a primary market, and goes to St. Louis as a primary market, and then is shipped from those points. Therefore, there is not that difference of freight which the Senator suggests.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; but when the law says that there shall be just one primary market, there will only be one, and that is what this language says. It says here at the top of page 3—

> At not less than $2 per bushel at the principal—
>
> The principal—
> interior primary market.

The board will determine that place, and there will only be one such place.

Mr. NELSON. It may be Chicago.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know. In my judgment it will be Minneapolis, but that is immaterial. The board will fix that principal primary market, and that will be the only place in the United States where the minimum price of No. 1 northern will be $2; and it will be necessary to find out what the freight is, whether Minneapolis or Chicago or any other place is the primary market. It will be necessary to find out how much it will cost to take wheat from any other place in the United States to the market which is fixed by the board, and, of course, the freight would be deducted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield for a question, first, to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish the Senator, while he has the floor, would ascertain what particular leading Senator wrote that particular section, and ask him why he used the singular instead of the plural.

Mr. NORRIS. I will have to refer that question to the leaders who prepared this amendment. I have not that knowledge. I presume the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Oregon could give that information. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want the Senator to follow the bill as I read it, and I want to call his attention to the fact that the price named shall be based upon No. 1 northern.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. Not that it shall be shipped to Minneapolis or to any other market.

Mr. NORRIS. But it does not make any difference whether it is ever shipped at all, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me read it.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator ask his question? I do not want him to take all of my time. He can ask his question if he wants to; I am yielding to him for that purpose, but I hope he will not discuss it.

Mr. SMOOT (reading)—

> The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat from the passage of this act to the 1st day of January, 1919, shall be based upon No. 1 northern at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary market.

That principal primary market is Minneapolis, and it is to be based upon the price at Minneapolis.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, now, let me argue it, if the Senator has asked his question. I hardly know whether it is a question; but it seems to me, in reading the language, that he has answered his own question. The language is that it shall be based on No. 1 northern at a particular place, and so forth. That shows on its face that it is not going to be the same everywhere. It is to be based upon the price at a particular place that shall be fixed by the board. If we wanted to know the price at Kansas City of a commodity the price of which was fixed at some other place, anybody must know that the price at Kansas City will be less than at the other places and the difference will be what it costs to take the product from Kansas City to the other market. Whether you ever take it there or not is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not reasonable to believe from reading the language that there is no more need of saying that the price shall be based upon No. 1 northern than to say that there shall be but one market?

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely. The Senator's illustration is a good one. We base it on No. 1 northern. If the argument of the Senator from Utah were right, then all wheat would be $2, just the same as No. 1 northern, and nobody contends that. No. 4 would be $2 at that place, just the same. It is based on No. 1 northern; that is taken as the standard of value, and if there were a grade of wheat higher in value than No. 1 northern it would be over $2; and the same way as to the place. It is a question of the cost of transportation from any place to the particular market.

If you had it in the plural, I presume this board would select over the United States the principal market places for wheat. They would be Minneapolis, Chicago, Omaha, Kansas City, St.

Louis, Portland, and perhaps a good many other places; and then at each one of those places, if they had No. 1 northern wheat, the minimum price would be $2. Then anybody who had wheat to sell would know that the minimum price of his wheat would be $2 at the primary market nearest to him, and he would get, not $2 but $2 less the freight from his nearest railroad point to the nearest primary market point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to have that amendment stated. I think we have been talking about one thing while another amendment has been pending.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After "No. 1 northern" it is proposed to insert the words "or its equivalent."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; that is the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the amendment read by the Secretary is that in the parentheses on page 3 of the pending amendment. There is very little No. 1 northern wheat sold on the market compared with the entire volume of wheat. No. 1 northern spring wheat is a basing rate, as the railroad men say. It is comparatively a very small number of bushels of the 600,000,000 bushels, approximately, that will be raised in the crop of 1917. Of that kind of wheat, No. 2 or No. 3 northern is the most numerous grade. When it comes to red winter wheat, No. 2 or No. 3 red winter wheat is the prevailing milling wheat. The inferior grades are the most frequent and must be used for milling purposes. But the No. 1 northern spring wheat, I suppose, is used as the highest quality of the wheat berry in the market.

Mr. GRONNA. Contract grade.

Mr. McCUMBER. Contract grade; but No. 1 hard is the highest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes. That can be made, however, a basing price; and I suppose that is the purpose of the bill.

The amendment as written, based upon No. 1 northern or its equivalent, at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary market, simply means that somebody must choose the primary market. Who it will be nobody knows. At this time we can make a good guess that it will be Mr. Hoover, and I have no objection to Mr. Hoover. Somebody must fix it if we do not. If we fix it in the law, or in the amendment that is pending in what matures into the law, we must write the principal primary market in the bill. As to what it is, we would differ at once among ourselves here. It might be Duluth; it might be Minneapolis. Minneapolis is the greatest milling wheat market there is in the world, measured by the volume of wheat. If not either of those two points in Minnesota—one accessible by rail and the other accessible both by rail and by lake traffic during the open season, when winter has not closed lake transportation—we go to St. Louis, Kansas City, Chicago, or Omaha. Now, when you have named those six points, you have named all the great interior primary wheat markets.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. Also, as a matter of justice to the great South and southern parts of the country, Galveston and New Orleans must be taken into consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; there is no doubt of it. They are both Mexican Gulf ports; New Orleans is, practically. When we come to naming, it might be objected that San Francisco or Portland ought to be included. They are port cities, and are the collecting and distributing points for a very considerable wheat area, although many people living in the northern Mississippi Valley country do not realize that. But when we speak of Philadelphia, New York, or Baltimore they are not interior primary markets any more than New Orleans or Galveston. They are really port cities, exporting points, all of them; and their principal wheat trade is because of the export trade which naturally begins there for the initial foreign shipments.

So this amendment, in its present form, will add very little to the clarity and practical working of the bill. I am disposed to vote for the amendment because it can not make the bill any worse than it is. To my mind, it is confusion about quadruply confounded anyhow, and it can not be made more uncertain by a few more experiments. When the earth was without form and void, before the Creator had exercised His omnipotent power on it, He had just as well have it as chaotic as possible. Creation, as described by the great Hebrew historian in Genesis, would not have been any more difficult as a cosmic act because of chaos, nor is what we face by this proposed legislation made more uncertain by a few more ventures in the unknown. I think that if the spirit of John Law, of Mississippi Bubble fame, is looking down on us from the heights above, he must have a sarcastic smile on his spiritual face now. This whole scheme, Mr. President, makes the Mississippi Bubble look like a 3½ per cent liberty bond alongside the glib predictions of novices who have thrust this measure on Congress.

I intend to vote against the bill. I shall not be stampeded by resolutions even from my constituents. When Julius Cæsar rose in the Roman Senate, according to an ancient historian, he said he proposed to divide the grain and the land among the proletariat in order to fight the senate. Did he ever divide them? After the crown was on his brow, and before he was smitten by Brutus, there was no division. After he had supreme power he forgot the division of food grains. He forgot the agrarian agitation he instigated to acquire power. After he secured power he exercised it like every other autocracy in the world's history.

I have no feeling against Mr. Hoover. Anybody who undertakes such a tremendous task must be judged leniently. This whole bill is destined to be a tremendous disappointment. It is promoted by manufactured sentiment. People expect much and must receive little. I do not care on such a crude measure what resolutions my constituents pass, it is my duty to oppose it.

I know more about this bill than my constituents do, and I shall vote according to my judgment, and take my chances hereafter in explaining its provisions to them. I shall trust to their sober second thought. People may be temporarily wrong, but they correct themselves when given facts and time to think. I appeal from my constituents drunk on manufactured sentiment to my constituents sober on the accurate understanding that comes from the cold, gray daylight of experience.

Mr. President, the resolutions passed come from large cities. I have no resolutions from the grain producers—not one—except in protest against the bill in any form in which it is presented here and likely to pass. I have numerous resolutions from labor unions, especially in the last few days. I know from what source they start. I have seen these inspired movements before. The labor-union resolutions come from a single mind. They are worded in the same way. They have their inspiration in the city of Washington. Mr. Gompers has pressed the key to the telegraph lines and has started the labor resolutions all over the country. I shall pay no more attention to those resolutions than I pay to Mr. Gompers himself, except to differ from him when he is in error and to join with him when he is right. Because railway wages can be fixed by legislation, it is assumed the farmer can be controlled the same way.

This amendment is of the same kind with the general purpose of the bill. When all of its different sponsors get through with it, those who write amendments and the like, it will be the same bill. Practically it is a price-fixing bill. It is an attempt to control the laws of markets by the puny flats of man. It will be destined to the same disappointment as all other similar schemes instituted in legislative bodies. The ineffective edicts of the Members of this Chamber will have no more effect finally upon the laws of markets than they have upon the ebb and flow of the elemental tides that wash the shores of this continent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I hope the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. CURTIS], to insert the words "or its equivalent" after the words "No. 1 northern," will be adopted. I think the chairman of the committee ought to accept it. If we are to do equal and exact justice between the farmers of the entire country, this is a very important and absolutely essential phrase in this bill. If we leave it as it is, it results in a discrimination between the wheat farmers in the Dakotas and Minnesota who raise No. 1 northern wheat and the farmers of Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma, Missouri, and the South who raise very little, if any, No. 1 northern wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I have here the report, given me by the secretary of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], from Dr. Brand, giving his explanation as to how he would construe this language. Dr. Brand states that if the words "primary market" are left in the bill there would be a question whether it would be Chicago or Minneapolis, but it would be one of the two; but he suggests that you change it to "grain market," and then it would be Chicago.

Now, let me suggest a number of primary terminal markets that we have in the country: Chicago, Minneapolis, Kansas City, Duluth, Buffalo, Omaha, St. Louis, Toledo, Milwaukee, Indianapolis, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, New Orleans, Galveston, Spokane, Portland, Seattle, San Francisco, and Ogden. Now, Senators, it is for you to decide whether you are going to leave it to Chicago or leave it to Chicago and Minneapolis, in the interest of all the grain growers.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the Senator will remember that I yielded for a question.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I thank the Senator.

Mr. THOMPSON. My time is very limited, and the Senator is talking about one amendment while I am talking about another. I think, however, that the Senator is right on that proposition, that the word should be in the plural—"markets" instead of "market."

As to the other amendment which I have been discussing, suggested by my colleague, I think there is no question but that it should be adopted to do equal and exact justice to the farmers, and place them all on the same basis throughout the country. I believe that is the endeavor and the desire of Congress. I do not think we raise in Kansas annually, on an average, over two or three hundred thousand bushels of No. 1 wheat. It is a very small proportion of our average of 100,000,000 bushels. Our No. 2 hard wheat is accepted everywhere as the equivalent of No. 1 northern. By adopting this amendment it will be well understood in the trade as being the same price as No. 1 northern, which is designated in the bill, and the addition of the words "or its equivalent," after the words "No. 1 northern," will place us all on the same basis.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion upon this question, and I must say it is somewhat disappointing to me. We are in a world war trying to supply our armies and our allies with wheat at reasonable prices. Here are Senators denouncing high prices in everything else and immediately trying to get every advantage they can in high prices for the particular things produced in their States. Now, there are two sides to this question. The consumer has got to be taken into consideration; the needs of the Government must be thought of. When you put a price of $2 a bushel upon wheat and then attempt to get, by reason of having a market at home, a higher price than that which ordinarily exists, and then compel the Government to guarantee that price and the freight, it seems to me you are demanding too much.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to what wheat has been selling for in the markets of the United States in the last 50 years.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. REED. I want to remind the Senator that the question is not now one of price at all, but it is whether a price named in the bill shall obtain at just one town in the United States. That is one question; but the question now is whether it shall be one grade of wheat or one grade of wheat and its equivalent—a grade of wheat equally good. Surely the Senator does not want to discriminate against Montana wheat that is just as good but is not No. 1 northern?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, what I have to say relates very largely to what has been discussed as to fixing the price at points. We know that the price of wheat is fixed at Liverpool in normal times, and we know that in the absence of local shortages you can find the price of wheat in every town in the United States by deducting from the Liverpool price the cost of transportation and insurance and the loss of the time of transporting in the way of interest. That results from natural conditions which arise from ours being an exporting country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know that the Senator wants to be accurate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I think he would be more accurate if he stated that the price was fixed by the greatest area or points of consumption. If he will take the northern brands of grain, he will find that they are scarcely influenced at all by the Liverpool price, and in many years during the summer months the Minneapolis price and the Liverpool price are the same.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are some variations in it, but the general price of wheat of the world is generally recognized as being fixed at Liverpool, because there is the place where the ships converge for the purpose of disposing of it in the largest market of all the world. That is where the highest price is paid; if it were not, we would not export to it.

Mr. President, when you attempt to establish in every town an equality of prices, I do not believe you can succeed. You will get a confusion in this matter, as it will be unnatural to the laws of trade.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It will be unnatural to the prices that are fixed in the markets of trade. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will allow me, does he think there is any doubt about Liverpool having fixed the price of wheat in the past? I assure the Senator there will be no question about it in the future.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know about that; it is very difficult to tell; but it seems to me when we are going to put into the bill a minimum price of $1.75 or $2 a bushel for the Government to guarantee and leaving any higher price to be controlled by the principle of supply and demand, we are doing a generous thing for the farmer. As the object of this legislation is to provide food products at reasonable prices for the boys who are fighting our battles, for our allies, and for the poor in general, we who are representing our agricultural States should be fair and reasonable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think the wheat farmers are asking for this legislation?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether they are asking for it or not. I know it is a great boon for the farmers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The farmers are not asking for this legislation. It is being imposed upon them to prevent their suffering a great loss.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think so. I think it is the greatest benefit to the farmer of any legislation that has ever been suggested.

Mr. President, what was the price of wheat? Let us be fair with our own Government and the people of the United States. From the United States Statistical Abstract I took the prices of wheat, the farm value per bushel on December 1 from the year 1866 to the year 1916. In the years from 1866 to 1875 the price was $1.086 per bushel; from 1876 to 1885 it was 92.6 cents a bushel; from 1886 to 1890 it was 76 cents per bushel; from 1891 to 1895 it was 61.7 cents a bushel; in 1896 it was 72.6 cents; in 1897 it was 80.8 cents; in 1898 it was 58.2 cents; in 1899 it was 58.4 cents; in 1900 it was 61.9 cents per bushel; in 1901 it was 62.4 cents; in 1902 it was 63 cents per bushel; in 1903 it was 69.5 cents; in 1904, 92.4 cents; in 1905, 74.8 cents; in 1906, 66.7 cents per bushel; in 1907 it was 87.4 cents; in 1908, 92 cents; in 1909, 99 cents; in 1910 it was 88.3 cents; in 1911, 87.4 cents per bushel; in 1912, 76 cents per bushel; in 1913 it was 79.9 cents; in 1914, 98.6 cents; in 1915, 91.9 cents; and in 1916, $1.60 per bushel.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him just one question there?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will yield if I have any time left.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask whether or not the Senator has the price of other commodities to put side by side with the price of wheat?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; but we are complaining about the price of other commodities. Senators say the coal barons ought to be indicted and that the steel magnates ought to be jailed; yet you attempt to use those very figures as an argument why there should be a high price for wheat. It does not seem to me to be fair.

Mr. President, we have all raised a little wheat. I have a farm and I have raised some wheat, and I must say that whenever wheat was $1 a bushel I have always said sow wheat. When we talk about a government guaranteeing $2 a bushel and then quibble here about whether we shall have 10 cents or 15 cents or 30 cents a bushel more by reason of the location of the land where we raise the wheat, it seems to me it is not fair. We are asking too much for a government in a great war to pay. You are absolutely ignoring the fact that the people of this country are hungry and that they are entitled to have some food at a fair price.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHAFROTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator this question: I understand the prices he gave are the prices which the farmers receive.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; the prices which the farmers receive.

Mr. NORRIS. In the primary markets?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; the price at the principal markets was somewhat higher—probably 8, 10, or 15; it may be 20 cents higher at the farthest point.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator, Is it true that the object of the legislation, whether it be fixed in the bill or given to a board, is to guarantee a minimum price, and the real object of it is to protect the consumer, in order to stimulate production and avoid the condition we are in now, where wheat is away above $2 a bushel?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Certainly; wherever the consumers are. The consumers are in the congested portions of the country. That is where they are, and if you are going to make the price $2 a bushel for Nevada, and then ship clear to New York City, it may be $2.30 or $2.40, and that is where the consuming public are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to withdraw the second amendment I offered. I think the result would be just the same as with the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Kansas has leave to withdraw his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to give notice that I shall reserve the right of calling for a vote upon the amendment which I offered day before yesterday, making one commissioner, or one administrator, instead of three, when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer my amendment providing for fixed interior markets and ask leave to amend it by withdrawing the word "six," so as to make it read "at the principal interior markets."

Mr. SMOOT. Changing "market" to "markets"?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes; putting it in the plural.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It will be observed that my amendment is simply to make the word "market" in the plural instead of the singular, so that the amendment of the Senator from Oregon will read: "At the principal interior primary markets" instead of "primary market."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator? It occurs in two places in the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Wherever it occurs.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. All that is necessary is to change the word "market" to "markets."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is all. That is what I suggested.

Mr. NORRIS. On page 2, line 10, and then on page 3, line 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, from some discussion in this Chamber the impression seems to prevail that the farmers, particularly the wheat raisers of the United States, are asking for this legislation. I want to say on behalf of the farmers of the West that they are not asking for this legislation. As far as the bill is concerned in its present form, the people of the West feel that it is a distinct discrimination against the producers of wheat. The Senate has voted to reject a control of other necessary articles; it has cut out steel, and iron, and copper, and cotton, and it has left the heavy hand of the Government to apply chiefly to wheat. The farmers feel that they have been selected who have no monopoly; that they who can not possibly combine, they who are engaged in a competitive occupation, largely the victims of increased prices themselves, have been selected by the bill from among all the others for regulation. They are told that the Government proposes in the interest of the consumer to limit the prices of the things that they raise.

I say the farmers are not asking for that legislation. When this legislation is imposed upon them to hold prices down, the least that can be done is to guarantee them against an undue depression, to guarantee them a minimum price.

My amendment is so designed that this guaranty shall be effective at the market where they sell their wheat, namely, the "principal interior primary markets." It will be of no value to them to guarantee that price at Liverpool and not much more to guarantee it in New York. The effect of my amendment is to guarantee it to them at their interior markets where their product is delivered.

Mr. President, my own view of this case is that the bill is probably unnecessary. But I shall not undertake on that account to vote against it, because I have nothing to substitute. The country cries out aloud for action. I am not willing to impose a mere negative against that demand. I shall vote for the bill, but I want to warn the Senate and I say to the country that a great deal of this impression about advancing prices is upon a false basis.

Prices always advance in war times. There has been no greater advance in the price of wheat and farm products than there has been in other things. Look at the price of wool, and cotton, and steel, and copper, and lumber, and paper, and oil, and fuel, and silver, and leather, and lead, and zinc, and all the other minerals. Such great advances in prices occur during every war. They occur for one reason because of an increased demand; they occur for another reason because a large number of producers are put into the fighting forces of the world; and they occur for another reason because the currency of the world is enormously inflated.

Every belligerent country has enormously expanded its currency. Germany has added three or four thousand millions of paper money to her currency. France has done likewise. The United States has already received from other countries of the world nearly two thousand millions of gold, which has expanded our currency. The result is that there has been a depreciation in the value of the dollar; it takes more dollars to buy the same thing.

Such an advance as has occurred in the price of wheat is no greater than the advance which has occurred in all the other necessaries of life. Yet it is proposed in this bill to pick out the farmer and say to the wheat raisers, "You are the ones who must be restricted by law. You who form no combination, you who form no monopoly, you who must take the price the buyers offer to you in the markets of the world, you are to be regulated by the hand of the Government." The farmers and their representatives say in answer to that, "If you do that, if you propose to violate the economic laws in an effort to control our prices, at least guarantee us a minimum. They insist on this and the justice of this plea is evident. But to make that guaranty effective it must apply not to Liverpool, London, or New York but in the principal primary markets of the United States where the wheat is sold.

I want to say, Mr. President, if this guaranty is not made and is not made effective, if the bill is left simply to threaten the farmer that present prices are to be depressed, the result will be that the crops for next year will be a disappointment to the country. It is in the interest of the consumers of the country that the farmer, if he is to be taken within the grasp of the law, should at least be given a guaranty of the price which he is to receive.

I therefore hope that the Senate will vote to put into the bill the plural "markets," so that the guaranty will apply to the principal interior primary markets at which wheat is sold.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska is to prevail I would then withdraw my amendment, which I believe would accomplish the same thing which his amendment will accomplish.

Mr. President, I do not think that I can be accused of acting selfishly in the argument which I made this morning. Those who are to administer this law have stated that the primary market would possibly be Minneapolis. If you leave in the word "primary" it would be between Chicago and Minneapolis. But what would become of the grain-growing section all over the United States where the freight charge would be charged against the farmer, in some instances making 50 cents a bushel? It would be unjust to the people in the South and in Oklahoma and in Kansas.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And Missouri.

Mr. GRONNA. And in Missouri. It would be unjust to Pennsylvania, Ohio, or any other State where they grow wheat.

Mr. President, I offered my amendment to make it plain that the Government of the United States is willing from the passage of this bill to pay as the minimum price $2 per bushel in the primary markets of the United States; that is, they would get $2 a bushel based upon No. 1 northern grade, whether the wheat would be brought to Chicago, to St. Louis, to Omaha, or to any other of the primary interior markets. We want to do justice to the people all over the country. I think it would be exceedingly unfortunate to pass the bill without making this provision plain.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a moment? Does the Senator think the embargo which was placed upon the shipment of wheat and other commodities would reduce the price of grain all over the United States?

Mr. GRONNA. It has reduced it a great deal, I will say to the Senator. I am not in a position to state the exact amount.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Is it not likely to reduce the price very much more?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Now, then, I ask the Senator if he does not think it is safe to fix a minimum price of $2, and does he not feel that that price would be larger than the farmer would receive under an embargo or than he would receive at all?

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that the price of wheat in Minneapolis yesterday was $2.60, and for that same grade under this bill it would be $2. I am not complaining about that. I realize that we are at war. The farmers are willing to do their share, they are willing to take the responsibility, and I am sure they are willing to sacrifice, but we must give them prices which will stimulate production. If we fix a price which makes it impossible for the farmer to plant the coming year, we will do a great deal more damage to the consumers than if we fix a reasonable price, and no man can complain of the price of $2 a bushel for wheat when you compare the food value of wheat or of bread with the food value of other food articles which we buy to-day.

As the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] pointed out yesterday, under section 4 you can put every farmer in the United States who does not plant the maximum area in the penitentiary. We are passing a most drastic law. We are saying to the farmers, "Whether you want to plant wheat or not, you must plant. If you do not you will be put in the penitentiary for a year at least or fined $10,000, or both." Nobody can construe that section in a different way. The Senator from Pennsylvania explained it on yesterday, and he suggested to me privately that perhaps it would be a good idea to fill up some of the buildings which will be made vacant under the pending bill.

Mr. PENROSE. And turn them into jails?

Mr. GRONNA. And turn them into jails. I do not think you want to do that. I do not suppose that is the purpose, but that is the language of the bill. So that if the Government should discover that there is a smaller acreage of wheat next year than there was this year, if you can construe this language that the farmer intentionally refused to plant wheat, it would make him a criminal, whether he was able to plant wheat or not.

Mr. President, after you have taken the world's market away from the farmer, after you have placed an embargo upon wheat, after you have treated him differently from what you have those who are engaged in other industries, after the allies have agreed that there shall be but one purchasing agent, will anyone assume that there will be any competition in the market? The only market that is left to the farmer of the United States is the little local market of the American miller. You have already taken away the other markets of the world, and I believe that you ought at least to make it possible for the farmer to get on an average from $1.60 to $1.75 a bushel for wheat. If you fix the price at $2 in the primary interior market, as is proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, the farmer will not receive, taking all the grades into consideration, to exceed $1.60 to $1.75 per bushel.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to ask to have inserted in the RECORD, for the information perhaps of the conferees on this measure, a statement which I think is entirely reliable and which has been carefully prepared, showing that the conversion of whisky into munitions or for other industrial purposes, as contemplated in the so-called Smoot amendment, is impracticable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

CONVERSION OF WHISKY INTO MUNITIONS IMPRACTICABLE.

Aside from the stupendous loss of revenue entailed in the Smoot prohibition amendment to the food measure—based under the proposed revenue bill upon $2.20 per proof gallon (50 per cent alcohol)—chemical and commercial authorities are of the opinion that the conversion of commandeered whisky into alcohol suitable for powder making would be wholly impracticable. Under the Army and Navy specifications for smokeless powder, alcohol can not contain in excess of 0.01 per cent of acid (calculated as acetic acid) or leave more than 0.006 per cent of residue after evaporation, and must be otherwise absolutely pure, colorless, and odorless. In aged whiskies the charred staves of the barrel produce an amount of tannic acid which alone is estimated to average twenty times more than such allowed minimum. To eliminate all objectionable acids, aldehydes, and ethers, the alcohol redistilled from whisky would have to undergo further and more or less expensive chemical treatment, and it is considered extremely doubtful whether even then the neutral product essential for reliable smokeless powder could be obtained. Furthermore, as whisky distilleries do not have redistilling columns, or alcohol stills, such whiskies would have to be shipped to plants possessing the necessary apparatus, of which, comparatively speaking, there are but few, and the capacity of those has already been taken up for long future periods. Practically every barrel would have to be recoopered to prevent loss in transit, and box cars, to assure protection against theft and tampering of contents, would be required. In these times the transportation problem alone would be a knotty one.

According to the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916 (which is the last available record for statistical purposes), there were on that date 228,677,773 gallons of whisky in distillery and general bonded warehouses. That the entries into and the withdrawals from bond during the succeeding 12 months would not materially change these figures is shown by the fact that on June, 1917, distilled spirits of all kinds in bonded warehouses (including fruit brandies) approximated that amount.

Figuring 47 gallons to the barrel would aggregate 4,865,485 barrels. These whiskies will average four years in bond and the governmental allowance for leakage, evaporation, etc., would be 9½ gallons per barrel, equaling 46,222,108 gallons which, deducted from the original amount in bond, would leave 182,455,665 net gallons in warehouses.

Over 80 per cent of whiskies in bond are owned and controlled by at least 175,000 retailers and 5,000 wholesalers and jobbers throughout the country. The owners of such 80 per cent have paid as high as $1.25 per proof gallon in bond, and the warehouse receipts are changing hands by sale in the ordinary course of business almost daily.

Assuming conservatively that the average cost of such whiskies to the people holding the warehouse receipts would be 80 cents per proof gallon, original gauge, the Government's investment for the bare goods in bond would amount to $182,942,218.40, which, divided by $182,455,665 (the net amount remaining in bond after deduction of the Government allowance), would make the whisky cost $1.0026 per proof gallon in bond. The average freight to the point of redistillation would be at least 2 cents per proof gallon, thus increasing such price to $1.0226 per proof gallon. In redistilling the whiskies into alcohol the production would average one-half gallon of alcohol, 190 proof, for each gallon of whisky redistilled, making the alcohol produced therefrom cost at that stage $2.0452 per commercial gallon. The actual expense of redistilling the whisky into alcohol, without regard to the powder-making test, would be at least 5 cents per proof or 10 cents per commercial gallon, which would increase the cost of each gallon obtained by redistillation to $2.1452 per commercial gallon naked, plus cartage, insurance, freight, and other charges incidental to delivery of the product at Government arsenals or other powder works.

If the Government buys such whiskies from the owners thereof, there would probably have to be included in the cost State and county taxes and storage, which are lawful liens against the whiskies in bond. This would add millions of dollars to the purchase price. No account of these and other contingencies has been taken in computing the above figures.

Alcohol, guaranteed to meet the United States Government and its allies' specifications for smokeless powder, hospital supplies, and other war uses, can now be bought in the open market at less than $1 per commercial gallon.

In the above connection it is proper to note that if the Smoot amendment was intended to prohibit the manufacture and limit the distribution of drinkable alcoholic spirits during the war, it falls decidedly short of accomplishing that object for several obvious reasons, but principally because the suggested law, of which it is a part, refers only to foods, fruits, food materials, and feeds, whereas ethyl (potable) alcohol, easily made adaptable to abnormal beverage trade conditions and demands, is now manufactured in large quantities from sawdust and sulphite liquors (waste of pulp mills). It can also be readily made from other nonedible substances containing fermentable matter, and commercial chemists agree that if there be an adequate market therefor, it can be produced without even resorting to a fermentable base.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I feel very confident, if the Senate will understand the amendment which is now before it, that there will not be any serious opposition to it. The proposition is to change the word "market" to "markets." As the bill now reads, it proposes to guarantee not less than $2 a bushel for wheat at the principal primary market. That means that the Government will guarantee to pay for wheat at the principal primary market alone $2 a bushel, but that it will not guarantee that price at any other market. Accordingly, this sort of thing will happen: I will assume that the city of Minneapolis is selected or designated as the principal primary market. Then, the farmer living within wagon distance of Minneapolis will get $2 a bushel for his wheat; the man living within 100 miles of Minneapolis will get $2 for his wheat minus the freight rate for 100 miles; the man living a thousand miles from Minneapolis will get $2 a bushel for his wheat minus the freight for 1,000 miles. Accordingly, the guaranteed price for wheat will visit its blessings only upon one particular community and a discrimination against all other parts of the United States will result.

That was certainly not the purpose of those who framed this bill. The bill ought to be so framed that its blessings or its benefits or its justice shall be extended to each part of the United States in the same way and at the same time. It may be impracticable to guarantee $2 wheat at the sidetracks all over the United States, but there are principal primary markets scattered throughout the United States, which are well known in the trade and business as such. Those markets are so located that no injustice will result.

One of them undoubtedly would be in New York; another in Chicago; another in St. Louis; another in Minneapolis; another in Galveston; another in New Orleans. There will be one or two on the Pacific coast, and the farmer raising wheat on the Pacific coast will get his $2, minus the freight to the nearest principal market, whereas if you allow the bill to stand as it is now the farmer on the Pacific coast will get his $2 per bushel for wheat minus the freight rate charged to Minneapolis, which would be perhaps 40 or 50 cents a bushel. I do not know the amount, and what I say may be a wild guess, but it would be a very heavy charge.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It would be about 30 cents, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from Washington. So, Mr. President, if we are to give this guarantee let us give it to all parts of the country alike and upon the same terms.

On the other hand, suppose Kansas City should, fortunately for it, be selected as the principal primary market—and it might well be—then all the grain growers of Missouri and Kansas would have an advantage over the grain growers of the great Northwest, and that would not be fair to those grain growers.

At the present time these primary markets exist, and, singularly enough, the prices at all of them are substantially the same, not only for the same grade of wheat but for the equivalent grades. Let me call your attention to the wheat market reported in the Chicago Tribune of yesterday. I find that at Duluth, Minn., No. 1 northern wheat brought $2.58 a bushel; at Omaha, Nebr., No. 2 hard brought from $2 to $2.57 a bushel—substantially the same prices. At Toledo, Ohio, wheat is simply marked "cash wheat," and brought $2.50 a bushel. Without going into detail, it may be said that there is a general similarity between the primary markets as to prices, there being some slight difference as to freight and always as to local conditions; but, in a general way, the great primary markets of the country have the same prices.

Unless we change the word "market" to "markets" we shall have one primary market. It will have an advantage over every other primary market in the United States, and the wheat raisers of that neighborhood will have benefits and advantages which will be denied to all the other people of the United States. That is not fair, and the Senate, I am sure, will not do an unfair thing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I was interrupted in the argument which I was attempting to make on the amendment by reason of the expiration of my time. The theory that this bill is going to curb the price of wheat, except by reason of great production, is something which I can not find justified in any of its provisions. There is a demand for lower prices on everything, and that demand is reasonable. Now, to attempt to make $2 wheat sure, by the Government guaranteeing that price and paying the freight charges, it seems to me is something that may prove to be very hazardous to the Government. It may result in the Government being compelled to buy all the wheat.

If we shall produce in this country a billion bushels of wheat next year, it may mean that $2,000,000,000 and freight charges will be the amount that the Government may have to pay. Mr. President, when we make a minimum price for wheat, we are not attempting to curb the maximum price. We are going to let that follow the principle of supply and demand. If the price goes higher, the Government will have to pay the higher price if it desires to buy either for its soldiers or those of our allies. For that reason the theory that we are compelling the farmer to sell at $2 a bushel is not warranted by any of the provisions of this bill

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. There was in this bill a proposed control of aluminum, a monopoly; of steel, copper, and of cotton. Those things have been taken out of the provisions of the bill. Did not the Senator vote to take them out?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; I did. I voted to take them out because I thought the Government was attempting to enter upon too big an undertaking.

Mr. REED. Yes; and they were in there for the purpose of regulation, were they not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. REED. You leave wheat in to be regulated, do you not?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; we do.

Mr. REED. Now I say, if you leave wheat in to be regulated and take out copper and steel and aluminum so that they are not subject to regulation, then something ought to be done to protect the producer of wheat in order that he may not be regulated to death.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, that is exactly what we are doing, and we are guaranteeing to him a price of $2 a bushel, when, according to the Statistical Abstract, the average price for a number of years has been practically 80 or 85 cents a bushel.

Mr. REED. And against that you are protesting.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I am not protesting against $2, but I am protesting against the continual effort to raise more and more the price by reason of adding on the freight.

Now, Mr. President, we have practically in this country one market for wheat, and whenever we sell wheat in a place away from that market, we have got to deduct the amount of the freight. That condition——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I can not yield further; I only have 10 minutes.

Mr. REED. I only want to ask the Senator to tell us what that principal market is?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is New York.

Mr. REED. The Senator was never more mistaken in his life.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I believe I am right.

Mr. REED. The price of wheat is not based on the New York price

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; it is based on the New York price. That is the exporting market. That is where, with probably variations to a limited extent, by reason of drought in some sections, nine-tenths of the wheat finds its market, and the price of wheat, in my judgment, is controlled by the price at New York.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct him? I am sure he does not want to make a statement that he can not justify. If the Senator will look at the market quotations, he will find that very often the price in the city of Minneapolis is higher than in the city of New York.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is sometimes the case when there is a shortage in crops in the Northwest, or something of that kind, but New York is the great exporting market. The export price controls the price in the country, for if it did not nobody would export.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to correct him again?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I will not yield now; but I will before I finish.

Mr. REED. Duluth is the great exporting market.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, I do not think so, because a great portion of the wheat in the Duluth market goes to New York through the Erie Canal, and the price at New York therefore fixes the price in the Duluth market.

Now, Mr. President, it is stated that the farmers, on account of being distant from the price-fixing market, should have the price fixed at the home market. There are some centers that are called principal grain markets; but, Mr. President, if we are going to get down to a level where equal prices will be paid to the farmer, the way to bring that about is to guarantee the same price at each farm. We can not do that very well; and if we should attempt to do it, it might bankrupt the Treasury. Millions of acres of land remote from railroads might be put into wheat for the purpose of collecting the guaranteed price. I must say that $2 is a large price. I thought at first that $1.75 would be amply sufficient, but when we increase it to $2 per bushel and then add to that the price of freight from all over the United States to the principal market we are going to have wheat selling in New York, with a guaranteed price by the Government at New York, at from $2.25 to $2.30 a bushel. There is where the consumers to a large extent live, and there is where bread riots, if any are going to occur, will take place. There is where the shipments are to be made to our troops and to those of our allies. The first demand, I understand, was for a guaranteed price of $1.50 a bushel, which was granted. The committee was then asked to increase it to $1.75 per bushel and then to $2 a bushel, and now on the floor of the Senate it is proposed by some Senators from agricultural States to make the Government pay the freight.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when we are generous with the money of the United States to the extent of saying that we will give $2 a bushel for wheat, it ought to be at the point where the price of wheat is practically fixed in the United States, the point where shipments will be made by our Government to our armies and to our allies. If we do not do that, we will bring about sales to our own Government at high prices. We will be legalizing high prices, to which the other industries can point in justification of their own high prices. Why should not the farmer on his farm have the price fixed at $2 a bushel, if equality is what is desired? That would be the way to do it on the basis of equality; but the market price of wheat is determined according to natural laws. When one buys land at a great distance from the wheat market he inevitably takes that fact into consideration in determining whether or not he will buy it, and the price of the land to a large extent is fixed by its proximity to the market. For that reason the man who is at a distant point gets his land at a less price than the one who buys land close to the market. Those are all matters which, it seems to me, ought to be taken into consideration in saying at what market the price should be guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. President, this amendment means, to my mind, that three-fourths of the wheat, if the Government has to take over the wheat, will have to be taken over at the New York market, and that the guaranteed price will be probably $2.25 or $2.30 per bushel. Where are we going to give relief to the people who are demanding low prices? It is no answer to this question to say that some other industry is trying to get a high price for its products; it is no answer to say that the steel producers are robbing the people of the United States, because there ought to be some law that will apply to them; there ought to be some of the antitrust laws put in force to prevent inordinately high prices for steel products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I have proposed and had printed an amendment to the pending measure. Inasmuch as I do not wish even by a vote to delay the bill or in any way embarrass the conferees if I should be successful in placing the amendment on the bill, I give notice that I withdraw that amendment and do not ask any further consideration of it. I refer to the amendment on the subject of migratory birds and game.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, because it is well known that there are several interior primary markets in the United States for wheat. I read from the Minneapolis morning paper, which gives among other interior markets Minneapolis, Chicago, Duluth, St. Louis, and Kansas City. There might be added a large number of other cities in different sections of the country.

I was somewhat surprised at the statement made by the Senator from Colorado, in which he pointed out New York as the principal market. Those who have studied the question know that a large amount of wheat is shipped from Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York, St. Louis, Galveston, New Orleans, and other points; and as long as there are various markets it would be unfair to the producers of wheat to fix the market price at any one city, because if you do the producers of wheat in Kansas and Oklahoma and Missouri and other States would be compelled to accept the price at New York, if that happened to be the place selected, less the freight. So instead of giving them $2, as is promised in this bill, you would give them $2 less the freight and other charges.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will not the Senator remember that the word "interior" is used, and New York and Galveston and New Orleans can not be regarded as interior markets?

Mr. CURTIS. That is so, but the Senator from Colorado mentioned New York as the market place. If you take the interior, there is Chicago, there is Minneapolis, there is Duluth, there is Kansas City, there is Omaha, there is Denver, there is Portland, and I might name other places in the same class; so it would be unfair to give one market place an advantage over all other market places. If you selected Chicago, the wheat producers would be compelled to pay the freight or deduct the freight charges; and the same would be true if Minneapolis should be selected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that this amendment is merely to compel the Government to pay the freight of the farmers?

Mr. CURTIS. No; it is not. This amendment is to do justice to the wheat growers of this country. The freight would come out of the farmer and not out of the Government. There is no reason why the man who produces wheat in the neighborhood of Minneapolis, if Minneapolis should be selected as the place, should receive more for his wheat than the producer in Oklahoma or Nebraska, and he does not ask any more. All the farmers of this country want is fair and just treatment, and they are not asking anything more of the Government.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, before this amendment is voted upon I want the Senate to understand just what they are voting on. If they will turn to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon, page 1, the next to the last line, I will construe it as I understand it:

> Said board shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain-standards act, approved August 11, 1916.

That is, it is the duty of the board to fix prices for all of the official standard grades of wheat. Then it continues:

> It shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as it shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment, and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern as the principal interior primary market as the basis.

It is thus made the duty of the board to fix the price for No. 1 northern at the principal interior primary market, wherever that may be. If there is a doubt here as to which it is, the board will decide. I think myself they will fix it at Minneapolis. Then it is the duty of the board, allowing for differences in location and the cost of transportation, to fix the price at all the principal primary markets, whether they are interior or seaboard markets; and, in my judgment, they will have to fix the price at New York higher than $2. I should think they would have to fix it higher at Chicago, but I do not know.

The Senate will readily see the reason for that. Assume that a man has 100 acres of splendid land at the top of some mountain range, and there is no access to that tract of land but a trail. It will not be of any value to him except for grazing purposes. If he constructs a road to it, wheat raised there will be worth as much as it will fetch in the market after deducting the cost of transporting it to market. You may have a million bushels of wheat in some place, and it is worthless unless there are people there to consume it, unless you can move it somewhere where there is a market for it. So, then, it is the duty of the board to take one single standard by which the prices at all other interior primary markets shall be graded, and also all other seaboard markets.

The history of this amendment is this: It was first suggested that the price be fixed at a dollar and a half a bushel. As an eastern man I thought that was high, but I agreed to it. It was next proposed to put it at $1.66. I agreed to that, reluctantly. The next proposition was $1.75, and it was so printed in the original amendment. I agreed to that. Then the western farmers came to me and said, "If you fix it at $1.75 at Minneapolis, we in the Far West will only get $1.25 for our grades of wheat at that point. Put it at $2 and in North Dakota the farmer will get $1.85 a bushel for his best No. 1 northern wheat and the man who is farther away will get $1.75, and for the inferior grades of wheat he will get as low as $1.50." It was in response to that argument that I agreed to vote for No. 1 northern wheat at Minneapolis at $2 a bushel.

I fear that if this amendment is pressed and adopted it will have this result—that the minimum price for wheat will not be voted into this bill at all. I myself will gladly accept that result. If this amendment is adopted, it will justify me in voting against fixing the price of wheat at $2, because it will have the effect of putting the price of wheat at Minneapolis, Chicago, and New York away above $2. I can not justify myself to my constituents for fixing a price that will put flour in excess of $9 a barrel at Minneapolis, making it $12 and $13 a barrel when sold to families in New Hampshire. This next winter I shall not be able to explain to men working at low wages in our eastern manufacturing centers why I was willing to vote for a Government-fixed price for wheat in excess of $2 a bushel.

I hope the friends of the measure will not insist on putting through this amendment. I believe—I really and sincerely believe—that it will imperil the whole matter of fixing a minimum price for wheat if it is adopted. I can not vote for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New Hampshire, if I understand him correctly, misunderstands the purport of this bill and the proposed amendment. The bill provides for a minimum guaranty only, not a maximum; it provides for those minimum guaranties at the principal interior points of sale, not at New York or Galveston or New Orleans or any of these exporting places.

The Senator ought to remember that, taking a place like Minneapolis, the greater part of the grain that is shipped to that point is ground there; it is made into flour. So the wheat is not exported anywhere else; it is sent in the shape of flour to the different sections of the United States. That is true of Buffalo; it is true to a great extent, I think, probably, of Kansas City and a number of the other interior points where they have large milling interests.

Now, how would this bill, if it becomes a law, be operative? I do not believe, as I understand it, that you can fix a higher price than $2 per bushel at any point—I mean a guaranteed price of $2 per bushel at any point.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. It is made the duty of the commission under the bill to fix the price at any of the primary markets upon the price at Minneapolis.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator state to me if the price at Minneapolis is $2, is the board going to fix the price at New York higher than $2?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; that is not at all the meaning. Take No 1 northern at the principal primary market as the basis. I understand simply by that that No. 1 northern at the standard price at Minneapolis would be $2.

Mr. HOLLIS. And how much would it be——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. That would allow the fixing of a different grade, for instance, No. 2 northern at Minneapolis, at a less price, and No. 2 northern at Chicago at a less price. If we put in the word "market" for what little you have of No. 1 northern it would be $2 at Chicago. My understanding of the bill is that the price would not be more than $2 at any one of these interior points, and that where we speak of the basis it refers to the grade taken as the basis and not the point of delivery as the basis.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator tell me, because he knows the business, assuming that the commission fix the price on No. 1 northern at Minneapolis at $2 per bushel, what would he feel ought to be the price fixed for No. 1 northern in New York?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would not fix the price of No. 1 northern in New York because——

Mr. HOLLIS. It would be the duty of the board under the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Because New York is not a primary market. It is simply an exporting market. I would, however, fix the price on No. 1 northern in Duluth, which is the interior market, at $2; I would fix it at Rochester and at Buffalo at $2; that is, that would be the minimum, if there were any portion of it raised. But there is no necessity of fixing those prices in Rochester or Buffalo, because the adjacent country there produces no grain whatever that is denominated northern, either No. 1 or No. 2. The northern grains are raised in Minnesota, in the two Dakotas, in eastern Montana, and in all of the Canadian country west of the Red River of the North, and east of the Rockies.

Now, how would the price be fixed at Kansas City? Kansas City would have no No. 1 northern. There is no No. 1 northern sold in Kansas City, but if by a comparison of the milling value of No. 1 hard winter wheat in Kansas City it was found to be worth within 3 cents as much as No. 1 northern, then of course it would be $1.97, because the word "equivalent" there must be construed to mean equivalent in value for milling purposes. Otherwise it would have no meaning whatever.

Mr. President, it seems to me to be perfectly proper that we should fix a price the equivalent of $2 a bushel at all these interior points. These interior points are then supplied from the grain that is raised in the particular section. That is where you fix the price for the particular kind of wheat that is raised in that section. When you fix No. 1 red winter in Chicago you fix it at $2 or its equivalent, compared with No. 1 northern in Minneapolis. If the No. 1 red winter in Chicago was worth within 2 cents as much for milling purposes as No. 1 northern in Minneapolis according to the Minneapolis grades that are used, or the Federal grades, if we adopt the Federal grades, then it would be worth $1.98 in Chicago. That is the purpose of the bill, namely, that none shall be guaranteed at less than the equivalent of $2 for No. 1 northern and none shall be guaranteed for more than that at any point in the United States. There is not a syllable in the bill that guarantees to a producer that any one shall receive more than $2 at any point.

Now, remember that this is merely a guaranty of a minimum price provided the Government sees fit to guarantee it. It does not guarantee a maximum price. If the supply and demand throughout the world will compel the bidding for a greater price than $2 per bushel, then a greater price of course will prevail. This is simply the minimum and does not affect the higher prices which the law of supply and demand may secure. This is why, Mr. President, I am willing to vote for this measure. I would not be willing to vote for it under any circumstances if it fixed $2 as the maximum that might be charged for grain in the United States, because the law of supply and demand will govern that.

I wish to say once more, Mr. President, in closing, that I can not hear Senators talk about Liverpool fixing the price of the grain raised in the United States without my mind going back to a gentleman by the name of Rip Van Winkle, who was asleep for 20 years. It may be that 40 or 60 years ago the Liverpool price had something to do with our price, when our consumption at home was comparatively small compared with the exports; but our consumptive market to-day takes about six-sevenths of all the grain produced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the time of which Thomas Jefferson wrote seems to be at hand. He said when the people in the cities began to pile up on each other they then would begin to devour each other. That period is here, it appears, so that in New York, on the East Side, where considerable pressure for bread has been exerted, when the population has consumed the accumulated surplus they will then start on the producer of food. They will spread out in the country. Possibly when they reach out in the rural districts old mother earth will disinfect the conditions of municipal living. Before the disinfection occurs, however, a considerable destruction will result. In later years the time to which Jefferson referred was predicted by the historian, Macaulay, in a quotation that is familiar to every Senator. He said we have not yet reached the test of the stability of our institutions. We are reaching it in just such eras as this. We are reaching it in the dangerous concentration of our population in the large municipalities.

This country will never be destroyed by the rural population. There will be enough sturdy independence and integrity survive among those who live in less densely crowded areas to preserve the country. If anything occurs of a sinister kind it will be in the crowded centers of population, from which this demand comes for the passage of such bills as this. It is the premonitory symptom of agrarian agitation for the taking of land, for seizing the products of land can not be different from taking the land itself. Fixing the price of the products of land is the threshold of taking the land. It is a part of the single-tax principle and is the opening wedge to confiscate land by the use of the tax power. In saving democracy for Europe we will lose it at home.

Mr. President, we have seen cotton and wool and their fabrics stricken out of this bill. We have seen aluminum stricken out. We have seen copper stricken out. We have seen iron and steel and their products stricken out. We have seen agricultural implements stricken out. We have seen hemp and the products of hemp, binding twine, and everything the farmer needs stricken out. We have seen every manufactured article that the tiller of the soil must buy stricken out, until this bill stands to-day as a regulatory proposed measure for the producers of foodstuffs alone. We have seen that committed deliberately, and now this amendment comes to make the interior primary market a single point in the country, and make it New York or some other seaboard export point in actual practice. The amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] would make it the principal interior primary market of the country. That would be in accordance with existing economic law, because the price of wheat depends upon the amount that must be bored out by the inspector, tolled out by the common carrier, and taken out by the broker before it reaches the mill or the ultimate consumer. But as the amendment is originally written without the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, it would be simply a point fixed at some point in the interior of the United States by the department, by the President, by the food administrator, or some authority outside of any written language in the bill.

It has been insisted that the farmer was the beginning of this agitation. This is an error. It had its origin in the cities, among men and women who produce nothing that feeds the human race. It began with the consumers in the cities and it will end with the consumers in the cities, either in legislation or in a tumultuous manner, in riots, before it has spent its misdirected force.

Senators are not, I think, sufficiently advised of the dangers of the machinery they are forging in such legislation as this. It always seems so much easier to bow to manufactured clamor than oppose it. We will repent in sackcloth and ashes when the damage is done.

I will take my chances with the ultimate consumer. I am thinking about the producer of the foodstuffs, who must first of all produce anything before it can be consumed. We have disem-boweled the farmer literally in this bill as it stands to-day and forced his surplus he sells into a market made by law and compelled him to buy in a market free and open under the laws of trade.

I wish to insert as a part of my time, without reading, a letter from the Illinois coal operators. I have no sympathy with anybody who asks undue profits on any merchandise he is selling. I send the letter, addressed to myself from Mr. Honnold, secretary-treasurer of the Illinois Coal Operators' Association, dated July 19, 1917, inclosing with it an article or letter to Mr. Morrow from the Pittsburgh Coal Producers' Association. I ask that the letter and the article be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE ILLINOIS COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, July 19, 1917.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We attach hereto and would like to commend to your careful reading and consideration copy of a letter issued by the commissioner of Pittsburgh Coal Producers' Association, discussing the conditions surrounding coal industry in the United States at the present time.

Mr. Morrow has so excellently stated the facts that there remains nothing for us to add. The conditions which he describes as affecting production of coal and its distribution from the Pittsburgh district are the conditions that prevail in Illinois.

Thanking you in advance for your careful protection of the interests of our industry as against unwarrantable and shortsighted assaults now being made or contemplated and assuring you that your effort in so protecting the industry will be alike appreciated both by operators and miners, I am,

Very truly, yours, F. C. HONNOLD,
Secretary-Treasurer.

PITTSBURGH COAL PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION,
PITTSBURGH, PA.

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am taking the liberty of writing to you because legislation proposed by Senators POMERENE, CALDER, and others affecting the coal-mining industry, vitally concerns the interest of the whole country, and particularly such an industrial State as Indiana.

The coal-mining industry asks no special favors nor pleads for any special treatment. We merely desire that Congress shall act in the light of accurate information and clear thinking. The discussion in the Senate, however, indicates a surprising misunderstanding of the true conditions and a disturbing readiness to adopt ill-considered measures that ignore the real causes of the trouble.

I shall not enlarge upon the conditions causing the complaint. You are doubtless familiar with the difficulty consumers have had in obtaining coal and with the fact that prices have been unduly high. In considering remedies for these conditions it is important to understand their causes and to fit the treatment to the ailment. You have doubtless heard it charged that high prices have been caused by concerted action on the part of coal operators in violation of the law. Your own understanding will assign due weight to these unfounded and unjust allegiations when you consider that the United States Department of Justice, the Federal Trade Commission, and dozens of State, municipal, and county officials and grand juries have been constantly inquiring into all the activities of every organization in the business, have examined the correspondence, the sales books, and the records of scores of coal companies, and that the entire business of the coal industry has been conducted for months under the searching scrutiny of all the agencies for the enforcement of the State and Federal antitrust laws.

Briefly, the real causes for the trouble are as follows: Extraordinary industrial demand for coal has coincided with a shortage of available transportation, and consumers have bid against each other in a scramble to obtain coal. Such action under such conditions produced the logical effect on prices. This country is asking this year some 50,000,000 tons more of coal than ever before. The United States Geological Survey and the Federal Trade Commission state that the mines can readily produce two or three times that much additional coal over and above the production of 1916 if they have sufficient cars. Railroad cars are essential to steady mine operation because bituminous coal is not stored at the mines, and hence the mines are unable to run unless they can dump their output constantly into waiting railroad cars. Moreover, storage of coal at the mines is not desired because such storage ought to be made at the places of consumption, so that stored supplies can be drawn on promptly and surely when and as needed.

The mines in the Pittsburgh district alone can ship nearly 1,000,000 tons more of coal each month if they have adequate transportation. The mines here and throughout the country generally have not at any time since last October had sufficient railroad cars to ship the coal which consumers were demanding The mines in this association, which are only a portion of those in the Pittsburgh district, have a capacity for the current year of 34,200,000 tons of coal provided they have sufficient cars in which to ship this coal. Contracts with customers dependent on these mines for their coal supplies call for the shipment of approximately 27,000,000 tons during this year, leaving more than 7,000,000 tons which should be available for additional demands. To date, however, solely because of the lack of transportation, production and shipments from our mines have been running at the rate of less than 24,000,000 tons for the year, which is typical of the general conditions. You will understand the results of such conditions too readily to require extended exposition.

It is true that the railroads have moved more coal during the first six months of this year than in a similar period during the preceding year, but the country needed even more coal than they moved. This coal was not supplied simply and solely because the railroads could not move it from the mines. While that condition has improved somewhat, the mines in this important producing region and in many others are still operating at only 70 to 75 per cent capacity because of a lack of sufficient railroad cars. This means that the mines are necessarily idle one or two days each week, at a time when the country is clamoring for coal.

As we see it, this is the essential fact in the coal problem: Unless sufficient cars are furnished to permit the mines from their abundant reserve capacity to supply the coal which the Nation needs factories must inevitably be closed next winter and people will suffer, simply because at the time the coal is needed it will be in the mines instead of in Boston, Indianapolis, Evansville, New York, Chicago, Cleveland, Duluth, Minneapolis, and other places of consumption. No amount of price fixing or regulation or commandeering of mines will change that situation in the slightest particular unless transportation is available to haul the coal required to the points where it is needed. This is the carefully considered conclusion of the Federal Trade Commission, as given in its official report to the Senate on the bituminous-coal industry, and as amplified and emphasized in Commissioner Colver's testimony on this subject before the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Since transportation is obviously the key to the solution of this problem, it is desirable to understand what is being done to improve transportation. You are doubtless familiar with the efforts being made by the railroads themselves. In addition, the recent car-shortage amendment to the interstate-commerce law gives ample authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission to stop the transportation abuses and inefficiencies which are primarily responsible for the transportation troubles. The commission is now taking this matter in hand and has organized a new division to administer the authority conferred by this amendment. We are satisfied that the commission, with the assistance of the railroads, will find means to assure the shipment of all the coal which the country is demanding. If the Senate doubts this, permit me to suggest that it should direct the Interstate Commerce Commission, by resolution, to see that the coal mines are given sufficient transportation to supply the country with coal.

If adequate transportation is furnished the mines, it is a plain conclusion that coal prices will return to normal levels, because no buyer will pay exorbitant prices when he can obtain supplies from a dozen different sellers all eager to dispose of their production. As we see it, this is the real remedy for the present coal problem of the Nation, because at one stroke it will furnish the tonnage of coal required and at the same time will reduce prices naturally and without any arbitrary and disturbing interference with the usual business procedure. On the other hand, governmental price fixing and regulation can not add one pound to the production, but are almost certain to reduce the output, complicate the distribution of coal, make it difficult for the consumer to obtain the particular kind which his business especially requires, and lead to dangerous disorganization. Tying this industry up with red tape can cause irretrievable disaster.

Coal operators recognize the fact that until the transportation shortage is remedied some control of prices in the interest of the consumer may be necessary. They have already voluntarily accepted the suggestion of Secretary Lane to reduce prices and are observing the prices he fixed, pending fuller investigation. They will observe any others that he suggests later. Not another industry in the country has gone so far as this. Through Secretary Lane, the Federal Trade Commission, and the committee on coal production effective temporary control of coal prices can thus be exercised to protect the consumer until adequate transportation renders such control no longer necessary.

For these reasons we hope that Congress will give the Interstate Commerce Commission time to exercise the broad authority which has been conferred upon it for the express purpose of solving just such problems as the coal business presents and will not, before the commission can even begin its remedial action, add to the difficulties of the coal industry by ill-advised revolutionary legislation except as a last resort should the efforts of the Interstate Commerce Commission prove unavailing.

Please understand that we do not in any way oppose the efficient organization of industry in this Nation for the successful conduct of the war, but we are genuinely concerned for fear that through failure to understand the real crux of the coal situation Congress may enact hasty legislation which will precipitate a grave coal crisis next winter that should never occur. The causes of the trouble have been clearly pointed out by agencies of the Government commissioned to discover them. Ample authority has been given other Government agencies to remove these causes. May we not hope, therefore, that in these circumstances the Senate will display the common sense which is the first attribute of statesmanship.

Should you desire more detailed information in respect to any phase of this question on which we have the facts, I shall be glad to serve you.

Very truly, yours, ——— ———,
Commissioner.

Mr. SHERMAN. In connection with that in my own time I read a telegram from Quincy, Ill., July 17, 1917, addressed to myself. It is as follows:

QUINCY, ILL., July 17, 1917.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
The Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We are one of the largest food manufacturers in the world. The distillers throughout the country are buying up the corn. Grits we used to buy at $1.10 we now have to pay $4.40 for. People like ourselves might as well consider going out of business at a time when the people of the country are striking and rioting in different parts of the country on account of the high cost of living. Authorities are so conducting public affairs that corn that ought to be used in food is going into whisky; the result is now that cash corn for immediate use is higher than wheat. This is an outrage and ought to be stopped at once. The Senate ought to give notice to the country that a bill be passed prohibiting the use of grain for spirits, and that all whisky manufactured from grain since July 1 will be destroyed. This is the most outrageous situation that could be conceived of when the whole world is hungry and part of it starving and the distillers still permitted to buy the grain in enormous quantities, bringing the price of corn used by us in the form of grits up to four times as much as former prices and double the price of a year ago. If you can beat this for inhumanity, please advise us.

This is signed by the United Cereal Mills, by Arthur Dunn, its vice president.

The industrial world has done as much recently to make men sober, Mr. President, as the moral lectures from the platforms of the country. I never discussed the moral phase of the whisky question—I am not competent to do so—but I have seen pay rolls running into thousands of men. The pay rolls of Saturday night or Monday morning, one after another, have been the greatest temperance apostles in the industrial world.

Nobody wants a drunken man on the pay roll. No man wants him in his office. I am taking this my only opportunity of inserting this telegram in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the benefit of the conference committee that finally will settle what sections shall remain in this legislation.

I wish to place a concluding warning. I take my own political life in my hands with indifference. I propose to do so on this bill. I propose to take my chances on explaining it to the many who will consider themselves outraged. Outside of New York, I think the largest city population is in my own State of any other of the 48 States in the Union, not excepting even the State of Pennsylvania. The city of Chicago is a city of consumers. There is nothing raised in it except in a comparatively few isolated cabbage patches and market gardens in Cook County outside of the corporate limits.

Mr. President, we to-day in this legislation are putting it in the hands of a few men to discourage the great army of those who produce the food that must support both our armies and our civil population. I will take my chances with the producer and those amenable to reason in the final result.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, is the pending amendment open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. MYERS. I ask if it is open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would say not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to ask the Chair whether in answering the Senator from Montana he had reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair had reference to the state of the record, which is that the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon is pending. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is some misunderstanding. I should like to have the question stated on which we are about to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In two places in the printed amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the first on page 2, line 10, where it reads "at the principal interior primary market," the proposition is to strike out the word "market" and insert the word "markets," making it plural. The same amendment occurs on page 3, line 2.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Now, one further inquiry. This is the amendment the Senate is now about to vote upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has no relation to the minimum price?

The VICE PRESIDENT. None whatever; it simply changes the word "market" to "markets." The Senator from Nebraska demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I am in doubt as to what his attitude would be on this amendment, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. We have arranged to transfer these pairs so that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] will stand paired, allowing the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and myself to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I am advised that the junior Senator from Idaho would vote as I shall vote, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Because of the absence of the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "yea."

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] as amended.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the proposed amendment of the Senator from Oregon by striking out, on page 2 of the amendment, on line 22, after the word "guaranty," down to and including the word "absolute," on line 5, page 3. The language which I propose to strike out reads as follows:

> The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat from the passage of this act to the 1st day of January, 1919, shall be based upon No. 1 northern or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President or said board under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute.

In all the weary days that this bill has been before the Senate or the committee for consideration it has never before been proposed to fix a price of any commodity by statute. Such a proposition has never been considered until the so-called leaders at 3 o'clock yesterday brought it in. Every bill, every report, either in the House or in the Senate, has proposed to fix a minimum price by the President or by a commission. So this proposition is entirely new and has never been investigated by any committee of House or Senate.

The effect of the amendment I have proposed, if agreed to, would be to leave the fixing of the price of wheat with the board under instructions from the President, and would strike out that part of the amendment that fixes the minimum price by statute. To begin with, I desire to say that I am not enthusiastic at all about the amendment to the amendment. I offer it because I think the expression of the Senate ought to be taken on it. I am not sure but what I am wrong; I believe I never was more in doubt as to what was the proper course to pursue than on some of the various questions which have arisen in regard to this bill, but it seems to me that it is at least worthy of candid thought whether or not we ought to fix the minimum price by statute. We are traveling on an untrodden legislative path.

The first objection to doing it by statute is that we have included in a minimum price wheat which has already been produced. My amendment would strike this out. We ought to bear in mind that the only excuse for fixing a minimum price and the primary object of fixing a minimum price is to stimulate production. We can not increase the production of the present year; the wheat has already ripened, and a large part of it is already harvested. So we are fixing a minimum price on something that is already produced, and that can not effect the stimulation of production.

In the next place, I do not profess to have, and I have not talked with any Senator who has professed that he had, a sufficiently intricate knowledge of the technicalities of the situation to be competent on the evidence properly to fix a minimum price. We have not until this amendment came in here been discussing the question. I do not mean to say that the Senate is not competent to fix a minimum price, but it is now proposing to do it offhand and without any investigation. The amendment has not even come from a committee; it has come from a body of alleged leaders, whose names are not publicly known even to the Senate. We have had the relation of a story here this morning from the Senator from New Hampshire, who I presume is one of the leaders who drafted the amendment. He says that they at first fixed the price at $1.50, then at $1.60, then at $1.66, then at $1.75, and then at $2. They made no investigation. They took no evidence. They only guessed.

It is a question of some doubt as to whether or not the fixing of the price ought to be done after a careful investigation even by the board which we have provided for in the bill. Some Senators fear that if they are permitted to fix the minimum price they will not fix it high enough. Mr. President, I have no fear of that. Whether they want or whether they do not want to see a high price for wheat, the object this board will have in view will be to stimulate production. They will know that unless they fix the price sufficiently high production will not be stimulated; it will not be increased.

For the crop that is to be planted this fall there are still 30, 60, and in some instances 90 days remaining, and as to spring wheat, especially, several months before it will be necessary to fix the price, during which time proper investigation could be made and the price fixed accordingly.

So far as my knowledge goes, I do not know that the price fixed in the amendment is wrong. It may be too high and it may be that it is too low, and that before it is necessary to fix the price for the crop that is not yet planted there may be evidence sufficient to convince fair-minded men that the price ought to be higher. There is a general belief, among some classes at least—I do not know whether or not it is correct—that the board will be able to fix the permanent price of wheat by whatever minimum price is fixed, either by the board or by law. It is claimed by some that this board, practically controlling all the purchases of wheat by all of the allied Governments and by the Government of the United States, will be such a large purchaser of wheat that they can absolutely control its price, so that the minimum price will become the maximum price as well. To-day, when we are fixing the minimum price for wheat which has now been produced at $2 a bushel, and the market price of that same wheat is from $2.50 to $2.60 a bushel, it may be that this act will take from the farmers of the United States many millions of dollars on a product already produced. So it seems to me that we are not safely legislating when we take this step. As I said in the beginning, Mr. President, I may be wrong about it. It is a new step in government; none of us has ever had any experience in it; it is a most extraordinary step to take; and we ought not to take it until we are absolutely satisfied that whatever minimum price may be fixed will be absolutely justified. It seems to me, therefore, Mr. President, that this board that we propose to create by this act ought to be given power to fix the price, under the direction of the President, as the first part of the bill provides.

There is another reason, I think, why we ought not to fix the minimum price by statute. The crop that is harvested in July and in August is the crop that is used during the entire year. Somebody must hold that wheat. I think everybody concedes that, if we permit the market to go undisturbed and unmanipulated, the price of wheat would gradually go up as the year progressed; that the model condition would be to have the farmer himself hold the wheat; but it would be necessary for him to get a higher price for it in September than he did in July or in August. He ought to have a little higher price for it in October, and so on, up to the time when the next crop is harvested.

The price proposed to be fixed is a minimum price for the entire time from now until January 1, 1919. A scientifically arranged minimum price, I believe, ought to provide a different price for the various months of the year, running up as the year progressed. Otherwise everybody who produces wheat, especially if the board by its buying operations could control absolutely the price and make it a fixed price, would put the wheat in the market just as soon as they could possibly do so.

I may be mistaken; I do not claim to know that that will be true. I have talked with a good many Senators and I have talked with men who are not in the Senate who are experts on the question and have asked them whether that would be the case. Some of them have had no hesitancy in saying that, whatever minimum price is fixed by law, whether it be fixed by the board or by statute, will in effect become the maximum price and that this board has no other intention than by the use of its great powers of buying to make it so.

If this should be true, then the price proposed would have the effect of lowering the price of every bushel of wheat now in existence while still in the hands of the producer. There is absolutely no danger of the President or this board under his direction fixing a price that would be disastrous to the farmer. Everybody concedes the price should be liberal, otherwise there would be a lessening instead of a stimulation of production, and nobody wants that—neither the producer nor the consumer. To be sure of winning the war we must increase production. There is only one way to do that, and that is to give the producer a liberal price. The President and the board all will admit are as anxious as we are to win the war. If they had no other motive, they would not dare to fix a price that was not only fair but liberal. This board would be able to make an investigation that we have not made, and would therefore be better qualified to fix the right price. No man here has yet claimed that he knows what the price ought to be. In the few hours we have had the proposition before us we have had no opportunity to find out.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if the very converse of what he has said is not likely to be the result—namely, that a farmer being assured of $2 a bushel for his wheat and knowing that his wheat will not go below $2 might not thereby be tempted to hold it awaiting a higher price?

Mr. NORRIS. That may be so, I will say to the Senator, but I do not believe it.

Mr. REED. So I think the Senator's logic is just going in the wrong direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have answered the question of the Senator from Missouri a little further.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the expressions of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] regarding the amendment which he has offered illustrate to me the lack of fixed opinion among the Members of the Senate, as well as those outside of the Senate, as to what the effect of this bill will be. I want to say that, in my best judgment, it will have no practical effect on the cost of living. Great expectations have been aroused throughout the country by this bill which we have had under consideration for so long. Personally I have tried my best to come to some conclusive judgment as to whether the bill will be productive of any good or whether it will be an injury to the country. I sincerely trust that it will not injure the country in any way, but I do not believe that it will be productive of any great good.

However, the expectations of the people of this country have been aroused to such a pitch by the articles which have been printed in the newspapers and by the assertions of those who are in favor of this class of legislation, that personally I do not feel that I could be responsible for defeating those expectations, having no special pride of opinion myself, and being always ready to yield if a majority of the people of my country are against me. If I had any fixed opinions, any certain opinions, that this bill would work injury, I should not under any circumstances vote for it, but I merely want to call attention to the fact that those of us who have tried very hard to reach some conclusive judgment are probably very much in the condition of mind of the Senator from Nebraska when he expressed the reasons for his proposing this amendment.

I think I shall vote for this bill, but I want to disavow any certitude that this bill will work the great good that is claimed for it by many of the Members of this body and by practically the overwhelming public judgment of the people of this country at this time. I hope it will. If it shall, we shall then by an experiment in legislation, which to some extent is dangerous, and which is certainly novel in this country, have had the benefit of knowing what the effect of this class of legislation will be.

So far as amendments are concerned, I shall, of course, try to perfect the bill and do my best to put it in as good shape as possible. I only call attention to the state of mind shown by the Senator from Nebraska to show that I believe that is the general state of mind in the country of those who have tried to consider this bill.

I myself have very earnestly tried to reach some definite conclusion, but as yet I am not sure that we shall benefit anybody by the passage of this bill. We shall certainly not change the laws of trade and the natural laws of supply and demand, which will govern the produce of the farmers of this country or the produce of any other branch of business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I rise to express the hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] may prevail. What has thus far taken place under the provisions of the bill so far adopted is about this, that we have legislated upon the laborer in the factory and in the mine bread to be made out of flour at $13.50 a barrel. It may be that there will be a short crop or a large crop of wheat; nobody knows which; but if there should be a large crop of wheat and the Government should go on, at the expense of the United States Treasury, passing over to the workingman in the mine and in the factory bread at the price made necessary by $13.50 flour, how long do you suppose they and their wives would stand it?

I belong to the farming class; but the farmer has no right, and neither has anyone else, to this sort of legislation. Not only for the reason the Senator from Nebraska has expressed, which, in my opinion, was well expressed and well coordinated, but for the reason which I have just mentioned, we ought to hesitate before we undertake this sort of thing. We are anticipating a minimum price away in advance of actual and unknown future conditions. We do not know what they will be. There ought to be a stimulation of the production of foodstuffs, and maybe there ought to be a minimum price, but that minimum price ought to be fixed to meet conditions, and it ought to be fixed by this board, if there is to be a board.

Mr. President, either we can or we can not trust the President to select an able and honest man or an honest and able board. If we can not, then we ought not to pass this bill at all; it will be a ridiculous thing to pass it. If we can trust the members of the board, then they ought to be left to fix a minimum price. There is not the slightest danger that they will not fix one high enough to stimulate production, because that is the object of the existence of the board itself. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, for this reason: In framing the amendment which was submitted by me, fixing a price of not less than $2 per bushel at a principal interior market, we thought that the price was a high one to place upon wheat; but I contemplated that prices at other interior markets, whatever others might be established, would be governed by the price at the one principal market, less the freight; for instance, the guaranteed price of wheat at the interior market in North Dakota, under the bill as it was framed, would be $2, less the usual freight charge to the central or principal market. Now, as the bill was amended a little while ago by the vote of the Senate, establishing more than one market, we have practically guaranteed a price of $2 in every market that may be established in the United States. It is true there may be 1 additional market, or there may be 2, or there may be 5, or there may be 20; but, wherever the market is, we have changed present conditions so as to allow a $2 price in every market that may be established by the board.

So I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that, inasmuch as we have changed the whole trend of the business of the country by the amendment adopted a while ago, we now ought to strike out the guaranteed price and leave the question to the board.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I never was more astounded in my life than to hear the statement just made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. When this bill in its earlier stages came here with food and fuel embraced in its provisions, and those things employed in the production of food and fuel, it was after debate conceded that it was unfair to single out a particular class, to take away the market of the particular products of that class, and compel the producers to sell in a circumscribed and controlled market; that it was unfair to take away the farmer's market for his wheat and leave the producer of steel the world's high prices, to compel the farmer to buy that steel at the world prices; that it was unfair to take away the farmer's market for his wheat and allow the man who controls the copper mines to have the benefit of the world's market; that it was unfair to take away the world's market for wheat and allow the producer of cotton the world's market in which to sell and to gain great prices. Accordingly we began to add to the commodities which were to be controlled by this bill cotton, copper, steel, aluminum, and the products of other great institutions that are already growing very wealthy by means of war profits.

After we had put into the bill the products of all these other institutions, so that, speaking broadly, all would be alike, a movement called a compromise movement was started here, and the proposition was to take out everything except wheat and to give the farmer in lieu of the wheat market which had been taken away from him a guaranteed price below which his product would not go.

The amount of $2 was agreed upon, and Senators here voted to take out aluminum and many other controlled products, voted to take out steel, voted to take out cotton, because they understood that there was to be an adequate protection written into this bill for the farmers of the land.

Now that these other products have been eliminated from the bill, the Senator in charge of it proposes to take away the guaranty that was given the farmer, upon the pretext that the Senate has seen fit to change the word "market" to "markets," so that, instead of the minimum price being fixed at one market, to the advantage of that market over all other markets, it shall be fixed under the amendment at the principal primary markets of the United States, so that all parts of the country will be treated alike.

Let me say to the Senator in charge of this bill that, if the movement he thus fathers is carried out, it will discourage production in this country, the production of the very thing for which the world stands with outstretched hands and pleads; you will thereby sow the seeds of discontent that will result in hunger, in impoverishment, and in want, instead of resulting in the production of a crop that will bring enough to feed the world.

You can do this if you want to, on the pretext that we have made this bill applicable to all markets, instead of to one single market, that we have put Duluth, and Minneapolis, and Kansas City, and Chicago, and New York, and Boston, and Portland, Oreg., and the other primary markets upon the same basis, instead of giving one an advantage over the other; you may change the whole course of this understanding and agreement on that kind of argument if you want to; but I say, if you do, it will be a mistake that will be tragic in its consequences.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I confess I am astounded at the attitude taken by the Senator from Oregon. The Senator has fathered a bill in the Senate the purpose of which was to induce production, to secure all the grain that would be necessary for the support of the American people, for the support of the American armies, and for the support of the people and armies of our allies. I should like to ask the Senator how now he proposes to induce the farmers to raise a good crop of wheat next year and upon what basis will he secure a greater amount?

I offered an amendment but a short time ago providing that in determining these questions the farmer be allowed the reasonable expenses of labor and machinery, taxes, and all other factors in the production of wheat. You said by your vote by nearly 2 to 1, "We refuse to give you that guaranty; we will not guarantee that you can have the expense of raising that crop by any standard or by any rule."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield in a moment. Then when you refused to do that we took the only next step that we could take, and that was to guarantee at least a minimum price or to fix some standard of a minimum price. We knew and you knew that the cost of the labor the farmer employs to produce his crop has more than doubled; we knew and you knew that everything that goes into farm machinery has more than doubled in price; we knew and you knew that everything the farmer must purchase produced by other labor in the United States has more than doubled in price. Now, with that knowledge we asked you at least to say to the farmer, "We will fix a standard that will take into consideration these higher prices, this higher-priced labor, these higher-priced materials that go into everything that you purchase, these higher prices for everything that you must buy to live upon," but you said by your vote, "We will do nothing of the kind."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. We appealed to you and asked at least that you fix a minimum standard, something upon which we could rely, and you agreed, you wise men of the Senate, that the minimum price ought to be $2 per bushel.

I yield now to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota upon what authority he says that Congress proposes to take away from the farmer the guaranty of a fair minimum price for his crop?

Mr. McCUMBER. I base it upon the fact that, while you established the rule that should govern in fixing the price, if the Government should take over the coal production, you refused by a vote to fix the same standard of valuation when it came to the farmer's product. There can be but one surmise that will arise in the mind of every farmer in this country. He will do some thinking. He will say that the Senate of the United States voted that in the event the coal production should be taken over an allowance should be made the coal operators for labor charges at the usual rate, that they should be paid the cost of production, and that they should then be given a reasonable return upon their investment. The farmer will say, "You voted that into an amendment affecting coal, but when the same amendment was proposed to be applied to my products you voted that the same rule should not apply." He will be able to draw but one conclusion, and he will be justified in that conclusion from the fact that never in history has he had that rule applied to the cost of his product—that he could never get the same price for his labor that could be obtained in any other line of business. That is the reason why his sons have been driven from the farm into the cities, where they might make better wages, as the Senator from Ohio and I were driven from the farm because of the lack of wages and forced into the great city. If there is one thing that I thank God for day after day it is that he enabled me in some way to get off the farm and get into the city, where I could secure so much more for a given amount of expended energy.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, now will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. I yield. My time is almost up, but I yield for a question.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator from North Dakota if he believes for a moment that a Federal food and fuel control board at a time like this would be inconsiderate of the interests of the farmer when the object is to encourage him to produce food to sustain a nation at war?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator a question, and one question may answer the other: Does the Senator believe that the commission will allow the farmer and his son a price for their labor equivalent to what the farmer will pay for the tramp that he brings in from the city at three or four dollars a day? If the Senator believes that they will do that then he and I do not believe alike. I want them to do it. The Senator does not want them to do it.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from North Dakota has a wrong impression. I want the farmer to be abundantly and profitably compensated, but I would not pick him out to be especially licensed to charge high prices.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then do not be afraid to vote for a $2 minimum at any place in the United States, because no man on the face of the earth can raise wheat here for $2 a bushel and pay $4 a day for the labor that goes into it. I know enough about farming to know that that is a physical impossibility.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the answer to that statement is that when the Senator from North Dakota and I were on the farm I learned more about farming than he did. [Laughter.]

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, maybe the Senator did; but the Senator who will tell me that he can raise grain for $1 a bushel in the State of Ohio on land that cost $100 or $150 an acre demonstrates to me that he does not know anything about farming, and, by Heaven, never did know anything about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, only enough time to reply to the Senator. I said that raising $1 wheat was a profitable occupation in times of peace; and I say to the Senator from North Dakota that the knowing farmers of the country are buying land in Ohio at $150 an acre for the very purpose of going into a commercial proposition of raising wheat profitably at $1 per bushel—in times of peace, to be sure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, they are not doing it now.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is an honest difference of opinion in the Senate on this subject. Those who are interested in the wheat crop in the West no doubt honestly believe that they must get $2 plus for their wheat, or they can not afford to raise it. Those of us who live in the East and have to watch the price of flour think we have reached the limit when we get to $2 at Minneapolis, the fair price in North Dakota to be $1.85. Therefore some of us who live in the East feel that they will have to vote now to cut out the guaranteed price, but that does not mean that the guaranteed price will not be fixed by the board. That is still in the bill. It will be the duty of the board, one of the very first things they do, to fix the fair price for wheat, and the board will have on it, if this form of it is retained, a farmer of practical experience who will have his say about it.

I felt myself that $1.75 was too much. I felt that $2 was altogether too much. But the way the amendment now stands——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will pardon me, I have not time to yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator just one question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very sorry, but I can not yield. I have more than I can say in the few minutes at my disposal.

The way the section is drafted the Government is obliged to take all the wheat that is offered to it, say, at Denver, at $2 a bushel. To dispose of it, the Government has to pay the transportation from Denver to New York or to Duluth, so the Government has to pay $2 plus. That is too much. I must pay some regard to the laboring men in my own State who have to buy flour—flour that will cost them $12 or $13 a barrel this winter—and for that reason I have offered an amendment which is pending, that will be voted upon, but that I shall not have time to speak on when it is offered, and therefore I want to explain it briefly now.

The amendment is:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

That is the Clayton Act. Those provisions are these: That no injunction shall be issued by a United States court to prevent a strike unless danger of irreparable injury is affirmatively shown, and that labor unions shall be allowed to employ the usual peaceful, legitimate methods of striking.

In the pending bill there is a provision in section 4, as follows: It is made a punishable offense, on page 4, line 16, for a person to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries. Therefore if two labor-union officials should arrange together for a strike, either on a railroad or in any factory producing necessaries, they would be punishable under this act. I do not think it is the intention of the Senate to do it. If strikes become so dangerous, if they become so prevalent that the strike situation should be handled as a war measure, I shall be one of the first to believe in handling it, and handling it after due deliberation. But this situation is the same that existed in the Senate when we had up a few weeks ago the railroad priorities-of-shipment bill; and in that case the Senate unanimously agreed to introduce that provision, that nothing contained in the act should be construed to alter, amend, or repeal section 6 and section 20 of the Sherman Act.

I have taken occasion to explain this amendment so that when it comes up Senators will know what they are voting on.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the change of front on this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires whether the Senator——

Mr. REED. I am going to make an announcement, not to speak on the bill.

In view of this change of front, I now give notice that I reserve for a separate vote the amendments which were accepted by which there were stricken from this bill aluminum, steel, copper, cotton, and all other amendments striking from the bill articles that were once within its purview.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the question I desired to submit to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] was designed to bring out more specifically his view with reference to what this board should be when this bill is finally signed. He said that he was not in favor of fixing a minimum price because, as I understood him, the price proposed to be fixed was too high; that he could not indorse a $2 minimum price, but that he felt very certain that the board which would be called upon to administer this law would fix a fair price. It is manifest that the Senator thinks the board would fix a less price than $2.

Mr. HOLLIS. I did not mean to give that impression.

Mr. BORAH. I am very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not know where they would fix it, but they would fix it after deliberation, and whatever price they fixed I would be satisfied with, and can justify it to my constituents. On the information I have gotten in the Senate I was willing to vote for $2 wheat, but I can not vote for $2 wheat plus transportation.

Mr. BORAH. Another statement made by the Senator, and the one to which I wanted particularly to refer, was that this board would have on it a farmer. I am of the opinion that the Senator from New Hampshire is one of those who proposes to see, if he can, that there will be just one member of this board when this bill comes out of conference.

Mr. HOLLIS. Oh, not at all. I am heartily in favor of a commission of three, and I have so stated. I voted against the provision to have one member of the board.

Mr. BORAH. I happen to know to my satisfaction that the word has gone forth that there will be just one member of this board, and that will be Mr. Hoover; and I venture to say that will be the exact situation when this bill comes out of conference. Just as there has disappeared from this bill everything protecting the farmer, just as there has been taken out every article which enters into production, and gradually everything of that kind has been eliminated and the farmer has been left to stand alone, so, when this bill is finally stripped to the satisfaction of those who are to administer it, the last evidence of the presence of the farmer will be eliminated, and he will be off the board. Now, I voted for one member of the board, and I am not urging a commission, but it does not seem to me just fair, in view of the determination to cut out the commission, to urge that there will be a farmer on the board as a reason for not fixing a minimum price.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think no more interesting exhibition of the way in which the Senate conducts its business at times, when great interests are involved, has ever been made in the 11 years I have been a Member of this body than in the proceedings which have been taken since this bill was reported to the Senate by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. President, I would like to have it understood that I am speaking upon the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, so that my 10 minutes will be charged to that particular amendment. It has become, Mr. President, in a way, the established practice in the Senate and the House to arrange their committees so that the legislation upon different subjects shall be largely in the hands of those in committee who have the best understanding of the various subjects with which we deal. So the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is organized from Congress to Congress to include within its membership Senators from agriculture-producing States. Therefore, Mr. President, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry considered and reported upon this important subject, which has engaged the attention of the country and of Congress for many weeks. There was some division in the committee, and in the Senate the work of the committee was broadened so that not only food, feeds, and fuel but other primary products which have relation to the cost of producing food, feeds, and fuel could be brought within the control of the commission that was to be created to take care of the interests of the country during this emergency. Copper, iron ore and its products, aluminum, and many of the basic things the price of which determines the cost of food production were brought within the terms of the bill.

Then, Mr. President, agencies were set at work in this body which led to copper, steel, aluminum, and various other special interests of tremendous power, assuming to take away from the committee designated under the rules to make this bill and from the Senate of the United States the consideration of this bill in its forming. And so the manufacturing interests of New England, the aluminum interests, the copper interests of Utah and other sections of the country, the steel interests, took themselves off into a corner and produced a bill. It bears no name. It is brought in here, proposed to be introduced by "Mr. Blank" when the time comes, and it is so framed, Mr. President, as to undo the work of the Senate, undo the work of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and take care of steel, of aluminum, and of copper, and of all the other great interests, free them from any control that will regulate their profits, and fix upon agriculture the burden of furnishing to the country, to the world, the products of the soil, regulated by whom? Regulated, sir, by a board. But, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has suggested, it is pretty well understood that that is simply a sugar coating to a proposition that is finally to turn over agricultural production in this country to one man, to put into his hands the destiny of that great interest in the United States. The bill which he favored, the testimony which he has given before the Agricultural Committee, makes it perfectly clear that his idea is to control the price of wheat. He said in his confidential testimony to the Committee on Agriculture in the House that he was the sole purchasing agent for the allied Governments. With the present European harvest behind him he could manipulate the market and possibly force the price of wheat down to 75 cents a bushel.

Mr. President, for some weeks, in the consideration of this bill, we have had an exhibition of the operations of those great and powerful interests that have been so potential for the last quarter of a century in controlling legislation. We can now follow step by step the changes made in this bill and at every stage of its consideration you will detect the hand of these powerful masters. The aim of this legislation is to control the food supply; that means to control the prices of the products of the farms. It was natural that Senators from the great agricultural States should object to Government control of the prices of the products of their States when the great manufacturing States were given a free hand to gouge and extort from the public by the imposition of unprecedented prices for the output of the factories.

There was such an outcry against this discrimination, it was so unjust and so offensive to the American sense of fair play, that it became evident the bill could not pass without radical amendment. The men representing the great agricultural States must be appeased. So one by one it was determined by recorded votes of the Senate that in addition to food and feed and fuel, iron ore, steel and its products, harvesting machinery, copper and aluminum, and many other products should be subject to price control, and finally cotton, the sacred product of the South, was included. The bill was undergoing such change on the floor of the Senate as would make it a measure of real value to the consuming public.

When cotton was included it gave copper and steel and aluminum the opportunity and there was formed a new combination. Cotton and steel and copper united and framed a substitute bill. The Senate has been led to adopt the work of this special committee—the committee that does its business in a corner—not the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, but the committee that prepared this substitute bill to be offered by "Mr. Blank," a bill the main purpose of which is to fix the prices of agricultural products.

Under legislation previously enacted, the embargo legislation, there was taken from the agricultural interests of the country its world market. That legislation confined the farmers to their domestic market, and this bill now proposes to fix their prices in the home market. In the consideration of this measure you have lured Senators from the agricultural States to vote one proposition after another with the expectation that you would at least name in this bill a minimum price for their wheat. Now it is proposed to deprive them even of that protection. You have narrowed the bill down to a proposition that limits the farmer to the domestic market and proposes to place within the will of one man the power of saying to the toilers upon the farm what they shall receive for their wheat, as well as all other products.

All the other products of the country have been taken out of the bill. You do not think that the price of agricultural implements should be controlled. You voted that out of the bill. You voted the control of the prices of cotton and its manufactures out of the bill. You voted copper out of the bill. You voted steel, iron ore, and all its products out of the bill, from which are being derived profits that stagger the imagination, and you are handing the agricultural interests of the country over to a commission that, under penalty of going to jail, bids them to produce wheat at a price not fixed by the world market, not fixed by any provision of law that shall guarantee them from production below cost, but in all human probability you are leaving it to the will of one man, who said, with regard to wheat, in a confidential statement before a committee of Congress:

> I would go into the market with my European harvest behind me and manipulate the market. I might manipulate the price down to 75 cents per bushel.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I am frank to say that if the amendment of my colleague [Mr. NORRIS] carries I shall feel constrained to vote against this bill. I said in proposing my amendment to make the gaurantee definite some time ago that the only thing that reconciled me to voting for this bill, which is directed against the raisers of wheat, would be the fact that it contained an absolute guarantee of a minimum price. If my colleague's amendment carries, that guarantee is practically wiped out. It is left to the will of the President to permit the guarantee or not. No minimum is esablished, and the farmer will not have any positive guarantee whatever.

Mr. President, I have already indicated how this bill has been finally pared down until it practically bears solely upon the fuel proprietors and the wheat raisers. Cotton has been taken out because the cotton raisers objected to having these severe restrictions put upon them. Copper has been taken out because the copper producers objected. Steel and iron have been taken out because the steel producers and the iron producers objected. All these and other products have been taken out from under the severe control of the law provided for in this bill, and the wheat raiser, singled out almost alone, has been left subject to the control of the Government.

I announced that I was still ready to vote for this bill, provided the agricultural class would have the right to depend upon an absolute guaranty of a minimum price. This amendment, if it carries, will strike out that guaranty and leave it to peradventure and, perhaps, the will of the President and the whim or the judgment of the food commission. I am not willing to take that chance for the agriculturists of the country. I say that if this bill is to pass, which limits the price of wheat; if this bill is to pass, which places in the hands of the Government the control of the elevators of the country, where the wheat must be marketed; if this bill is to pass, which practically puts in the control of the President and his administration the wheat of the country, you must have in it an absolute guaranty of minimum price; and I warn my associates here that if they pass this bill otherwise it will be regarded by the great agricultural classes of the country as an absolute abandonment of their interests. It would not be right.

I support this bill with a good many misgivings even with the guaranty in it. I have very little faith in it. I believe disappointment will follow in the footsteps of this bill; but the only redeeming feature that it has, the only anchor to windward, the only protection that the farmer has, is the absolute guaranty of minimum price.

My colleague now proposes to strike out that portion of the guaranty which makes it obligatory to be enforced. He proposes to leave it to chance or somebody's judgment as to whether it shall be enforced. Now, the farmer is not the only one interested. There are millions of farmers in this country. How are you going to get them to plant their fall wheat this fall in great quantities unless they know that they are to receive some protection at the hands of the Government? They have seen how the cotton men have hurried away to take their interest out from under the bill. They have seen how the steel men and the lumbermen and the copper men and all the other interests, through fear, have succeeded in drawing their particular articles out from under the terms of the bill.

Do you think the farmers of the country will view with complacency and satisfaction the fact that they are left in here without any protection whatever? Not at all. You will see the greatest falling-off in the planting of fall wheat this fall—a falling-off that will amaze you; and they will plant other things that may not come so absolutely under the control of the Government.

Mr. President, we have millions of acres to be planted to wheat this fall, and if the farmers are assured a good price, we will raise a great crop of wheat next year from the planting this year; but you can not do it as long as a threat of unlimited control is made. If this Senate deliberately refuses to guarantee to the farmers a minimum of $2 per bushel for wheat when that wheat is now selling for $2.60, you may expect a small acreage to be planted this fall, with the possibility of peace coming in the spring. So I warn my friends from the cotton States and the steel States and the coal States and the copper States that if they take out this guarantee of a minimum price of $2 per bushel on wheat and leave to chance and to doubt whether there shall be any guarantee at all, or whether the guarantee shall be $1, or whether it shall be $1.25, they may expect a small acreage of wheat this fall by comparison. The result would naturally be a small crop and high prices for bread next year and an increased cost of living.

Mr. President, I have already said that I have not very much faith in this bill. I have very serious doubts about it. I think we are trying to legislate against economic laws. But if you are bound to legislate, if you are bound in an artificial way of legislation to threaten the reduction of the price of wheat, you certainly must impose an absolute guarantee of a minimum if you expect the farmers this fall to make a big planting of fall wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that I have to oppose the amendment offered by my good friend from Nebraska. I can not believe that the Senator from Nebraska has given this question the study which he usually gives to such important questions. Anyone who had the opportunity of hearing the testimony given by Mr. Hoover should know it is not a wise provision to adopt. I shall say nothing disrespectful of the man; I believe, as I have said before, that Mr. HOOVER is an able, patriotic man, but he would be the last man on earth I would want to employ for the farmer—to administer a law which so vitally affects the interests of the farmers. He would be the last man, I say, that I would think of employing to guard the interests of the farmers of the United States. He has said on more than one occasion that $2 a bushel should not be paid for wheat. Having that testimony before us, and knowing that under present conditions the farmer ought to be guaranteed at least $2, you must, unless you believe that $2 is too much, vote for a price of $2. If $2 is too much, let us say so frankly. If any man can show to me that $2 a bushel, under the circumstances, is too much, I shall vote for a lower price.

There is not a Senator on this floor who will undertake to prove that this price is excessive. No man who appeared before the Committee on Agriculture has ventured to prove that at the present time $2 a bushel is too much for wheat. When the distinguished Senator from Mississipi [Mr. WILLIAMS], for whom I have the highest respect, with whom I have served not only in this body but in the other body, says to the Senate that $2 a bushel is $13.50 a barrel for flour, he is absolutely mistaken.

Take the statistical abstract, figure it out for yourself, and see. Since 1860 the millers of the United States have been able and willing to take the price of four bushels and a half of wheat for a barrel of flour, and take their profit out of the by-product.

Mr. President, I shall have to take the record rather than the statement of the Senator from Mississippi that the people of the cities would have to pay $13.50 for a barrel of flour based upon the price of $2 a bushel. It is incorrect, it is not true, and I challenge the statement.

Now, how are you going to stimulate production? Do you believe that the farmer is so stupid that he will produce wheat at $1.50 when he can get $2 a bushel for corn? At the same time I take it that any Member here whether he has been raised on a farm or not, knows that you can produce 2 bushels of corn to 1 bushel of wheat. Do you understand that? Yet you say that you are going to stimulate production by paying the farmer less than $2 per bushel.

I dislike, Mr. President, to stand here and advocate a high price for wheat for the farmer. I myself am engaged in growing wheat. But you can take my wheat crop at any price today if you will leave the balance of the farmers of the United States alone and give them a fair price. You can take my farm and operate it as you please if you will pay the taxes. You can have it during this war. I care not what price you give to me, and I have planted this year several thousand acres. I say take it, if you want to at any price you see fit, but do not say to the masses of this country, the 40,000,000 people who are living upon farms, the 40,000,000 people who have never been able to fix the price on their own product—do not say to them you must take the statement of some food director, I care not how able that director may be.

I shall not vote to leave the welfare of the American farmer and the producers of this country to any one man, to the dictation of one man who has proved himself not willing to do justice to the farmer, unless under the penalty clause of section 4 you believe you can drive these 40,000,000 men and women as you would drive slaves and compel them to produce whether they want to or not. You can do it under section 4 if you can do it at all. Is that democracy, I ask you, in enacting a law which will say to the farmer "You shall produce wheat whether you are doing it at a loss or at a profit?" That is the question. You will not be able to do it with Hoover or with a thousand Hoovers.

Mr. President, if the amendment proposed by my good friend from Nebraska prevails, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The years and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as before and vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Not knowing his attitude on this amendment I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] and to state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired in his absence with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the negative). Under a misapprehension I transferred my pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I understand that he has a pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and that that pair has been observed. Therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BRADY] is absent on account of illness. If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I desire to announce my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and the transfer of my pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—35.

So Mr. NORRIS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the psychology of this situation is such that I expect the bill will be passed, and I propose to vote for it when it is perfected; but I do so without any anticipation that it will satisfy any considerable number of people, even if the wisest men are to be given control of the legislation. I do not believe that a bill which violates substantially every law of trade with which it comes in contact can possibly be administered to the satisfaction of the people who have been promoting the legislation.

For more than 1,600 years there have been attempts made to regulate the prices of products by governmental action, and they have invariably proved failures, and I suspect will prove a failure in this case. That being the case, I have but little hope of action as a result of this legislation, which will be greatly beneficial, but I am willing to give it a trial. It seems to me there should be something in the bill which will be really beneficial to the people of the United States. For that reason I have introduced as an amendment a proposition for a committee on the conduct of the expenditures of the war. I am addressing the Senate briefly on that subject now, because I suspect, looking at the clock, that I will not have an opportunity to do so if I do not do so now.

When I introduced my resolution providing for a committee on the conduct of the war, nearly three months ago, I did so because I believed that as the war progressed a great many controversial matters would develop and that there should be some vent through which differences arising might be investigated, giving to Congress, the public, and the executive departments accurate information relating to the controversy. I believed then that many disinterested, loyal, and useful men would be attacked for reasons which would not bear investigation and that there would be many cases of inefficiency in the Government service, resulting in waste, extravagance, delay, and even graft, which could be better and more effectively investigated by a legislative committee than by the appointing power or department heads, heavily burdened, as they must necessarily be, with a multitude of important problems. Moreover, it seemed to me there should be some method of bringing about a more complete cooperation between the legislative and executive branches of the Government in promoting the conduct of the war. All of these presumed reasons for such a committee have already developed, although the war from our standpoint is in its infancy and not a single American soldier is yet on the firing line.

It is very natural that this condition should have resulted. When an organization doing a business of a billion dollars annually, as has been the Government of the United States, finds it necessary to increase that business tenfold, and to do so at once, it will necessarily follow that through seniority and for other reasons incompetent men will be found in positions of importance, at least men not competent to direct such a radical and tremendous expansion. Moreover, if every man connected with the Government before the 2d of April had been the best qualified man in the country for the particular position he held, he could not have attended to the numerous new developments which have been forced upon him and have given them reasonable consideration.

There are already before the Senate several resolutions of inquiry—four, at least—relating to important matters of much public concern. If there were no other question than the one relating to the reported differences in the Shipping Board, it would seem to me to be reason enough for providing this committee. Certainly if we are to have a large number of such questions arising, it can not be supposed that Congress, with all its other duties, can properly and promptly treat them. They must be turned over to some committee which can devote itself to such purposes. This morning's papers indicate the acuteness of the shipping situation. The real facts are not given to the public, which will be slow to ascribe prejudicial reasons to a man of Gen. Goethals's great accomplishments, and which will be quick to ascribe them to a man of no accomplishments in this particular field of activity. As far as we know, the controversy largely relates to the price for steel, and it is said that there has been a delay of something like three months in making contracts for ships—and largely for this reason—although practically 10,000 tons of shipping is being sunk daily. Everyone knows that the transportation question at sea and within our borders is the most important and pressing question with which we have to deal.

No one wishes to have the Government imposed upon in the purchase of material; and yet, in the case of steel, the taxes which will be received from the great companies furnishing most of this product—corporation taxes, excess profits taxes, and income taxes—will probably aggregate for this year substantially two-thirds of the profits of those companies, so that the price can not cut a very important figure, whether it is a few dollars higher or lower a ton. The higher the price the larger the revenue the Government will receive; but whatever may be the difference—and on that we are not informed—I believe that the President long ago should have insisted that action be taken. Every man who is doing his utmost to assist in the successful prosecution of the war has a right to know why this most important activity has been allowed to drift along, delaying most of our military requirements. But this is only one of the several matters which are already being agitated in the public press.

Mr. President, let me read to the Senate a few extracts from an article written by William Hard, a well-known writer on current events, appearing in a recent number of the New Republic, which express very clearly a sentiment which is rapidly spreading throughout the country. In discussing what he terms the "lack of unity" at Washington Mr. Hard says:

> The need is acute and instant for a massing of leaders of all political elements into the Government in some such fashion as will enable them to transmit to their followers, with authority and success, the full meaning of the administration's purposes and the full spirit of its actions. * * *
>
> We have a Council of National Defense. But when Mr. Denman thinks one thing about ships and Gen. Goethals thinks another they go running alternately to the White House to find out what our national policy about ships may, after all, be. It is developed only through assaults on the White House succeeding riots in the newspapers and brainstorms in the shipyards.
> We have a Council of National Defense. It has a committee on coal production. But the Council of National Defense has no national policy about coal. A member of the council, Mr. Lane, ventures at last to do something. The committee on coal production ventures also to do something. The price of coal for everybody in the United States is lowered.

It is lowered enough to satisfy Mr. Lane's desire for a full measure of immediate practical relief. It is not lowered enough to satisfy * * * Mr. Baker. The coal policy of Mr. Lane is one thing; the coal policy of Mr. Baker is another. The coal policy of the Council of National Defense (and therefore of the Cabinet) is nothing.

Politically he (the President) needs, somehow, in some manner consistent with our native politics, a "coalition." Administratively he needs an authoritative defense or war council. The "coalition" would bind the Nation together. The council would bind Gen. Goethals and Mr. Denman and Mr. Baker and Mr. Lane and Mr. Baruch and all our other administrators together by policies determined compositely beforehand and then enforced throughout all departments and committees harmoniously.

That comes from a friendly source to the administration.

Some time ago the President called to Washington a large number of the ablest business men of the country, who have, I think, performed very unusual and disinterested public service. There can be no question of either their ability, disinterestedness, or desire to perform patriotic duty. I do not believe they came here for the purpose of improving their own personal fortunes or for any other than patriotic reasons; and yet, we have already seen many of them held up to attack for reasons—whatever may be the technical conduct which should obtain in ordinary times—which, when investigated, are easily explainable and which may be excused under the extraordinary conditions now obtaining.

No reasonable man can make objection to the provisions of the adopted amendment relating to interest in the purchase, and the creation of the committee I propose will, perhaps, remove the possibility of such criticism in the future; but it is most unfortunate that men who have during their entire lives been instrumental in public accomplishments and private successes, largely through their ability and integrity, should be pilloried before the public as being engaged in actions grazing the very edge of dishonesty and collusion. Such charges against such men should be probed at once and the facts given to the public, and that would be done by this committee.

Congress has already appropriated substantially twice as much as the cost of the Civil War, and there are pending, or will be shortly, bills which will make these appropriations substantially three times the cost of the Civil War. We are getting in the habit of talking billions and are not inclined to consider amounts and methods which are not varied from in ordinary times. Most of this money has been appropriated without careful examination by Congress and in such manner that its expenditure is largely left to the discretion of the executive departments. Very largely these expenditures will be made by the Departments of War and Navy under the direction of the President. Of course, it will be impossible for the President or the Secretaries of those departments to give proper attention to the details of these expenditures or to prevent much of the waste and even actual corruption which may result. It is no reflection upon them or upon anyone else, nor is it so intended; but it is patent to everyone that Washington is alive with those who have axes to grind, and to prevent the Government being imposed upon is no ordinary task. This difficulty can be modified and quite likely entirely prevented if the different branches of the Government are brought into active cooperation.

A similar policy to the one I propose has been followed in every European country, and, to a degree, the executives of the allied countries have become subordinate to the direct representatives of the people Most of the important matters relating to the conduct of the war in Europe are being directed by committees having large and comprehensive powers, very much greater powers than it is proposed to confer on the committee which this amendment provides. It should be our purpose to coordinate activities of every form, and very largely this has been done in many States and municipalities in matters relating to all forces of defense—men, munitions, fuel, and transportation. This coordination should be extended to the National Government. It is not enough, and will not be so considered by the people when they understand it, to have legislation prepared by executive departments, brought to the Capitol, with the expectation that it will be adopted forthwith, unless the legislative branch of the Government is to have some control or some part in the expenditure of these appropriations and the conduct of the activities of the Government. Unless this provision is made the legislative branch of the Government becomes a mere registering machine; and it is a most unfortunate condition in which to place the country, for any suggestion of a modification or an expression of disapproval of legislation which comes to Congress in the way described is going to be charged to partisanship or unpatriotic conduct.

By taking this action, Congress will be following practically the course taken during the Civil War. The legislation providing for a committee on the conduct of the war was at that time introduced by Thaddeus Stevens, then the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and a leader of the dominant party, who was entirely in sympathy with the President and the administration. Certainly he could not have been accused of attempting to embarrass the administration with which he was entirely in sympathy; and I might say here that while it has been suggested that a provision for such a committee may be, and was, possibly, intended to embarrass the administration, there is absolutely no basis for any such charge. The minority party in Congress have sustained the administration at every point where it was possible to do so, and it is an insult to them and those they represent to suggest that there is any desire to embarrass the administration or to do anything else than promote the active and efficient conduct of the war.

Mr. Stevens, in presenting the resolution providing for the creation of a committee on the conduct of the war, in 1862, said:

Has it come to this, that Congress is a mere automaton to register the decrees of another power, and that we have nothing to do but find men and money? That is the doctrine of despotism.

Not only did Mr. Stevens take the position I have indicated, but Senator Fessenden, of Maine, said on the same subject:

I think it is a gentle hint which is necessary at this time, that the representatives of the people who are carrying on this war deem it their duty to keep a watchful eye over the proceedings of executive agents, whatever they may be called and whatever may be their position.

As a result of this action a bill providing for such a committee passed the Senate without opposition and the House with only one or two dissenting votes. It is true that the first idea relating to this committee originated as a result of various military disasters about which Congress wished information, but later it was directed to inquire into "the conduct and the expenditures" incident to the war, and especially to concern itself with "all facts and circumstances of contracts and agreements." The activities of the committee were set forth at great length and the following paragraph in a report on the Army of the Potomac indicates some of its work:

Your committee * * * concluded that they could best perform their duty by endeavoring to obtain such information in respect to the conduct of the war as would best enable them to advise what mistakes had been made in the past, and the proper course to be pursued in the future; to obtain such information as the many laborious duties of the President and his Cabinet prevented them from acquiring, and to lay it before them with such recommendations and suggestions as seemed to be most imperatively demanded; and the journal of proceedings of your committee show that for a long time they were in constant communication with the President and his Cabinet, and neglected no opportunity of at once laying before them the information acquired by them in the course of their investigations.

If this committee is authorized, it should be bipartisan in a real sense, made up of competent men of both parties, men who will be sure to deal with questions coming before them in a patriotic way, without prejudice, and along lines of the most approved business methods. If this is done, it will light up the twilight zone between the executive and legislative branches of the Government, and we will be able to exert all of our powers and all of our resources to bring the war to a successful termination. It is simply a mobilization of the political power of the country, and this may be absolutely essential to bring about the best results.

Those who fail to support this amendment must take the responsibility of preventing the adoption of a suitable means of adjusting many of the difficulties arising out of the war. I believe they will regret their action as the war progresses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I inquire of the Senator from Connecticut whether he wishes to speak on this amendment? If so, I will yield to him.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it makes no difference.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the people of my State are deeply interested in this legislation and I want to take the time of the Senate for a few minutes to explain my position on the bill.

Mr. President, one fact has strongly impressed me during the prolonged and interesting debate upon this bill. Many Senators have seemed to emphasize the thought that the interests of a single class were to be considered in the legislation under consideration, namely, the farmers.

Now, Mr. President, no Senator on this floor will go further than will I in safeguarding the agriculturists of America.

Furthermore, I am now and for years have been president of the State Board of Agriculture of New Jersey and am a member of the grange, and my association with the farmers of my State has been intimate and cordial.

I believe that this measure, in the event of its enactment, properly amended, will help the farmers of America, and in no small degree will support it for that reason.

But, Mr. President, I do not think that any particular class should be given special consideration in this bill. This is not class legislation. This is not a time to talk of classes, any more than it is a time to talk of sections.

Those whose interests are to be subserved and conserved by this bill, as I understand it, are the 110,000,000 who make up our entire citizenship. In other words, it is the individual consumer multiplied by 110,000,000 whose material interests we have in view, and which we are aiming to protect by the enactment into law of the measure now pending.

Another fact, Mr. President, which has strongly impressed itself upon me, as I have listened to this debate, has been the readiness with which subsidiary and immaterial issues have been raised to the exclusion of the vital one—the salvation of the Republic and of democracy in the world at large.

We read in the Scriptures of the blind man who was healed by the Savior of men, and who, when interrogated by the enemies of the Christ as to the methods employed in the restoration of his sight, replied:

This one thing I know, whereas I was blind, now I see.

That answer has always appealed to me. This man did not enter into details. He did not quibble. He cared nothing for side issues. One thought alone impressed itself upon his mind, that whereas had been blind, now he saw.

So far as concerns this or any other measure to come before this Senate, I shall support it or oppose it from a single viewpoint. "This one thing I know," America is facing the most ominous crisis in its history, and must fight desperately to win its battle for civilization.

In a little pamphlet before me I find this story:

In one of the darkest periods of the Civil War Mr. C. C. Bond, a Chicago lawyer of high character and a friend of President Lincoln, being in Washington, called upon the President. Immediately after the greeting the latter said, "Tell me, what do the people in Illinois say about this war?" Mr. Bond replied:

"Mr. President, you remember the American House at Ottawa?" (The Supreme Court of Illinois then held sessions at Ottawa.) "I was down there last week and in the hotel office found people in groups discussing the war. I approached one group where a man was gesticulating and talking in a loud voice about gold being 210 and the country going to the devil. I saw a young man with an eager, intelligent face turn on the speaker and say, 'Gold! What do you know about gold? I don't believe you ever saw any; I don't believe you have got a dollar on you now. To hell with gold! Pitch in and help win this war, and save the country!' Mr. President, I think that is about the way the people of Illinois feel."

This one thing I know, Mr. President, every patriotic American should pitch in and help win this war and save the country. And that, as I understand it, is the aim of this bill, and for that reason I shall give it my vote.

Do not let us spend so much time picking flaws in bills. Do not let us devote our energies so greatly to criticism of this measure or that, or this official or that. Let us admit that there are faults in legislation and errors in administration, but let us press on toward the goal set before us, the winning of this war and the salvation of the world.

Fort Sumter was fired on April 12, 1861, and the Nation was at war, yet Congress was not convened by President Lincoln till July 4. But that great man was not idle. He had done extraordinary things in the meanwhile, many of which were denounced as usurpatory. Thus Nicolay and Hay write:

Congress also legalized such of President Lincoln's war measures as had been taken without sanction of express law. * * * On the third day of the session a joint resolution was introduced in the Senate reciting the measures of extraordinary exigency, namely, the first call of the militia, the blockade, the call for three-year volunteers, the increase of the Regular Army and Navy, and the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and declaring these several acts legal and valid.

That is the way President Lincoln faced the issue of war in 1861.

Mr. President, the Chief Magistrate of the Nation having called his countrymen to arms that the Ark of the Covenant of our liberties might not be crushed under the juggernaut of the junkers, let us give no backward glance; but with the zeal of the heroes of old, the cross-bearers, the palm-bearers, the armor-bearers of ancient times, let us rally to the support of the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy and hold up his sword hand until the coming of a new day.

In a time of great national peril, when the destinies of the Republic are involved, I will follow a leader whose feet are on the solid rock of eternal justice and whose stride is that of a strong-hearted, wide-awake American, aiming at a definite goal. Nor do I care one whit what his party affiliations may have been in the past nor what ticket he may have voted last year or may vote a year hence.

The President having taken his stand for the sublimest principles which can actuate the human mind, and having evinced a determination to remain steadfast and immovable until the freedom of the world from Prussian autocracy is assured, I have no difficulty in taking my place beside him until the great struggle is won.

The time has come, Mr. President, to enact some such drastic food law as this, to confer the plenary power embraced therein. To a very large extent the law will enforce itself, and many of those agencies which have been operating in a manner prejudicial to the interests of the United States and its people will at once take pause and adjust themselves to the new order of things. Those who persist in running counter to the public welfare should be taken by the throat and forced into subjection.

I repeat, Mr. President, the time has arrived when we should take action not only upon the pending measure but upon all others deemed necessary by the executive branch of the Government in furtherance of its plans to carry on the war. In my opinion, the loss of a hundred million dollars, more or less, is of infinitely minor consequence compared with the loss of a hundred days.

As I have already stated, Congress was called together by President Lincoln July 4, 1861, three months after the war had been in progress. The session lasted one month, adjournment taking place August 6. During that period 60 general bills were passed, nearly all war measures, over two a day, omitting Sundays. On one day—July 31—eight bills were passed; on another day—August 5—11 became laws.

Let us profit by the example of our predecessors of 56 years ago.

We are in a state of war, grinding, crushing war, and war methods, yes, revolutionary methods, are imperative to an adequate and successful prosecution of the war. It is the mailed fist, and not the gloved hand, that must wield the sword.

It is not a time to discuss academic questions, to split hairs; It is not a period for finely spun theories of the doctrinaire or the scholastic.

When a tiger is at your throat, you do not stop to deliberate upon what weapons you may lawfully employ to slay him. When a madman leaps upon you, you do not go into executive session to decide with what form of diplomacy you will ward off his attack.

The giant tiger of Prussianism is awaiting his prey. The vulture of the Rhine is ready to swoop from the air upon his victim. The Hohenzollern sea dragon has already taken his toll.

Cruel are the claws of the German monster fixed upon the breast of civilization. Blow after blow has been rained upon him by the allies, by our allies, but the hideous beast maintains his strangle hold.

It is written upon the pages of fate, in letters of enduring light: "America, to you is given the commission, the command, to deal the finishing stroke to this brutish enemy of the human race, to drive him to his lair." Only thus can civilization be saved from a return to the days of long ago, when might made a servant of right, when arrogance made a subject of innocence, and the law of the jungle dominated the universe.

We are living in a great age. The deeds of to-day we shall dwell upon with our children and our children's children. And what is the story we shall tell of America's participancy in this epoch-making crisis?

It is my belief that America's place in future history will be a glorious one. Not from any deed thus far accomplished, but by reason of the fact that to us has been assigned the task of ending the greatest war of all time. And this task we will surely perform, with all the ardor, intelligence, and efficiency of a free and enlightened democracy, committed to the highest ideals of citizenship and consecrated to the uplift of humanity in all its phases.

With what remarkable prescience did England's great editor, Lord Northcliffe, writing two years ago for an American periodical, foreshadow the entrance of the United States into the pending conflict. He said:

If the United States shall be goaded into this struggle she will see it through in the same way as on previous occasions. She will spare neither men nor money in that part of the struggle which she undertakes. She will show to the Germans that behind the fine American business brain is a soul that, as in the past, does not hesitate at the sacrifice of blood for the preservation of great ideals. If the Americans enter the war it will be with no sordid motive, with no idea of the acquisition of territory but for the noble purpose of gaining freedom for those who are downtrodden and of showing to the world that citizenship of the United States is as inviolable as was that of Rome.

To maintain these principles, to sustain the Government which is zealously striving to carry them into effect, to promote the success on land and sea of our valiant brothers in arms, to secure the solidity and solidarity of our domestic economy and the equipment of our home toilers for their part in the great struggle, I am in favor of vesting in the President full control over the material resources of the Nation.

Mr. STERLING obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to give notice at this time that I reserve the right to reoffer the amendment which I offered on page 10, in line 22, after the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has the floor.

Mr. STERLING. I ask for the reading of the substitutes which I have offered to section 12.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 12 and in lieu of the words proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to insert:

SEC. 12. That whenever, during the continuance of the war, the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of any nonperishable agricultural products produced within the United States, in order to stimulate the production of such products, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable price for any such products, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit, thereupon, if the President finds that the importation into the United States of any such products produced outside of the United States seriously interferes or is likely seriously to interfere with the obtaining by such producers within the United States of the reasonable price therefor determined pursuant to this section and shall so proclaim, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a rate of duty upon the products so imported, the amount of which rate of duty shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President, which amount shall, when added to the value of the product at the time it is offered for entry, be sufficient to bring the prices thereof at which imported up to the reasonable price which shall have been fixed therefor pursuant to this section; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon any such products under any then existing tariff laws of the United States: Provided, That in order to further stimulate the production of wheat, the board of food administration herein provided for is authorized to devise and put in operation a plan for the awarding of Government prizes or bonuses for the best crop or crops of wheat, quantity and quality both considered, which may be grown on any specified area to be designated by said board. That in devising and carrying out such plan said board shall, so far as possible, advise and cooperate with the several State and county authorities in the wheat-growing sections of the United States, including State, district, and county agricultural associations. That for the purpose of carrying out these provisions the sum of $1,000,000 of the amount herein appropriated shall be available.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from South Dakota wish to speak?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir; I desire to speak on a substitute I have offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have an amendment pending upon which I want to speak about five minutes.

Mr. STERLING. I expect to occupy the floor, Mr. President, for a few moments.

Mr. President, I realize that I have not sufficient time in which properly to present the reasons for the substitute for section 12 which I have offered, but in view of the discussion this morning in regard to price fixing, the uncertainty of the situation in regard to it, the opposition expressed by many Senators to any price fixing at all, and the misgivings expressed by others, I hope that the substitute I have offered may have the consideration of Senators.

Let me say that the principal difference between the substitute offered by myself to section 12 as it now is lies in this, namely, that the President may first determine what is a reasonable price. In that respect the terms of the substitute are practically the same as section 12 of the original bill and as now presented by the Senator from Oregon; but, instead of providing for a guaranty of any minimum price, the substitute provides that a reasonable price having been determined by the President, that shall be the guide in determining whether or not he shall impose or increase the rate of duty upon any nonperishable agricultural product affected by the bill. That is the sole purpose of the substitute, so far as the determination of price is concerned. It gives no guaranty of price, but authorizes the President to determine at any time what shall be a reasonable price in order that he may be governed thereby in fixing the rate of duty.

Apropos of that, Mr. President, let me say that when the duty was taken off corn as the result of the tariff act of 1913, we had the report that from ten to twelve million bushels of Argentine corn had been shipped into the United States, with the result that the price of corn, according to the testimony of experts, men from the boards of trade and chambers of commerce, was depressed to the extent of 10 to 12 cents a bushel. To prevent a situation like that, the President would invoke the provisions of this substitute in fixing a rate of duty that would prevent the importation of corn or wheat which would come in unfair competition with American corn or wheat.

Mr. President, in regard to the general proposition of fixing prices, I am opposed to it. I do not believe there is any necessity for it. I think the situation is such, and will be such during the entire year of 1918, and until the 1st of January, 1919, that the farmer will be receiving a fair, just, and adequate price for his wheat and corn, and that there is absolutely no necessity here for fixing a price, minimum or otherwise.

It has been urged, Mr. President, that a price would be virtually fixed by the food administrator or by the board in its supervision of purchases of grain made by or for the allies and in preventing competition between them; but the demand for home consumption, with the demands of our allies, will remain the same; and all that the board of control will do in that regard—and that, I think, will be a beneficial thing—will be, not to materially reduce or depress the price, but to regulate, to prevent extreme fluctuations of the market, and that there will be no general or marked reduction of prices because of the action of the board of control. The law of supply and demand will in the main control.

Mr. TILLMAN and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have the floor, I will say to the Senators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have discovered that the Senator from South Dakota has the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. There are only 10 minutes left in which any Senator can occupy the floor before we will have to begin voting under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. STERLING. I regret, Mr. President, I can not yield just yet. I have waited all day for the opportunity to present this substitute. I quote Mr. Hoover in regard to the demand abroad. He said, at the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture:

Taking the situation by and large, the allies, in order to provide the minimum bread rations which they are now giving to their people, which is a great reduction on the normal consumption, and making a rough calculation as to the harvest, will require over 500,000,000 bushels of wheat at the next harvest.

Senator SMITH of Georgia. From us?

Mr. HOOVER. From America—from all quarters, in addition to their own harvest.

Mr. President, the farmer asks only for what is fair. He does not want the earth. His old shibboleth was "Equal rights for all, special privilege for none," and on this he stands to-day. He is satisfied with the price he is now receiving for his wheat. He has discernment and judgment enough to know the causes, and he knows that the same causes will in the main continue through the war. They are inevitable. The prices he has been receiving and will in all probability receive are and will be commensurate with the higher cost of farm labor and with any additional expenses incurred in his farming operations by reason of the war. He, of course, will want to be relieved from any malign influence that would set aside the law of supply and demand and unduly depress the price. On the other hand, he has such sense of justice, such patriotism, such interest in the welfare of his kind that he would not countenance that speculation or evil practice which would mean an oppressive price.

And against all this, Mr. President, we are guarding. We have already guarded against it to some extent in the antitrust law, in the Federal Trade Commission law, and in section 4 of the pending bill we are making ample provision to prohibit every evil practice in the buying, selling, and handling of grain. So the farmer will rest content with the prices he will receive as a result of conditions as they are bound to exist for the next year, or two years.

Mr. President, if this bill as it now stands has been framed by a few leaders, as they have been called, rather than in committee, I am free to say that in attempting to fix a price they have ignored the wishes of the farmers, for from all reports I have—and in my limited time I will just read one—if the farmer is not to be protected by the regulation of the prices of the things he buys and which are immediately necessary for the production of what he raises on the farm, he is opposed to the fixing of any price. This is the communication to which I refer:

CLARK, S. DAK., July 17, 1917.

Be it resolved by the stockholders of the Clark County Farmers Elevator Company——

And they are all farmers, Mr. President—in annual meeting assembled, That we protest against the proposed fixing and regulating of the prices on farm products unless provision is also made to fix and regulate the prices on all things that the farmer buys.

The above resolution was adopted by a unanimous vote.

H. L. KLOSTER, Secretary.

I regret the expiration of my time prevents any discussion at all of the other feature of my substitute.

Mr. TILLMAN and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, owing to the condition in which the Senate now finds itself, I desire to say a few words in regard to the amendment which I have offered, and which I shall later ask to have read.

The amendment to which I have reference has already passed the Senate as a joint resolution by a vote of 52 to 8. It ought to be adopted as an amendment to this bill by unanimous vote, for these reasons: Fertilizers are necessary in a large part of the South to make corn or cotton either. Soils once fertile have been worn out and washed away by bad farming, and the boll weevil, starting in Texas, has traveled eastward until it has reached middle Georgia and is already getting ready to cross the Savannah River from Georgia into South Carolina. Southern farmers in the older States have to have fertilizers to make any kind of a paying crop, and the most important ingredient in our fertilizers is ammonia or nitrogen. They are the same thing under different chemical conditions. Cottonseed meal, dried blood, and tankage, and nitrate of soda supply these two vitally necessary ingredients. The price of all four are now nearly prohibitive, and nitrate of soda can not be had in sufficient quantity at any price. This amendment merely authorizes the President to buy or procure, in whatever way he thinks best, ships and send to Chile for the nitrate. These ships could carry coal as far as Panama and deposit it there, unload, pass through the canal, and in a short time reach Chile, load with nitrate, and come on back, thus having a load both ways, reducing the cost to a minimum.

The amendment does not enlarge anybody's power; it does not make any assault upon the Constitution or change it. It merely authorizes the President to use $10,000,000 to obtain the soda and sell it to farmers for "cash in advance at cost."

The amendment is so simple, so clear in its provisions, that it ought not to excite any debate, and every Senator in this Chamber ought to vote for it. If I were to talk two hours, I could not say more, and I have long since learned in making speeches when I can not say anything worth while or new to stop.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the people of this country must have bread; the people of this country must have fuel. There will be trouble in the United States if conditions deny to the people either food or fuel.

Mr. President, I telegraphed all of the cities of Wisconsin on the lake shore from Chicago clear around to Superior to find the percentage of coal they now have on hand as compared with what they had on hand at the same time one year ago and two years ago; and in reply I have telegrams, some of which show the present supply to be but 10 per cent of what was on hand a year ago.

There is a reason for this shortage. The coal companies, when called upon to answer as to the limited amount of fuel they were furnishing, said it was due to the lack of transportation, and laid the blame on the railroads. The governor of Indiana disclosed that it was not the fault of the railroads, for when the limitations on the coal cars, for which the railroads were perhaps responsible in the first instance, had been removed, still the coal companies would not furnish coal except at extortionate prices.

Gov. Goodrich, of Indiana, appeared before the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and testified that, exercising the powers of their State commission, they took charge of the coal cars of all the railroads of that State and absolutely placed them at the disposition of the coal companies of the State. That action resulted in furnishing absolutely perfect conditions for transportation; but it did not lower the price of fuel one single cent to the consumer. The coal companies are charging more than double what they ought to charge, as shown by the testimony taken by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate and by the Federal Trade Commission of the United States, which, with the permission of the Senate, I shall insert in the RECORD:

The production of bituminous coal for the first two months of the coal year of 1917 (April and May) has shown a large increase, but not nearly so large as the increase in industrial consumption, and not nearly so large as the possible and economical output of mines already opened and in partial operation.

The present production of bituminous coal, the country over, is about 40 per cent short of the possible maximum, and this limitation is solely to be charged, as to primary cause, to faulty rail transportation. The present demand for coal is unprecedented, but the mines now open are capable of filling this demand if adequate car supply is furnished. * * *

The commission believes that there are enough coal cars in the country, but that there are not enough coal cars delivered to the mines, and that, an inadequate supply having been delivered to the mines and loaded, these cars are not moved to the point of consumption either with the greatest of expedition nor are they promptly discharged upon their arrival at their destination.

The commission has much testimony of widespread abuse in the use of coal cars by speculators for the storage of coal for speculative purposes, and that the practice of reconsignment is wasteful and a cause of delay and market manipulation.

The commission finds that coal is not sent to the point of consumption by the most direct route, and that coal cars are being used for transportation of many other sorts of product. * * *

Experience has shown that, in the United States, the normal balance in transportation which brings about a maximum of production with maximum economy, occurs when out of every 100 tons of originating freight approximately 56 tons are unmanufactured mineral products and 44 are manufactured products, foodstuffs, and other commodities, and when of the 56 tons of mineral products 35 tons are coal. Of these 35 tons of coal the railroads themselves consume about 12 tons.

The present balance of transportation is a great reduction in the proportion of the cars furnished for the transportation of coal. The railroads, however, are consuming their full quota of coal, so that while under favorable and natural conditions 35 tons of coal would be moved out of each 100 tons of freight, there is now being moved very much less coal. The entire coal shortage is thrown upon the industries of the country and the domestic users, who, instead of having a coal supply equal to two-thirds of the total coal movement, are reduced to a small and continually diminishing ratio, and this in a time when every effort is being made to stimulate the industrial effectiveness of the Nation.

The commission believes that the coal industry is paralyzing the industries of the country, and that the coal industry itself is paralyzed by the failure of transportation.

Speaking of the situation that confronts the country with respect to coal, the commission said:

On the Great Lakes it was the custom for ships which carried grain and ore down the Lakes to carry cargoes of coal up to the Northwest. During the summer of 1916 many ships which brought down ore and wheat went up the Lakes in water ballast, taking no coal. Thus they made three round trips, earning high rates on freight one way during the same time that would have been consumed in making two round trips carrying cargoes both ways. This practice was pronounced in the late summer and autumn of 1916, and the result was so serious that when navigation opened this spring the Northwest was facing an actual coal famine. This evil condition has already begun this year, and if persisted in the coal famine which threatened that part of the country in the winter of 1916–17 will be an actual coal famine in the winter of 1917–18. * * *

Our predecessors in this world war have had to solve the fuel problem, which lies at the base of every military and industrial activity. They have tried various experiments, and their failures and successes may well guide us in our search for a solution. In England the Government took complete control of the coal mines after less radical methods of regulation failed. The French Government has divided France into three coal zones in order to equalize distribution, and the Government becomes the sole vendor. On May 2, 1917, the Russian provisional Government took over all the coal mines of that country with a view to control coal distribution and prices. Soon after the outbreak of the war Germany took measures to still further centralize and control the whole coal industry of the Empire under Government administration. The Italian Government imports all the coal brought into the country and acts as a clearing house for its distribution.

All the nations at war have relieved coal miners from military duty, urging that their greatest service to the State can be performed by remaining at their regular employment. Already, in this country the ranks of the miners are being seriously depleted by enlistment. * * *

If the producer at each mine were paid his full cost of production, with allowance for depletion, maintenance, upkeep, and all the usual items, and to this were added a fixed and uniform net profit per ton, with due regard to quality, the coal thus produced at widely varying costs, if pooled, could be sold through the Government at an average and uniform price, quality considered, which would be entirely tolerable to the consuming public, and a price much lower than could be fixed if an effort were made to fix a uniform price to the producer. * * *

The pooling of coal in the hands of a Government agency would still be ineffective either as to distribution or as to the promotion of a maximum of production unless similar control extended over all means of transportation, both rail and water, and to meet this the pooling of railroads and boat lines is clearly indicated. The railroads of the country, if operated as a unit and on Government account, could be used to transport coal and other products by the most direct route to their points of destination, and the efficiency of the roads themselves and of existing rolling stock and of motive power would be vastly increased.

Mr. President, there are just two solutions for this situation, and they have been presented in the amendment, the joint composition of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], authorizing the Government to take the coal at the mouth of the mine and to distribute it from that point on—not to sell it, but to say to the dealers "You shall have coal at a definite price"—that may be interpreted as selling—"but you shall have coal to sell at a reasonable profit, the same profit which you were getting in normal times, if you will sell it to the consumers for that profit; but if you do not, you shall have no coal at all." And to say to the producers of coal at the mouth of the mine, "We will give you all that it costs to produce the coal in these times, with increased wages of labor figured in, but you shall have only a fair profit above that."

Mr. President, fuel is a prime necessity. I am speaking upon this amendment because there will be no opportunity under the unanimous-consent agreement to say a word in regard to it when the time comes to vote upon it; but, Senators, there is nothing more important in this bill.

I have telegrams from all the lake-shore cities which indicate trouble in this country that can not be avoided if the conditions that now exist are not met by legislation which will correct them. I can not go into the argument or the reasons for it, but I appeal to Senators here to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, which is the consummation of months of investigation by the Trade Commission and of weeks of investigation by the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate, and is, let me say to the Senate, the best solution, in the judgment of the members of the committee, that can be made of this troublesome question. If we do not solve it now, trouble will come to this country.

I ask leave to print, in connection with my remarks, a statement as to the efforts of the Illinois coal committee, basing its action upon the effort of the Peabody Committee of the Council of Defense, to extort from Wisconsin coal consumers twice the amount of money that they are fairly entitled to, as shown by all the testimony.

I also ask leave to print in connection with my remarks certain testimony given before the Interstate Commerce Committee—certain telegrams and letters which I have received on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Telegram.]

MADISON, WIS., July 12, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
National Chairman Council of Defense and Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

Illinois coal operators are canvassing and circulating Wisconsin dealers quoting prices of $3.50 to $4 per ton at mine, stating that this is based on recommendations of Secretary Lane, Gov. Fort, and committee of National Defense Council; same coal last year, $1.45. Copy of circular mailed to-day.

MAGNUS SWENSON,
Chairman Wisconsin State Council of Defense.

JULY 12, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Chairman Council of National Defense, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have just wired you as per inclosed copy, and we also inclose circular referred to in the telegram.

These circulars are distributed by the coal operators of Illinois in Wisconsin, with urgent requests on the part of their traveling agents to buy at these prices. The coal dealers are led to believe that these prices are fixed by Government officials and will therefore be permanent. One coal dealer here who gave us the circular informs us that he paid for the washed coal now quoted at $3.50 to $4, $1.45 per ton at the mine last year.

From the information which we have received from the Council of National Defense, we note that there is no such agreement, but, nevertheless, the public are led to believe that such an agreement has been made in spite of your published letter to the contrary.

We are much gratified at the position taken by our President in his address yesterday, but believe that some drastic action is necessary immediately, and the fact that no such agreement exists should be given wide publicity.

Very truly, yours,

STATE COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
By MAGNUS SWENSON,
Chairman.

ILLINOIS COAL PRICES.

CHICAGO, July 2, 1917.

To Illinois operators:

Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane, Gov. J. F. Fort, of the Federal Trade Commission, and the coal production committee of the National Defense Council, in a conference held at Washington, D. C., June 26 to 28, inclusive, having heard the statements of coal operators of the country regarding production costs and the conditions now surrounding that industry, recommended the following maximum prices for Illinois, to which the special committee of seven Illinois operators assented:

Mine-run 2-inch, 1¼-inch, 1½-inch, and ¾-inch screenings, Nos. 4 and 5	$2.75
Domestic sizes below indicated (or any combination of these sizes greater than coal passing through a 1½-inch round perforation)	3.50

Lump, 1¾ to 6 inches.
Furnace, 6 by 3 inches.
Small egg, 3 by 2 inches.
Stove, 2 by 1¼ inches.
Domestic chestnut, 7¼ inches by ¾ inch.
All per net ton of 2,000 pounds f. o. b. mines delivery.
The following districts were recommended for special consideration:
Thin Vein North Field, account of high production costs, 50 per cent higher maximum.
Assumption Coal Mining Co., same as above.
Jackson County No. 2, seam, same as above.
There are a few other single mines, of small tonnage, at several points within the State whose claim to higher returns was considered but whose exact status has not been established.
It is understood that a price of 50 cents per ton below the above figures will in every instance be protected to the Government on all their purchases from all fields, subject to adjustment after a more complete investigation of costs.
The maximum commission allowed jobbers, 25 cents per ton.

ILLINOIS COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,
E. T. BENT, President.
COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION (FIFTH AND NINTH DISTRICTS), THOS. T. BREWSTER, President.
CENTRAL ILLINOIS COAL OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION,

PEOPLE'S POWER LEAGUE OF ILLINOIS,
Chicago, July 19, 1917.

COPY OF LETTER SENT TO GOV. LOWDEN BY PEOPLE'S POWER LEAGUE OF ILLINOIS.

DEAR SIR: The price of coal at the mine last year was approximately $1 per ton. It does not require an investigation to establish this. You, yourself, are doubtless familiar with the average price paid during 1916 by the Pullman Railroad, which was $1.98 per ton, including transportation.

Nor can this fact be uknown to the State defense council. Many of the members of that body are officers, directors, or stockholders of companies which have made sworn statements as to average coal prices paid by them last year. For your information we append such a list. These prices include freight. By subtracting carrying charges, you can readily verify our statement that the average price last year was about $1 per ton at the mine.

To-day the people of the State are asked prices for coal based upon a mine-mouth price of $2.75 or greater. The labor cost has increased 10 cents per ton in the meantime. Ten cents per ton is a fair profit in normal times. Is it not evident that profits have risen 1,500 per cent while wages have risen 15 per cent?

Can such problems be dealt with by persons who are themselves receiving the profits? The presence of Mr. Francis S. Peabody (himself a beneficiary) on the National Defense Board has already done serious damage to the industrial processes of the country. The use of official power to protect private privileges at a time like this so as to cripple industry is doubly dangerous. The prosecution of the war is dependent upon underlying industrial processes. Hence interference with these processes is equivalent to aiding the armed forces of the enemy.

We desire to point out that a similar condition exists in the State defense council. Many of its members are themselves financially interested in the mining or sale of coal. We append a list for your information. The public was at first inclined to think that with many of these men patriotism would outweigh profit. We have no doubt that you yourself thought so when you appointed them. This hope has so far proved delusive. We now appeal directly to you. Can you not urge upon the council that they abandon, temporarily at least, their selfish interests for those of their Nation? Let them abandon their Fabian policy and take action. We urge that public hearings be held and prompt and efficacious steps taken to stop wholesale extortion.

We urge you to summarily remove Messrs. Insull, Upham, Hopkins, and such others as may have demonstrated their inability to lay aside selfish for patriotic motives and replace them with men who represent and have been affiliated with industry rather than privilege.

Respectfully, yours,

HUGH REID,
Chairman Committee on War Problems.

PEOPLE'S POWER LEAGUE OF ILLINOIS,
CHICAGO.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL DEFENSE OF THE PEOPLE'S POWER LEAGUE.

THE COAL SITUATION.

The fuel crisis at present is a grave one. Coal is the basic necessity of the Nation. Without it not a wheel can be turned in our great industries. Nor is it possible to transport either men or material by rail or water. Food can not be shipped, cooked, or refrigerated without it. In short, it is our greatest necessity.

Your committee has investigated the situation to the extent of its ability. It has followed with care the daily press, the reports of the various investigating bodies, and has interviewed coal operators and miners, as well as public officials. No statement is made in this report which has not been amply confirmed by observation or the reports of official bodies.

It is our belief that the recent "reductions" announced by the coal-production committee and by the coal operators are not in any sense reductions, but advances. We can not believe that they are made in good faith. Secretaries Baker and Daniels have rejected these prices, and properly so. The mine price of $2.75 per ton for the Illinois district is nothing short of extortion. The report of the Commonwealth Edison Co. to the State utilities commission alleges that the average price paid by that company during 1916 was $2.04 per ton, including freight. The chairman of the coal-production committee, Francis S. Peabody, sold a great part of this himself. We take these facts from the sworn statement of Samuel Insull as president of the above company.

Official figures show that during a period of 15 years the labor cost of Illinois coal has advanced 20.6 cents. Of this, 10.4 cents has been in the last 18 months. We find that although the labor cost has not risen over 15 per cent, the market prices demanded are from 100 to 400 per cent greater. The language of the Indiana Utilities Commission that this is "nothing short of outrageous" seems amply justified.

Coal at the mine mouth 18 months ago was worth about $1 per ton. To-day, with an additional labor cost of 10 cents per ton, Mr. Peabody and his associates are asking for the same coal $2.75 at the mine mouth. We append a list of prices paid during 1916 by large producers in Illinois. They are but a small part of the figures collected. In each case the figures are taken from sworn statements of officers of the companies themselves. We can see no present solution but the resignation of Mr. Peabody and his associates who have attempted in a time of war to use official power to their own advantage. Such men are the real Prussians.

Coal prices during 1916.

Illinois Central Railroad	$1.21
Chesapeake & Ohio	1.01
Chicago & Alton	1.19
Elgin, Joliet & Eastern Railroad	1.22
Illinois Terminal	1.25
Chicago & Illinois	1.21
Springfield Terminal	1.20
Cleveland, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis	1.41
Baltimore & Ohio	1.02
General average for all steam railroads	1.50

It should be borne in mind that these prices include transportation also, and that the $2.75 price named by the Peabody committee is a mine-mouth price.

The recommendations of the Federal Trade Commission should be followed. These will be dealt with in a supplementary report on "Coal and transportation." It should, of course, be understood that the data collected by the committee are open to Members upon request.

Respectfully submitted.

HUGH REID,
Chairman of Committee.
HERBERT L. MOULTON,
Secretary.

JULY 17, 1917.

DANIEL HOAN,
Mayor, Milwaukee, Wis.:

Please consult coal dealers, manufacturers, public-utilities managers, and others who may have knowledge of the fuel supply and ascertain the facts with respect to Milwaukee's coal requirements for the year and wire results:

First. State, respectively, amount of anthracite and bituminous necessary to supply your local demands and needs of places dependent upon Milwaukee for supply.

Second. State receipts thus far this year, and compare with receipts for like period in other years.

Third. State as exactly as possible the amount received via the Lake and compare with receipts for other years for same period.

Fourth. State rail receipts and compare with like receipts for other years, and prospects of rail receipts meeting the demand for classes of coal received by rail.

Fifth. Give a comparison of prices upon different classes of coal for manufacturing and domestic use, respectively, as compared with 1916 and 1915.

Sixth. State any other facts that may have a bearing upon your fuel needs.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 19, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.:

Replying to telegram of July 17 concerning fuel situation in Milwaukee will answer questions in order; one based on average total receipts for last three years annual requirements for Milwaukee and territory. Supplied therefrom are: Anthracite, 1,100,000 tons; bituminous, 4,250,000 tons. Two total receipts to July 15 this year: Anthracite, 259,878; bituminous, 1,343,783. Anthracite 64 per cent, bituminous 79 per cent of average total receipts to same date last three years. Three total receipts via lake July 15 this year: Anthracite, 209,517; bituminous, 1,057,746. Anthracite 58 per cent, bituminous 70 per cent of average total receipts via lake same date last three years. Four total rail receipts six months ending June 30: Anthracite, 47,464; bituminous, 259,627. Same date 1916: Anthracite, 81,612; bituminous, 193,960. Anthracite, 1915, 32,376; bituminous, 164,585. Anthracite, 1914, 11,080; bituminous, 200,555. Unusual demands for rail coal, due to shortage in lake tonnage and car situation, make prospects of sufficient rail receipts uncertain. Five prices current July 15, given for 1915, 1916, and 1917 in order: Anthracite, retail, delivered, egg and stove, $7.90, $8.30, $9.15; nut, $8.15, $8.55, $9.40; pea, $6.80, $7.20, $8.30; buckwheat, $5.25, $5.75, $7.50. Bituminous prices on cars at docks Pittsburgh & Youghiogheny, West Virginia, Hocking & West Virginia, splint, pile run, $3.24, $3.35, $6.20; screenings, $2.65, $2.75, $6. Pocahontas smokeless, mine run, $3.50, $3.65, $7.50; screenings, $3, $3.70, $5.60. No coal on hand beginning this season, account shortage last winter. Extra supply needed this year. In consequence everything possible should be done to facilitate early shipments to Northwest. Only five months navigation season left.

ASHLAND, WIS., July 19, 1917.

Senator R. M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.:

Answering your telegram, July 17, to mayor, receipts of coal at Ashland to July 1 for three years were: Anthracite, 1915, 4,000 tons; 1916, 7,700 tons; 1917, 5,400 tons. Bituminous, 1915, 169,000 tons; 1916, 237,000 tons; 1917, 163,000 tons; all by lake, as no rail shipments reach Ashland. All coal receipts 1915: Anthracite, 30,000 tons; bituminous, 663,000 tons; and for 1916: Anthracite, 41,000 tons; bituminous, 693,000 tons. These receipts measure quantity needed for local consumption and rail shipments to interior points, the carry over being nominal, as a rule. Late opening of navigation may account for part or all of decrease in receipts this year; if not made up during lake season, will be shortage, since needs increase yearly and rail receipts are costly, slow, and uncertain at this distance from mines. Wholesale prices are same here as at Superior and other ports, but local dock superintendents are unable or unwilling to furnish them for past years, and suggest Peabody or Reiss, of Sheboygan, as proper authority for this information.

KENOSHA, WIS., July 19, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Practically all coal required by this city is for local use; none shipped out; 140,000 tons bituminous required per annum; about three weeks' supply on hand; price $1 to $2 higher than last year; 38,000 tons anthracite required; 3,000 tons on hand; prices $1 higher than last year and $2 higher than two years ago; 2,000 tons anthracite received to date this year by lake, which is about one-tenth of receipts in other years; no bituminous received by lake this year; other years 7,000 tons eastern bituminous received by lake. Kenosha generally depends on lake shipments for anthracite and eastern bituminous. Dealers state inability to secure tonnage is responsible for short supply of anthracite at this time. Lake rate to this port $1.25 at present; usually 40 to 50 cents.

Lake freight rates have advanced from 40 to 50 cents per ton to $1.25 per ton.

SHEBOYGAN, WIS., July 20, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Anthracite requirements here during remainder season lake navigation and ports usually supplied from Sheboygan approximately 275,000 tons and of bituminous 250,000 tons. Total receipts to July 1, of anthracite 70,800 tons, as against 109,000 in 1916; of bituminous, 94,000 tons, as against 146,000 tons, showing shortage of 38,000 tons anthracite and 52,000 tons bituminous. No rail coal received here. Anthracite prices show advance of 75 cents per ton; bituminous average $2.50 over 1915 prices. Dealers usually take care of local requirements here, but interior points will suffer from shortage unless heavier shipments are received via Lakes. Shortage of bituminous coal generally conceded to be due to lack of transportation facilities from mines to Lake ports.

MILWAUKEE COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
July 19, 1917.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Milwaukee County Council of Defense has corresponded with you previous to this time relative to the passage of the Lever bill and other legislation of similar character. We would like to urge further that the Wisconsin Representatives do their utmost to support legislation which would accomplish the following:

1. Give the President power to fix prices, regulate output, or take over and operate instruments of production, such as coal and iron mines, manufactures of iron and steel and other products as may be necessary and close down or curtail the production of luxuries.

2. That the President be given power to control the food situation, including the fixing of prices, production, distribution, and use of foods.

The County Council of Defense wishes to impress upon the Wisconsin Representatives that the present speculation in the necessities of life has placed this great mass of our people in such a position as to render it impossible for them to maintain an adequate standard of living while a very few are making exorbitant profits. We wish to state frankly that unless this situation is remedied, particularly with regard to the unprecedented increase in price of the necessities of life, that we do not see how international disturbances in carrying on the war can be avoided.

Very truly, yours,

MILWAUKEE COUNTY COUNCIL OF DEFENSE,
WILLITS POLLOCK, Secretary.

Daniel W. Hoan, Wheeler P. Bloodgood, W. C. McCarty, August H. Vogel, Robert Uihlein, E. E. White, William Coleman, Henry Rumpel, Cornelius Corcoran, Mrs. J. W. Mariner, W. C. Greenman, Nelson P. Huist, Charles Allis, J. W. P. Lombard, Thaddeus Wild.

In the statement which he made before the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate Hon. William B. Colver, member of the Federal Trade Commission, calling attention to the coal situation, said:

To begin with, the commission protests against the use of the term "car shortage." We do not believe that a car shortage exists, of necessity. That one exists in the coal trade is true. That one need to exist with present equipment we do not believe.

Quoting from Senator POMERENE'S figures, adopting them, there are 2,750,000 cars in the country. At the greatest point of shortage the shortage indicated was 170,000 cars, or about 5 per cent. There is a waste in the use of railroad equipment and rolling stock close up to 20 per cent, and that is traced to perhaps three primary causes. I will only speak to-day in generalities, then I shall be glad to submit to questions as to more specific things.

You have 2,750,000 cars. It is true, of course, that a very large proportion of those are not coal cars. Confining ourselves to coal cars, let me go back; let us get this right from the beginning. The production of the coal mine is limited absolutely in the presence of labor by the supply of cars. No matter how good a mine a man has, and no matter how many men willing to work he may have, he can only send down into the mine each morning that number of men who will be able to fill the empty cars which have been drawn up during the night at the mouth of the mine. To do more is waste, and it is an impossibility. I speak now particularly of bituminous mines. Bituminous mines, because of their great output and for other reasons, can not have storage capacity at the mine. If they could have, it is too late now to do it; but they have not got it, and it can not be provided this summer, Mr. Chairman. Now, then, the production of coal in the country in perfectly good mines, which may be economically produced and with the application of the labor which now stands ready to go into those mines, the production of coal can be increased not less than 40 per cent. If the production of coal in this country were increased by 40 per cent, there would be no coal famine and there would be no excessive coal price.

The mines, some of them, are working, Mr. Morrow testified, two days a week; more of them are working three days a week, and many of them are working four days a week. The miners are being bid for by other employers of labor and large wages are being offered them. The miners of the United States are being disorganized; they are being asked to suffer a hardship, and their efficiency is being destroyed by reason of the fact that they are being given irregular employment. The fact that the miners' wages have been frequently increased does not answer the question that the miners are not being given full time to work. I speak now of bituminous. That is not true in anthracite.

We will now go back to the coal cars. If it is true that the greatest shortage, the peak shortage, is 170,000 out of a base of 2,750,000, as I take Senator POMERENE'S figures for the shortage, that is undoubtedly a matter that your committee has inquired into. I think that figure is a familiar one. Then there has been a maximum car shortage of something like 5 per cent.

You do not need new cars. The objection is that cars are now hard to get; we have not time to get them; that cars are costing twice as much as they cost before. But we do not need new cars. We need to use the cars we already have. When we tell you, not as a practice, now, but isolated cases, or occasional cases, indicating tendencies, I think, and may be cited, when we tell you the steel hopper car, which is made only for the transportation of coal, and is purely a coal car, made in the place of the old gondola; when we tell you those cars have their hoppers, their V-shaped bottoms filled with slag in order to make a flat floor to lay steel billets on them, we are justified in saying that if such a thing as that could pass without any considerable notice, that a practice somewhat bad has grown up in the industry.

As a matter of fact, coal cars are being used to transport automobiles, pleasure vehicles; to transport sand, sand for track work. That track work is necessary and useful, but it seems to me it could wait at this time in the condition the country finds itself, or flat cars could be used; but I am not operating the railroads, and am just saying that the coal cars have been and are devoted to other uses. But if the long haul were cut out, if when coal is produced at a mine and delivered at the car, it should be taken to the point of destination by the shortest route, whether that be only one or three railroads; and if that coal car were sent back immediately to the mine—unloaded and sent back immediately to the mine, Mr. Chairman—there would be no car shortage; the word I object to, for the lack of cars at the mine is absolutely fundamental and primary, and almost the only reason for the situation we find ourselves in to-day.

We have found that those mines devoted to the production of coal for railroad use are working six days in the week full time and are being supplied with 100 per cent of their requirements.

Of course, the committee knows, but for the sake of the record, for those who do not know, let us explain for a moment what distribution means. On a given road all the mines have a rated production. They make application to the railroad companies for an allotment of cars. It has to do with how many men they have ready to go into the mines, the present condition of their mine, so that they estimate each day how much coal they could get out. They make their application to the railroad, and the railroad then takes inventory of the cars that it has available for that service and allots them or distributes them. Now, if that distribution were equitable the situation would be somewhat relieved, but it is not.

These three things which I referred to a moment ago are the long haul of this coal after it is loaded on the cars; the reconsignment in transit, where coal starts off for one place and finally is stopped and diverted and sent to another, once, twice, or three times, and, third, the delay in unloading the car, which is of two kinds, the demurrage paid, not by speculators, but paid by grace of speculators who hold the coal in the cars on sidings out in the country while famine conditions are brought about in cities and in industrial centers, and then they pass the coal on to the consumer at the speculative or famine price, plus the demurrage that has accumulated during the time that coal was held out for the creation of that famine condition.

The other part of the demurrage or delay is the dilatory unloading of the cars after the coal is brought alongside the industrial plant or the wholesale or retail yards or chutes.

Now, if coal cars and cars capable of being devoted to carrying coal were devoted to the use of coal mines, there would be plenty of coal. If those cars, having been loaded, were hauled by the most direct route to the point of consumption and were instantly discharged—that is, reasonably instantly discharged—and returned immediately to the mines, no other industry and no other user of freight cars would be deprived of service that he needs. Enough added efficiency would be given to the equipment which you already have to take up any withdrawal that might be necessary from any other industry. But suppose we do withdraw from some other industry, if the withdrawing is done with wisdom. There is no industry, there is nothing, the freight cars are needed for, except raw food materials and minerals, that can be gotten to go onto the cars that can be made ready to go on the car until coal has entered into its preparation, so to be at all concerned about being able to ship commodities, and say we must not take cars away from other commodities, and then, in order to work that theory out, take the coal away from the industries which make those other commodities, seems to be rather an inverted way of going at it. There will be nothing to ship if they do not have the coal to make it.

The fixing of prices—and I want to say that we are pretty well convinced that the coal operator, by and large, in the United States is getting more blame than he has earned. The coal operators themselves are not getting extravagant or extortionate prices. Some of them are, it is true. Many cases can be cited, but I am speaking as a generality. The difficulty lies where the coal leaves the mine. Operators have testified to us many times, and have doubtless stated to you, "We can not control the coal after it leaves us." About 80 per cent of the coal leaves the mine on contract to the large industrial consumer. About 20 per cent of the coal leaves the mine not on contract. You called that a moment ago, I think, Mr. Chairman, spot coal. In any event, that is the common expression. Now, it is that fraction of 20 per cent that is the seat of your trouble. The 10 per cent, or even 5 per cent, of all this coal produced being turned out on the market as a commodity on which speculation can obtain fixes the price for the whole 100 per cent and always tends to fix it upward, especially in this case here.

Now, I say to fix the price of coal to the operator will not solve your problem. In the first place, to fix the price of coal at the mine and then not be sure that it is going to be delivered somewhere is an idle proceeding, merely fixing the price. We might fix the price of coal in the moon, but it would not do anybody any good unless we first solve the transportation problem. All the price fixing and all the rest of these things will fail. If we had the distribution, then fixing the price of coal at the mine would still fail of its purpose, and for this reason: We could say how much the operator could have for his coal, and then he would sell it at that price and he would have done his duty and all that the law or the Government had asked him to do. He would have done all that these committees down here who are meeting to-day will ask him to do, all that is contemplated, and all the business that is done in fixing the price to the operator. But once the coal leaves the hands of the operator it falls into the hands of the broker; it falls into the hands of the wholesaler, who performs a most useful service; the speculator does not. It falls into the hands of the retailer.

If you fix prices at the mine, Mr. Chairman, you would be faced by about three possible methods of doing that. In the first place, you would have to fix a separate price at each mine in order to have everybody fairly contented. If you did that, the 20 per cent of spot coal, having gone forth, would go through the speculator, if it got into his hands; it would go through the wholesaler; it would go to the retailer, and the Government or some other agency would have to follow the last ton of that coal to the last farmhouse on the prairie to see what it was finally sold for. We would be up against the absolutely impossible proposition of following 600,000,000 tons of coal through to consumption. You had much better apply your remedy at the other end, not at the distribution end, which would follow if you set these various prices, because your coal dealer in Sioux City would be perfectly certain when his customer came in—there being 5,000 coal prices fixed by the Government or by some committee of coal operators; there being 5,000 different prices fixed, if they do it that way—your coal dealer in Sioux City would be perfectly certain when his customer came in that his particular car of coal from which this particular wagonload is being taken came directly from the highest-cost mine in the United States, and the high cost would be the cost the people would have to pay and would fix the price of this marginal spot coal.

We argue, therefore, that it is not best to fix the varying prices in varying operations, and there are good reasons why operations must vary. Two mines half a mile apart may have a difference in legitimate cost of operation, each being operated with the same industry and the same skill of 100 per cent. One may have water in it; one may not. There are a thousand things that enter in there that are natural reasons and can not be cured by legislation or by science or anything else. They are just natural reasons. So there must be some variation in the cost of the production of coal. Therefore when we fix prices we must recognize that.

If we do not want to fix 5,000 prices for 5,000 different mines, we might fix a uniform price, either by fields or districts all over the United States; but the thing we are trying to do—the thing I think we are all united in at this time—is to win this war. Since coal is the fundamental, the life blood of all industry, and the life and health of our people as well, it seems that coal is of that essential character we must be sure that at all times we have a 100 per cent production of the coal. Now, we have got not more than 60 per cent; and Gov. Goodrich's telegram, which I am going to read you in a minute, says we have only 40 or 50 per cent. If we are going to have an average uniform price, and we are going to have 100 per cent production, your average uniform price must be the price as high as the cost of production in the poorest or highest cost mine. That throws an enormous burden on the industries of the country and on the domestic users of the country. Each one must pay for the least economic coal a price based on that.

It is said in reply to that, that that is all right, because the low-cost mine, which may have 300, 400, 500, or 600 per cent net profit—net selling price, net profit—the Government can take that back with the excess-profits tax. But it is indirect taxation, and the people who can not afford to pay will pay those taxes, not the man with the good mine.

The third expedient, then—and both these other expedients have been tried abroad—these other countries have suffered and worked their way in blood and suffering through this war that we are just starting in—they have tried their experiments, and their experiments have failed. Some of them have succeeded. The third thing, then, we can fix 5,000 prices. If we fix an average price we either close up some of the production by fixing it too low or else we fix it high enough to have 100 per cent production, and so put an unwarranted burden upon the industries and the people of the United States. The third thing, then, is this expedient: Pass all the coal through the hands of the Government in line of distribution just once. Let in that instant when it is the custom to sell coal at the mouth of the mine—the mine price is the customary price—in the instant between the time the coal car comes from the mine and goes on to the scales, and that coal is weighed, and the next instant when the coal is dumped into the car or into the chutes, if during that instant title to that coal passes to the United States you would have a control that would reach both ways to the ultimate. And when I say "control" I do not mean Russian; I mean a sane and reasonable control, and such control as the coal men themselves say they would like.

You would have a control that would reach into the mine. The Government would not keep possession of this coal at all; it would sell it in the normal channels, it would fulfill contracts to the big commercial users, it would sell to the wholesalers, it would go through all the usual processes of distribution, except that the Government would then have a monopoly on coal, which it need only exercise; and we can not imagine of any power being exercised other than beneficially in these times of war. No one wants power to punish, no one wants power to harm any industry. You would have the power in that moment to say to the wholesalers, "Your history shows that the useful public service that you are rendering in transporting and distributing this coal and in storing it and otherwise taking care of it, in furnishing your credit and your money in keeping the industries going in years past has been a certain per cent for a certain amount of money per ton. You shall have that—go right on as if there were no war and take your profit." We would say to the retailer, "You do the same—take your normal profit. We know you have to pay cartage, we know you have to pay storage, we know you have bad debts, we know you have to furnish credit, and we know on top of that and all your overhead you are entitled to a fair compensation for the public service you are rendering. All right, take it." The retail price would not be the same everywhere, but the price would be the same after you had equalized the variation in the freight haul. You would have practically a uniform price, quality of coal considered, of course.

Now, then, if an operator—speculator—if an operator held coal out of use the remedy would be in the hands of the Government. He would get no more coal until he reformed his ways. If a retailer became a violator against good conscience he could have his supply cut off by having his wholesaler refuse to sell him more coal on pain that he himself would get no more coal.

Now, we will get to the fact. If the coal passed through the Government's hands just once, so that the title actually passed, coal could be mined in a thousand mines under a thousand different conditions and arrive at the surface and go into the coal cars at a thousand different costs of production. But it would all be one transaction. It would be one pool. The total tonnage of coal put into that pool, divided by the number of tons in the pool, quality considered, would determine what the price of that coal was, all of it, and the coal could be distributed at that price, and that is the point where the equalization can take place, and it is where the equalization does take place.

The other countries—Italy, for instance—will not let a pound of coal pass through the hands of anybody until it has passed through the hands of the Government.

And with reference to the coal situation on the Great Lakes, Mr. Colver testified:

Mr. Chairman, one thing that the commission has urged in its various reports to the Senate, and one thing that I think lies strongest on our minds—I know it does on mine—is this, that any promised remedy, or any suggestion of remedy, or any temporary relief of the situation that may do for the demands of June, July, and August will not be sufficient. We are now coming close to July. The custom of the coal industry has been in the past, and always has been, to pile up in the more remote sections of the country stock piles of coal during the winter. Stock piles especially are piled up in New England and at the head of the Lakes. All through the country cellars ought to be filled with coal at this time. Apartment houses should have their stocks in or should be getting their stocks in. As a matter of fact, we came into the spring this year and came into the opening of the navigation on the Great Lakes with great piles of coal at a time when there would have been normally 3,000,000 tons of coal at Duluth on the docks, and there were around 100,000, just a few tons. I said 100,000 tons; certainly not as many as that.

We find, speaking of anthracite, the anthracite people went into the season last year with a large accumulation of coal. There were in the hands of the dealers, wholesalers and retailers, and yards all over the country a fair accumulation of bituminous coal. We find now that the dealers' bins are stripped; we find that the docks are empty; we find that where we should have begun to pile up these stock piles in April, April has gone, and May has gone, and June has gone, and nothing has been done, and that is all there is left. July, August, September, and October, and then the winter will come and no power on earth can save this country from calamity. Unless something is done intelligently and presently to stimulate the production of coal and to intelligently enforce the distribution of that coal to those sections of the country where it must be consumed next winter it not only means paralysis of our industries but it will mean actual suffering and privation and death to our people. So that as to any condition or any figures that are brought in to show that this month is a little bit better than last or that the price has gone down a little bit, the commission respectfully urges that that is not enough until the production for the next four months is piled up much more than any possible demand for consumption, and until these stock piles can be piled up the problem has not been touched.

The time is going to come this winter when the engines on the prairies can not haul coal trains through the blizzards; when it will take too much coal to fire the engines. That work must be done, and it must be done now. We have gotten on in the season so far that the most extraordinary effort must be made if we are going to save ourselves and our people and the industries of this country from a most terrible calamity next winter.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2.30 o'clock has arrived. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment now is the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the amendment which was offered yesterday, with respect to coal, is a pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been read. Shall it be read again?

Mr. BORAH. I ask to have it read again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a request for the reading of the amendment. The Secretary will read it.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. That it is necessary and proper, in order to execute the powers of Congress to raise and support armies, provide and maintain the Navy, and properly and efficiently provide for the common defense, that the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of sale, transportation, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission, during the war and for a period of one year thereafter, or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

That if, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations, or to conduct his business efficiently under the regulations and control of the President as aforesaid, or conducts it in a manner prejudicial to the public interest, then the President is hereby authorized and empowered in every such case to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances thereof belonging to such producer or dealer as a going concern, and to operate or cause the same to be operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct during the period of the war and one year thereafter, or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

While operating or causing to be operated any such plants or business, the President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same: Provided, That whenever any person or persons entitled to receive such wages are dissatisfied with the rate of wages so fixed by the President, he or they shall have the right to have the reasonableness of such wages reviewed and determined by the Board of Mediation and Conciliation created by the act approved July 15 1913, and the findings of said board fixing the rate of wages shall be conclusive in the premises, and said board shall prescribe rules and regulations for carrying this proviso into effect.

That if the prices so fixed, or if, in the case of the taking over or requisitioning of the mines or business of any such producer or dealer, the compensation or damages fixed be not satisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall be paid the amount prescribed by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such other sum as, added to the amount so paid, will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

That any producer or dealer whose plant, business, and appurtenances shall have been requisitioned or taken over by the President shall be paid a fair and reasonable compensation for the use thereof or for damages incurred thereby during the period that the same may be requisitioned or taken over as aforesaid, which compensation and damages the President shall fix or cause to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission or such other agent or agencies as he may designate.

Or if the President of the United States shall be of the opinion that he can hereby better provide for the common defense, and whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, then he is hereby authorized and empowered to require any or all producers of coal and coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their products only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke, and the prices thereof, and to fix the compensation to be paid such producers by the United States, and to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the methods of production, transportation, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic or foreign, and to make payment of the purchase price thereof to the producers thereof, or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment.

That within 15 days after notice from the agencies so designated to any producer of coal and coke that his or its output is to be so purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described, such producer shall cease shipments of said product upon his own account and shall transmit to such agency all orders received and unfilled or partially unfilled, showing the exact extent to which shipments have been made therein, and thereafter all shipments shall be made only on authority of the agency designated by the President, and thereafter no such producer shall sell any of said products except to the United States through such agency, and the said agency alone is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase during the continuance of the requirement the output of such producers.

That the prices to be paid for such products so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit over and above the cost of production, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profits and cost of production to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission, and if the prices fixed by the said commission of any such product purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described be unsatisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall have the right to sue the United States in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code, to recover such other sum as added to the amount so fixed will be just compensation. All such products so sold to the United States shall be sold by the United States at such uniform prices, quality considered, as may be practicable and as may be determined by said agency to be just and fair.

Any moneys received by the United States for the sale of any such coal and coke may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any moneys not so used shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

That when directed by the President, the Federal Trade Commission is hereby required to proceed immediately with all possible dispatch to make full inquiry giving such notice as it may deem practicable into the cost of producing under reasonable efficient management at the various places of production the following commodities, to wit, coal and coke.

The books, correspondence, records, and papers in anyway referring to transactions of any kind relating to the mining, production, sale, or distribution of all mine operators or other persons whose coal and coke have or may become subject to this section, and the books, correspondence, records, and papers of any person applying for the purchase of coal and coke from the United States shall at all times be subject to inspection by the said agency, and such person or persons shall promptly furnish said agency any data or information relating to the business of such person or persons which said agency may call for, and said agency is hereby authorized to procure the information in reference to the business of such coal-mine operators and producers of coke and customers therefor in the manner provided for in sections 6 and 9 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," and said agency is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by said act for the carrying out of the purposes of this section.

Having completed its inquiry respecting any commodity in any locality it shall, if the President has decided to fix the prices at which any such commodity shall be sold by producers and dealers generally, fix and publish maximum prices for both producers of and dealers in any such commodity, which maximum prices shall be observed by all producers and dealers until further action thereon is taken by the commission.

In fixing maximum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

In fixing such prices for dealers, the commission shall allow the cost to the dealer and shall add thereto a just and reasonable sum for his services in the transaction. There shall be but one such dealer between the producer and consumer or user.

The maximum prices so fixed and published shall not be construed as invalidating any contract in which prices are fixed, made in good faith, prior to the establishment and publication of maximum prices by the commission.

Whoever shall, with knowledge that the prices of any such commodity have been so fixed by the commission, ask, demand, or receive a higher price in violation of this section, shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine or not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than three years, or both. Each independent transaction shall constitute a separate offense.

Nothing in this section shall be construed as restricting or modifying in any manner the right the Government of the United States may have in its own behalf or in behalf of any other government at war with Germany to purchase, requisition, or take over any such commodities for the equipment, maintenance, or support of armed forces at any price or upon any terms that may be agreed upon or otherwise lawfully determined.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to move an amendment——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that no amendments are in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ruling on the unanimous-consent agreement. Senators have had since 10 o'clock Thursday to fix this record for voting at this time. The Chair rules that no further amendments are in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the ruling of the Chair is sustained.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. PENROSE. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the point of order that unanimous consent is not in order. We have a unanimous-consent agreement——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; it is in order. The Senator from Nebraska is proceeding strictly in accordance with the order, which provides that except by unanimous consent an amendment can not be introduced.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Chair is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and am unable to get a transfer. As I do not know how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], who is absent. I am unable to make a transfer of the pair, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Because of my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is necessarily absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY], and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN. Under that transfer I am at liberty to vote. I vote "ye..."

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—72.

So Mr. POMERENE's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I call up my amendment, which is on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

There is hereby authorized and established a court to be known as the "official court," to consist of one judge for each judicial circuit of the United States, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the terms of said judges at the beginning of the service to be from one to nine years, respectively, to be determined by lot, and thereafter each successor shall hold for the term of nine years unless sooner removed for cause by the President.

The salary of such judge shall be $6,000 annually.

The judge of the official court shall have jurisdiction over every case of malfeasance, misfeasance, nonfeasance, or neglect of duty in office of any employee, adviser, committeeman, or officer appointed under the authority of the United States except members of the President's Cabinet and Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, with power to issue summons for witnesses, to require the production of evidence, to punish for contempt and render judgment on questions involving official misconduct, and issue writs necessary to carry out the authority herein given. The marshal of the United States District Court shall serve the writs of the judges of the official court.

Any person, natural or corporate, upon filing bonds for the costs of the suit shall have the right to enter a complaint against any such employee of the United States for malfeasance, misfeasance, nonfeasance, or serious neglect of official duty. The judge of the official court shall impose a fine not exceeding $5,000 upon the complainant where the complaint is frivolous or insincere. The costs of the proceeding shall fall upon the complainant if not sustained, and upon the defendant if sustained.

Upon such complaint being filed, the judge within whose circuit such complaint is made shall immediately require the evidence to be submitted orally and recorded or by depositions within 10 days from the date of the filing of the complaint, except upon special order where compliance is impossible, and within 10 days from receiving such evidence the judge shall make his findings.

There is hereby authorized an appellate official court to consist of three justices to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The appellate official court shall make rules and regulations and determine forms of procedure for the official court and for appeals therefrom; shall have power to issue such writs as may be necessary to exercise its jurisdiction; and shall sit in Washington City, D. C.

All appeals to the appellate official court shall be made within five days from date of the publication of the judgment of the judge of the official court and shall be passed upon within 30 days of the receipt thereof.

The appellate official court justices shall hold office for a period of nine years, one for three years, one for six years, and one for nine years, to be determined by lot, and thereafter each justice shall be appointed for a term of nine years and shall have original jurisdiction over cases arising in the District of Columbia.

The appellate justices shall receive a salary of $7,500 annually.

In the event of a final judgment by the official court against an employee or officer of the United States, he shall have the option of resigning within five days of the rendition of the final judgment. In the event his resignation is not submitted, the office shall be declared vacant and filled by a new incumbent.

The dismissal from office under the proceedings herein authorized shall not preclude a trial or conviction under the criminal code where a violation of the statutes is exposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to the section relating to requisition on page 10, line 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 22, after the word "therefor," it is proposed to insert:

In determining the compensation to be paid for farm products all labor employed in producing the same, whether furnished by the farmer or members of his family, including the necessary domestic service, shall be computed and allowed for at the same rate of wages paid for like labor, or labor requiring a like degree of intelligence and arduous efforts, in other lines of business or trade; and in addition thereto there shall be allowed as a charge in the cost of production a reasonable rate of interest upon the capital invested in both real and personal estate and a further reasonable charge for deterioration and upkeep, including taxes and other necessary expenses. There shall also be taken into consideration the increased cost to the farmer of all necessary farm equipment, food, and clothing required, and other advanced cost in the ordinary necessaries of life.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I withdraw this amendment at the present time. I was laboring under the impression that we were in the Senate and out of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That a joint committee shall be appointed composed of five Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and two Republicans, and five Members of the House of Representatives, including three Democrats and two Republicans, to be known as the joint committee on the conduct of the war. The membership of such committee shall be designated by the respective committees of the Senate and House which select the members of the regular standing committees. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress, shall make a special study of the problems arising out of the war, including safeguarding expenditures, shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war, and shall make report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress. Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary, and, to pay the necessary expenses of such committee, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I offer the following substitute in lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is this an amendment offered prior to 2 o'clock yesterday?

Mr. OWEN. It is a substitute for the amendment now offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is not answering the inquiry of the Chair. Was it submitted prior to 2 o'clock yesterday?

Mr. OWEN. It was not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules it out of order, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent to offer it as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I have offered and to amend it myself by offering this as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none.

Mr. TILLMAN. I object.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent to offer it as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair heard no objection and rules that it can be submitted.

Mr. WEEKS. What is the ruling of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair inquired whether there was any objection to the Senator from Oklahoma offering his substitute. The Chair heard no objection, and he said he heard none. Afterwards there was objection, but it comes too late. Senators must speak up. The Secretary will read the substitute submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 23. A joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be appointed, composed of five Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and two Republicans, and five Members of the House of Representatives, including three Democrats and two Republicans, to be known as "the joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war."

It shall be the duty of said committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive departments, and it shall be the duty of the executive departments, on request, to keep said committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.

Such committee shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war, with a view to safeguarding expenditures, and shall report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion, or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress.

The membership of such committee shall be designated by the respective committees of the Senate and House which select the members of the regular standing committees.

Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise, and to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary; and to pay the necessary expenses of such committee there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

Mr. WEEKS. The substitute is entirely satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS].

Mr. WEEKS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Again I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent, and withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. Being unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name as called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—53.

So Mr. OWEN's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry. Did I understand in the opinion of the Chair that none of the amendments proposed by Senators could be amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The opinion of the Chair was sustained by the Senate that any amendment which has not heretofore been offered can not now be offered except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; I thoroughly agree with that, but my inquiry was if a Senator offers an amendment which he proposed before 2 o'clock yesterday afternoon, is it not subject to amendment by another Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not, for——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Chair pardon me for a minute while I call attention to the unanimous-consent agreement?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair read it and ruled on it, and the Senate indorsed his ruling.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well; I did not know that. I was not present.

Mr. KENYON. I offer a new section to come in at the end of the bill, and I ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add to the bill as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than three years: Provided, That any storing or holding by any farmer, gardener, or other person of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act: Provided further, That farmers and fruit growers, cooperative and other exchanges, or societies of a similar character shall not be included within the provisions of this section: And provided further, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit the acquiring, storing, or holding of such articles for future sale for such advanced price as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to repeal the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON]. [Putting the question.]

Mr. KENYON. I will ask for the yeas and nays if there is any question about it. The Senate has adopted the amendment before on another bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I may accept it I do so. It is exactly the same as the former amendment, which was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decides that the amendment is carried. It is agreed to.

Mr. HOLLIS. I send to the desk an amendment proposed before 2 o'clock yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restrains and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TILLMAN. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the President is authorized and directed to procure, or aid in procuring, such stocks of nitrate of soda as he may determine to be necessary, and find available, for increasing agricultural production during the calendar years 1917 and 1918, and to dispose of the same at cost, payable in advance. For carrying out the purposes of this resolution, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations, and to use such means and agencies of the Government, as, in his discretion, he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I again withhold my vote, having a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair, as before, with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], and being unable to obtain a transfer I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 50, nays 29, as follows:

YEAS—50.

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Kellogg	Poindexter	Stone
Beckham	Kendrick	Pomerene	Sutherland
Broussard	King	Ransdell	Thompson

So Mr. TILLMAN's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I now offer the amendment which I presented day before yesterday. I move to amend by adding to section 11 what I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asks the Senator from Minnesota if this is an amendment that might be offered in the Senate but not as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. NELSON. No; I offered the amendment day before yesterday with a view of offering it as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 11, the following:

That any building or room occupied or used by a board of trade, chamber of commerce, grain exchange, or otherwise, in which wheat or other food cereals are bought or sold for present or future delivery shall, for the purpose of this act, be known as a grain exchange.

All persons engaged in buying or selling in interstate or foreign commerce, for present or future delivery, any wheat or other food cereal, in or about any such grain exchange, shall be known and designated as traders in grain.

All sales of wheat or other food cereals by such traders in such exchanges for future delivery, and not for present or immediate delivery, shall be known and designated as dealings in futures.

If at any time during the pendency of the existing war between the United States and the German Empire the President of the United States shall find that such dealings in futures, in or about any grain exchange, unduly or unreasonably raise or enhance the price of wheat or other food cereals, to the injury of the people of the United States, he may at once request the traders in such exchange to discontinue for a time specified by him all dealings in futures. In case such request of the President is not promptly complied with, then he is hereby empowered to order such dealing in futures, as last aforesaid, to be entirely suspended and discontinued for such limited time as he may direct, and if such order is not promptly complied with he may by proclamation declare such exchange closed, and thereafter it shall be unlawful to utilize or permit to be utilized such building or room as a grain exchange or for any person, being a trader in grain on such exchange, to engage in the business theretofore conducted on or at such closed exchange.

Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to ask if the amendment which has just been read is the same provision which passed the Senate some time ago and is now in conference? If it is, I am perfectly willing, so far as I can, to accept it.

Mr. NELSON. It is identically the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I reserve the right to offer an amendment to section 8 when we get into the Senate. I forgot to offer my amendment to extend the time of guaranty from January to July. Section 8 having been adopted, I now reserve the right of a vote on that amendment in the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further pending amendments?

Mr. STONE. I have an amendment pending, which I offer at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

SEC. —. That the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to aid in the support and proper maintenance of educational sanitariums or other like institutions organized for the care and industrial education of soldiers and sailors of the United States who have been crippled or disabled as a result of injuries received in the line of duty. The President is hereby authorized and empowered to distribute said funds hereby appropriated to such sanitariums or other like institutions in such amounts and in such manner as in his judgment will best promote the purposes for which this appropriation is made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there any further pending amendments? If there be no further pending amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certain amendments which were made as in Committee of the Whole have been reserved for a separate vote in the Senate. The question, therefore, will be, first, on concurring in all of the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole which were not reserved: [A pause.] They are concurred in without objection. Sections 1, 5, 8, 9, and 12 have been reserved for separate votes in the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the substitute for the bill which I presented on July 11. Seven of the eight principal points involved in that substitute have been transferred into the pending bill upon the installment plan. I therefore withdraw the substitute, and I will further state in the RECORD my reasons for doing so.

I ask unanimous consent to move to strike out section 10 of the pending bill. I do so in order that the matter may go into conference. I do not think it is as good as the existing law on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to unanimous consent for the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I object to striking out any portion of section 10.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The question now is——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on page 11, line 20, I offered an amendment to the bill yesterday, on which I ask for action.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 20, after the word "prices," it is proposed to insert the words "for cash."

Mr. GORE. That amendment conforms to the provision passed here on June 1.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May we have the amendment stated, Mr. President?

Mr. GORE. I do not ask for the yeas and nays. Let us have the question again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be again stated. There is a misapprehension in regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "prices" it is proposed to insert the words "for cash."

Mr. ROBINSON. On what page and line?

Mr. PENROSE. How would it read?

The SECRETARY. If amended as proposed, section 9 would read:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized, from time to time, in order to guarantee reasonable prices to the producer and to the consumer, to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell at reasonable prices for cash.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on concurring in section 9 as amended as in Committee of the Whole.

Section 9 as amended in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There are certain reserved sections from the Committee of the Whole that should now be disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senate act on the amendment which I offered to section 8, to come in on page 10, line 22, which was reserved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 22, after the word "therefor," it is proposed to insert the following:

In determining the compensation to be paid for farm products all labor employed in producing the same, whether furnished by the farmer or members of his family, including the necessary domestic service, shall be computed and allowed for at the same rate of wages paid for like labor, or labor requiring a like degree of intelligence and arduous efforts, in other lines of business or trade; and in addition thereto there shall be allowed as a charge in the cost of production a reasonable rate of interest upon the capital invested in both real and personal estate and a further reasonable charge for deterioration and upkeep. There shall also be taken into consideration the increased cost to the farmer of all necessary farm equipment, food and clothing required, and other advanced cost in the ordinary necessaries of life.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on concurring in section 8 as amended as in Committee of the Whole.

Section 8 as amended as in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 12 was reserved for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I now offer the amendment to section 12 to strike out "January" and insert "July," so as to extend it to the crop year. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether that will be acceptable to him? I understand there is really no objection to it.

Mr. PAGE. I object to that amendment being accepted without a vote.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The amendment is pending. The amendment was printed yesterday, and I gave notice that I would offer it. It is designed to prevent wheat being crowded on the market before January by extending the date to the crop year.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is voting on amendments, and not discussing questions. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I reserved the right to have a separate vote on the amendment providing that there shall be one administrator instead of a commission of three. I should like to have that amendment now submitted to a vote of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator offer that as an amendment prior to 2 o'clock on yesterday?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; that amendment was voted upon as in Committee of the Whole and voted down.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course it was, and, having been voted down, it could not be reserved for a vote in the Senate. Only a question that is voted upon can be reserved for a separate vote in the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I reserved the right this morning, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING], I believe, also reserved the right on yesterday.

Mr. PENROSE. Regular order!

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Question!

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I want to say that I reserved the amendment, and also offered it before 2 o'clock yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the amendment has been offered, it may be presented.

Mr. HUSTING. I send the amendment to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the so-called Chamberlain amendment to section 12, on page 2, line 18, it is proposed to strike out all after the words "he is further authorized and directed to appoint," and insert "a food administrator at an annual salary of $7,500, payable monthly, to perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct. Said food administrator shall hold office at the pleasure of the President during the continuance of the war."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. HUSTING. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PITTMAN. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent by reason of illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Myers	Shafroth
Borah	Kellogg	Newlands	Thompson

So Mr. HUSTING'S amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is in concurring in the section as amended as in Committee of the Whole.

The section as amended in Committee of the Whole was concurred in.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I desire a vote on my amendment to strike out the words "interstate or foreign commerce" in section 5 where they appear in the bill six times.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it an amendment to section 1?

Mr. THOMPSON. Section 5.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then we will concur in section 1, if there is no objection. [A pause.] It is concurred in. The Senator from Kansas proposes an amendment to section 5, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the words "interstate or foreign commerce" where they appear six times in the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment that I offered yesterday and reserved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 6, after the words "kerosene and gasoline," it is proposed to insert:

And such other things as the President, upon a finding that a necessity exists therefor, from time to time shall include by proclamation.

Mr. HUSTING. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE rose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further amendments that were reserved?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I rose to offer an amendment which I presented——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair means—amendments presented prior to 2 o'clock on yesterday.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I did not reserve it when the bill passed into the Senate. It was not voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what I supposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT (continuing). If the amendment was presented prior to 2 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I presented it with a motion for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY read as follows:

The following amendment is offered by Mr. LA FOLLETTE:

Whereas the Congress has provided by legislation already approved for control by authorizing the President to commandeer individual or separate railroad companies or organizations; and

Whereas the Congress has provided by legislation already approved for control by the Interstate Commerce Commission of railroad freight cars of all railroads and systems and for their operation as a unit, regardless of separate ownership; and

Whereas it is vitally important in the great emergency now confronting the country to exercise the same control over the motive power of the various railroad companies and systems of the country which led the Congress to give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to mobilize the freight cars of the country and handle the same as a unit: Now, therefore,

Be it enacted, That the following be added as a new section at the end of the bill:

"SEC. —. That the President is authorized, whenever in his judgment it is necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to direct that any or all railroads (not including street railroads), any or all vessels engaged in coastwise or inland lake or river trade, and any or all common carriers in the United States shall be operated as a unit on Government account under the direction and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission for such period as he may think proper, but not longer than the expiration of one year after the termination of the existing war, the date of such termination to be fixed by proclamation of the President. The United States shall make just compensation for any property or interest so taken, as follows:

"First. During such period the owner shall be paid quarterly a sum equivalent to one-quarter of the average annual net amount earned by such railroad, vessel, or common carrier during the 60 months prior to June 30, 1916, such average amount to be ascertained by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"Second. The owner, if not satisfied with the amount so paid, may sue the United States (in the manner provided by sec. 24, par. 20, and sec. 145 of the Judicial Code) to recover such further sum as, added to the amount so paid, will make up such amount as will be just compensation.

"All earnings from the operation of such railroads, vessels, and common carriers shall be covered into, and all operating expenses and fixed charges shall be paid out of, the Treasury on warrants of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"There is hereby permanently appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in addition to all other appropriations made by this act, a sum sufficient to carry out the purposes of this section."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 69, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Lewis	Sherman

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 5 will be concurred in without objection. Are there further amendments? [A pause.] The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. JAMES and Mr. SMITH of Georgia called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALDER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], but on this question I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he has a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and that if my colleague were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. PITTMAN (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). I desire to state that the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent on account of illness. If he were present he would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] is absent by reason of illness and that if present he would support this bill.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. We have arranged to transfer these pairs so that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] will stand paired, allowing the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and myself to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 81, nays 6, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint five conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. WARREN conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN subsequently said: Mr. President, I move that two additional members be added to the conference committee on the food-control bill, House bill 4961.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer (Mr. KING in the chair) appointed Mr. SMITH of Georgia and Mr. PAGE additional conferees on the part of the Senate.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR AVIATION.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the so-called aviation bill, House bill 5326.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5326) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read, and the pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. It will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 17, after the words "by voluntary enlistment," strike out the words "or by draft."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall not take any time to discuss the amendment; but bearing on the subject of the draft, on which the Senator from Georgia laid much stress some days ago, I send to the desk a short article and ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WHY WORRY ABOUT DRAFT?—GLANCE AT THIS.

ATLANTA, July 12.

Here is consolation for every man who has registered and expects to be drafted in the great war lottery this month. It comes from an Atlanta boy who has been on the firing line in France and knows what he is talking about:

You have two alternatives—either you are drafted or you are not. If not, you have nothing to worry about. If you are drafted, you have two alternatives—you are in camp or you are at the front. If you are in camp you have nothing to worry about. If you are at the front you have two alternatives—either you are held in reserve or you are sent to the firing line. If you are in reserve, you have nothing to worry about. If you are sent to the firing line, you have two alternatives—either you fight or you don't. If you don't, you have nothing to worry about. If you do, you have two alternatives—either you get hurt or you don't. If you don't, you have nothing to worry about. If you do get hurt, you have two alternatives—either you are slightly hurt or badly hurt. If slightly hurt, you have nothing to worry about. If badly hurt, you have two alternatives—either you recover or you don't. If you recover, you have nothing to worry about. If you don't recover, then you are dead and can't worry.

So what's the use of worrying about the draft? [Waycross Journal-Herald.]

[Laughter.]

Mr. CURTIS. Was unanimous consent asked for the reading of the article at the desk? If so, I wish to object. I think it is rather grim humor, and it should not be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was asked, and, no one objecting, it was read at the desk. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word upon the amendment of the Senator from Georgia to strike out of this bill the draft provision. I trust that this amendment shall prevail. I believe, in the first place, that this war ought to be prosecuted without a resort to the draft at all. Any war a democracy prosecutes ought to be prosecuted without a resort to draft. Democracy ought never to enter upon a war that it can not prosecute by volunteers.

To employ the draft is to confess that the war lacks enthusiastic and whole-hearted support by the people. A democracy should not enter upon any undertaking that has not the support of the people.

In the United States the draft should never be resorted to unless it be to use an army within the borders of our own country to preserve the country. The United States should never attempt to raise by draft a force for over-sea service. I will not at this time enter upon any lengthy discussion to demonstrate that there is no authority in the Constitution to raise an army by draft and send them across the seas into foreign lands, there to engage in military operations which do not involve protection of the lives or property or rights of the citizens in this country.

My views with respect to this question are well known to the Senate. Believing it unconstitutional to draft any army for foreign service, I can not support a provision that would draft any part of such an army.

Furthermore, Mr. President, this particular service is a service to which men ought always to volunteer, or they ought never to be employed in it. It is a service which calls for special and particular qualifications, a service that depends for its efficiency upon temperamental qualities. Men for the aviation service—for submarine service, as well—ought to be secured by voluntary offering. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that they can be secured. Indeed, since this bill was called up here the other day I have had a communication from Mr. Earl Hamilton Smith, the secretary of the National Aerial Coast Patrol Commission, in which it is set forth that there is already a longer list of voluntary offerings for this particular service than the Army and Navy have found it possible to handle.

There are from five to ten times as many applicants as there are places to fill whenever there is a call for flying students, so there exists no necessity to impress men into this service.

So, Mr. President, believing, as I do, that the draft in itself is un-American, that it is undemocratic, that it ought never to have been employed in this war at all, and that especially it ought not to be a part of this legislation, I sincerely hope that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the draft has become the established policy of the Government. So I do not think the draft as a concrete question ought to enter into this proposition. It does not seem to me, however, that it makes a great deal of difference whether the amendment is adopted or not. An airplane crew consists of 11 men, usually one man who is the aviator and 10 men who remain on the ground, who are machinists, who are keeping the machine in condition.

It would be ridiculous to draft men to go into the air, and, as a matter of fact, it is not necessary, because there are a number of volunteers on hand greater than enough to supply all the machines we can build in the next year. It may be necessary to draft the machinists who are going to be employed in this service and become a part of the troops, and that is the only part, so far as I know, that could possibly be subject to draft.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WEEKS. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. That may be true from the Senator's standpoint; but we have already a provision to draft a million men, and they can be assigned to the Signal Corps under the draft already provided. Therefore from that standpoint there is no necessity for the clause I propose to strike out.

Mr. WEEKS. I said that I did not think it made much difference one way or another.

I wish to say one more word: I think it would have a salutary effect if this bill could be passed to-night. I think prompt action on this bill, which is likely to be more important in connection with closing the war than any other single measure, would have a very salutary effect.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator permit me to say that there is no disposition on the part of the mover of this amendment to delay the bill?

Mr. WEEKS. I understand that.

Mr. HARDWICK. We have been grossly slandered on that subject. If the Senators who are for the bill are ready to vote on the amendment, I think we can dispose of it in a very few minutes.

Mr. WEEKS. I agree with the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am exceedingly anxious that we shall dispose of the bill promptly and I do not believe there will be any difficulty in doing it. I believe it ought to be passed speedily. If it had not been for the food bill being in the way, it would have been passed long ago. If the committee had reported it out before the food bill was brought in, it would have been a law now.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia. I am not in favor of the amendment on the broad ground of the draft, although I voted against the so-called draft bill, but that was fought out and the draft has been adopted as the method of getting troops. So on that ground, while I would have favored it the other way if I had considered it an open question, yet I would not object to it if there was nothing else in it. But this is a proposition to draft men to fly in the air. From the very nature of things it can not be done. Those who are behind the bill say they will not attempt to draft anybody to operate a flying machine. If that is true, then they ought not to empower anybody to do the drafting. It seems to me that even if we did draft a man and put him on a machine when he flies out over the enemy or anywhere else he must necessarily in a sense be his own commander. He is really supreme. If he did not want to do any good, he could not be compelled to do any good. If he did not want to hit anybody, he could not be compelled to do it.

There will be plenty of men who are peculiarly fitted by disposition and otherwise to do this flying, and they are anxious to do it. They will volunteer. We can not make a success of aviation any other way, in my judgment. For that reason I believe they ought to be permitted to volunteer, and I am in favor, therefore, of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this provision is alternative. The President is given the power to take men by voluntary enlistment. I do not suppose there is the slightest question that he will take pilots and observers entirely by voluntary enlistment. It is not usual to draft men for any particular service; they are drafted for the Army. But here we are adding a large number of men, and the President ought to have the power to make an additional draft, if necessary, or to take them from men already drafted, who may be drafted into the Army now without this provision. I do not think he could use the drafted men who are already drafted, and he ought to have the power to assign them or to make a new draft if he needs them.

Nobody supposes for one moment that they are going to draft men to go up in the air to fight in the air. That will be a voluntary service, and there are an abundance of men who have already volunteered for that service.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I hope that this bill will be passed this afternoon. I shall, of course, vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. For the same reason stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I am from principle opposed to the draft provision.

Mr. President, when this bill was before the Senate the other day I had not had an opportunity to read the bill. I did not know that there was any such provision as a draft provision in the bill. I had talked to no one about the bill. I had never stated to anybody that I was opposed to the bill, and the gentleman who sent out broadcast over this country——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Associated Press.

Mr. GRONNA. The Associated Press that sent out the statement that I was opposed to this legislation and opposed to the appropriation of $640,000,000 stated an absolute, unqualified, deliberate, and malicious falsehood.

I do not suppose, Mr. President, that the genius who in the exuberance of his brain wrote that article and that falsehood has the manhood to print and give publicity in the same manner to my statement to-day that he did the other day in charging me with a falsehood; but, Mr. President, I want the RECORD to show that I had not talked to a single Member of this body nor had a single Member of this body said anything to me about the aviation bill.

I have repeatedly stated that I shall be glad to vote for any appropriation recommended by the Chief Executive of this Nation to mobilize all the energies of this country in order to be able to successfully prosecute the war and to end it as speedily as possible for a just and lasting peace.

Mr. President, there is no reason why I should oppose this bill, and I want to say for the benefit of the press that that lying, insinuating falsehood which appeared in the press has not changed my position. I would have voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia without the comment of that man, if I may call him a man. I should have voted for the Hardwick amendment and I should have been glad to vote for the $640,000,000 appropriation, and I shall be glad to vote for $1,640,000,000 if the President shall ask for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not going to stand more than a moment of time between the Senate and its desire to vote. I just want to say one word in reply to the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the effect that the draft is a part of the military system of the United States.

The draft is not a part of the military system of the United States. We have a draft law. That law in its first paragraph says "That in view of the existing emergency," so this law was enacted to meet the present emergency. It will die with the passing of that emergency. It is no part of the permanent military policy of the United States. It would not have been enacted if it was proposed to make it part of our permanent military law. It is an unwise, an unnecessary, and, in my opinion, an unconstitutional and un-American enactment that will be quickly repudiated by the people and repealed by Congress.

I want to say that I shall stand for a repeal of the draft law. I shall offer upon this floor a proposition to repeal it, and I shall fight for its repeal, confident that the American people will compel their representatives to wipe that law off the statutes.

I say, furthermore, that the repeal of that law will be an issue which will go to the people of this country in the next election. It will be an issue that will be carried into every State and into every congressional district. Mr. President, I venture to predict that 90 per cent of the people of the United States will record their verdict at the ballot box against this un-American system when they shall have opportunity to express their judgment upon this issue.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] and vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has not voted. Therefore I transfer my general pair with him to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. If the Senator from Rhode Island were present, he would vote "nay." I therefore permit my vote in the negative to stand.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is unavoidably absent on important business. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 66, as follows:

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 9 it is proposed to insert the following:

There is hereby created, to serve during the existing emergency, for the purpose of coordinating the industrial activities relating to aircraft for the Army and Navy, the aircraft production board, hereinafter called the board. The board shall be appointed by and under the supervision and control of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, and exercise its functions with respect to the requirements of the Army under the direction of the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, and with respect to the requirements of the Navy under the direction of the Chief Constructor of the Navy, both of whom shall be members of the board. Vacancies on the board shall be filled by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy.

The board shall have power on behalf of the respective departments of the Government, and under the direction and control of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, to supervise and direct the purchase, production, and manufacture of airplanes, engines, and all ordnance and instruments in connection therewith, and accessories and materials therefor, including the purchase, lease, acquisition, or construction of plants for the manufacture of airplanes, engines, and accessories, and provided that moneys allotted for any such purpose shall not be subject to the restrictions relating to advance payments.

The board may employ and fix the compensation of such clerks and other employees, including special technical experts and advisers, as it may deem essential to its work.

The board may also rent suitable offices for its use in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, and may purchase necessary equipment and supplies, including scientific publications, and procure necessary printing.

The expenses of the board shall be paid out of any money appropriated by this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add the following as section 11:

That in the execution of the selective draft authorized by the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," all aliens resident in the United States for more than one year, exclusive of alien enemies and alien subjects of any country allied with the enemy country who have not declared their intention to become citizens, shall be subject to be drafted for military service upon the same terms and under the same conditions as citizens of the United States: Provided, That aliens who are subjects of countries with which the United States has treaties exempting its subjects from compulsory or other military service shall be exempt from the draft upon the application of the diplomatic representative of such country: Provided further, That aliens who claim such exemption shall be allowed to depart from the United States within 90 days from the date of the allowance of their claim for exemption or shall be deported if remaining within the United States beyond said time.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the selective draft put into effect yesterday was based presumably upon the population of the country. The report of the Secretary of Commerce sent to the Senate recently states, in substance, that he based the population of the different States on the total registration for the draft. An examination of the registration figures will show that, while the total registration throughout the country was 9,666,078, the alien registration was something over 1,000,000, all of whom are exempt under the law. The aliens in some communities greatly outnumber the citizens of the United States, thus rendering the draft to a very large degree exceedingly unfair.

I note that in Arizona, for instance, 40 per cent of the total number registered are aliens, so that the citizens of that State will be compelled to bear an unusual burden. In Connecticut the alien registration was 37 per cent; in Nevada, 31 per cent; in New Hampshire, 25 per cent; in Rhode Island, 28 per cent; and in New York, 24 per cent; while in South Carolina it was three-tenths of 1 per cent; in Arkansas, four-tenths of 1 per cent; and in Tennessee, five-tenths of 1 per cent of the total registration. The proportion of men required to be taken from States with a large alien registration will be in some cases nearly double the proportion taken from other States.

The subject has been discussed a great deal in this Chamber and in the newspapers. I do not think we can afford to have it said throughout the country that one part of the Nation has been compelled to bear an unusual burden as against other sections. If this is a just measure, then the citizens of Connecticut, Arizona, and New York should be asked to contribute exactly the same as the citizens of Arkansas, South Carolina, and Mississippi.

This amendment is the same as the joint resolution prepared and introduced as a separate measure by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I see no better place for it to be enacted than right here in connection with the pending measure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I stated the other day that the Military Committee had reported the pending bill without amendment, hoping that it might become a law immediately. There were provisions in the bill as it came to us that were not satisfactory to some members of the committee, but all of them waived their objections to the end that the bill might receive immediate attention. It was hoped at that time that it might pass the Senate at once. It has been delayed a day or two, but I hope it will be passed to-night and passed in such shape as to become a law immediately. I hope it will not have to be sent back to the House of Representatives, and any amendment, however meritorious, will force the return of the bill to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And the return of absent Members to the House.

Mr. REED. And possibly the return of Members to the House, as the Senator from Michigan suggests.

Now, let me read this little item from the Evening Star:

GERMANY BUILDING MANY AIRPLANES TO FIGHT UNITED STATES—MANUFACTURE OF ZEPPELINS IS REPORTED PRACTICALLY TO HAVE BEEN ABANDONED.

GENEVA, July 20.

Reliable reports from Romanshorn say that airplanes of the latest models manufactured at the Zeppelin factory at Friedrichshafen daily are to be seen flying over Lake Constance.

The reports add that the cessation of the manufacture of Zeppelins was due to the fact that German headquarters became convinced that Zeppelins were of little war value and that supremacy in the air in the future belonged to airplanes. The Germans also are said to fear an extensive American aerial program, and that therefore counter aerial preparations have been started by them. It is stated that the workmen in all the Zeppelin factories in Germany have been doubled in number, and that the airships on hand have been removed to unused sheds.

Let us take a lesson from this news. Let us lose no time. Germany is at work. Let us get into action.

Mr. President, I am heartily in accord with many provisions embodied in the amendment which has been offered. I should also have liked to have seen the word "draft" taken out of this bill. I voted against that amendment, however, because I hoped the bill might become a law to-night, without going back to the House. I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, because I want to see this bill become a law to-night.

We may be divided in regard to the regulation of food; we may differ over internal affairs; but I know that the Senate of the United States is not divided in its desire to strengthen the war front. At the battle line we are all agreed that strength should be added to strength so that victory may be assured.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I am in hearty sympathy with the principal object sought to be attained by the amendment introduced by my colleague, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the second proviso which appears upon page 2 of the printed amendment, and which reads:

Provided further, That aliens who claim such exemption shall be allowed to depart from the United States within 90 days from the date of the allowance of their claim for exemption or shall be deported if remaining within the United States beyond said time.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that is a very remarkable provision. The body of the amendment provides necessarily that an alien being a citizen of a country with which this Government has a treaty which would exempt that alien from compulsory or other military service in the United States, may, when requested by the diplomatic officers of that Government, be exempted from the draft; in other words, the Congress very properly recognizes, or proposes to recognize, in this amendment the treaty rights of a foreign nation, and that its citizens in this country shall receive whatever benefit or protection they are entitled to receive under that country's treaty with us. Then, having made that allowance, the amendment proceeds to say that if any country with which we have such a treaty invokes its provisions in protection of its own citizens, those citizens must leave this country within 90 days.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. All of those things illustrate the fact that it is impossible to dispose of this kind of a proposition with the limited debate which it is possible to give it unless we are going to delay this bill; and certainly we are not going to enter into all of these questions of our relationship with foreign powers under treaties in 10 or 15 minutes' debate here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I simply desire to take just a moment to say that I am in complete sympathy with the body of this amendment, but that the second proviso is the most unfair thing, and, in my humble judgment, would be in violation of the very treaties which the amendment seeks to abide by. May I say that there will be thousands of people——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire merely to say that some three or four days ago the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] offered a bill or joint resolution covering this same ground, at least in a general way, which was referred, at his request, to the Committee on Foreign Relations. As chairman of that committee, I have addressed a letter to the Secretary of State asking for information touching just such questions as the Senator from New York and others have been discussing, and which I have asked for the use of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I shall ask that committee to meet next week on the regular meeting day—at least, I have intended to do so—with a view of having the committee take up this subject and go over it with some degree of thoroughness, and report the result of their investigation to the Senate. I am a little afraid that we are not sufficiently informed to vote with adequate intelligence upon this question at this time. I confess that I am not. I hardly know how to vote at this moment, although in a general way my sympathy runs in favor of the amendment. I do not like the idea of a million men helping the enemy of the United States in the way the junior Senator from New York has suggested, and about which we have had more or less general information; but I rather think that it would be unwise, as the Senator from Idaho said, to incorporate a provision of this kind in this bill without fuller investigation into it and after a more thorough discussion of it than can be had to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I intended to conclude my remarks in just a moment. If the Senator wants to ask a question at this point, however, I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I just wanted to suggest to the Senator that the resolution which the Senator offers as an amendment is very similar to one I introduced in the Senate the other day, and it has been referred; and it, too, has been taken up with the State Department and the War Department, because as far as possible we want their advice, whether we act on it or not, so far as our international relationships are concerned. I do hope the Senator from New York will withdraw the amendment. We will be able to report it out of one of the committees very promptly, and the Senate will have an opportunity to act on it as an independent measure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that I am not asking my colleague to withdraw this amendment. I wanted to call his attention and the attention of the Senate to the second proviso, which will operate to send out of the United States any alien whose home Government invokes a treaty right for his protection, which is an astounding proposal.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator withdraw that amendment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the views expressed by the Senator from New York; and I think that the exclusion from the draft of the alien citizens of powers with which we are at peace was a great blunder in the drafting and passage of the draft law.

I have not the slightest wish to delay action upon the aviation bill. Indeed, I am very anxious to get it. I had not supposed, however, that the attaching to the bill of this resolution which the Senator from Oregon had drafted and introduced and had referred would result in any delay which would be serious, because I assumed that the conferees could report back Monday, and I think they could.

But I do not want to obtrude this question, as far as I am concerned, upon the Senate to-night if they would prefer to pass this bill as it is without amendment; and I will say that I am withholding another very important amendment which I had intended to propose to the bill, hoping perhaps to offer it as a joint resolution and get consent to consider it at some other time.

The only thing I want is to be assured that some action can be taken by this Congress so that aliens may be required to do their share in this war in time to affect the present draft. When Senators say that the whole thing can be corrected in the next draft that is made, that may correct it so far as the country and so far as the mass of the people in States are concerned, if we can give them credit for the extra number that they sent in this draft over what they ought to have sent if it had been based upon population; but that is very poor consolation to the poor devil who has been drafted and sent to the front and killed when he would not have been drafted if the population of his State had been correctly estimated. That can not be corrected.

I have been told by a high official of the Government, who I think is as familiar with this draft and its regulations and the system upon which it proceeds as anybody in the departments, that the correction of that error in our draft, to wit, the inclusion of these aliens, would not delay this draft one day; that it is a mere matter of a short mathematical problem in the department down here, and that the people at home, the governors of the States who are to apply the draft law, would not be delayed at all; so that it can not be said that the attempt to correct this manifest error is to delay the raising of the army at all. If it did that, I would not propose it or advocate it.

I wanted to ask the Senator from New York who offers this amendment, which possibly needs some further consideration and amendment, whether he does not think it is possible that we could get unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the resolution introduced by the Senator from Oregon on Monday morning?

Mr. PENROSE. It has not been reported yet.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know it has not been reported, Mr. President, but we have put on to the food-control bill, on the floor of the Senate, many amendments a great deal more complicated than this one, and every Senator is more or less familiar with this proposition.

I should like to see some date agreed upon. If we are going to pass the aviation bill here within five minutes now, and then somebody is going to move to proceed to take up the river and harbor bill, and so forth, or some other bill that will block consideration of this, I should regret it exceedingly. I hope that some arrangement can be made whereby we can proceed at a very early date with this amendment which the Senator has offered.

Mr. CALDER and Mr. LODGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, it is over a month ago since I called the attention of the Senate to the inequalities of this selective draft. We consumed an hour one morning discussing the very phase which is now presented to the Senate. Several weeks ago I again called it to the attention of the Senate. At that time I asked the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to prepare a measure that would result in every State being treated justly. Subsequently, I prepared a bill myself to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs and up until this day it has not received attention at their hands. The Senator from Oregon prepared the very resolution which I offered as an amendment here to-day. It seemed to cover the ground better than mine, and I was very glad to favor it, as I told him at the time.

Now, I do not want to delay action on this bill. If we can pass it to-day without amendment and have it go to the President to-night, much good will be done by it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me, I am very much interested in the suggestions which he has made. My State has been very seriously affected by the situation which is described by the Senator from New York. In the city of Detroit the registration is so disproportionate to the actual population subject to draft as to make that city a city of a million and a half people. This rule that has been applied, and the manner of its application, bears very heavily upon communities that are growing as fast—if there are any others—as the city of Detroit.

I am very greatly interested in the passage of some bill which will effect the purpose which the Senator from New York has in mind; but, important as it is to my State and to the first city in my State, I would not delay for a single moment the passage of the bill now pending if I had the power to put it upon its way.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, before taking my seat I should like to obtain, if possible, an understanding with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, that his committee will consider this matter next week and report it to the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have no objection to promising to take it up at the earliest possible moment. I assure the Senator that I am thoroughly in favor of it, and, in fact, I wrote one exactly like it, or almost exactly like it, and have taken it up with the departments. As soon as I hear from them I am going to ask the Military Affairs Committee to consider it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to yield to me before withdrawing the amendment, because I have a word to say.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor. I have made about six efforts to get the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Now that I am recognized, I should like to say what I have to say. It will take me but a moment.

I am very deeply interested in this matter. I think our first duty is to pass the aviation bill without amendment, and therefore I am very glad the Senator from New York has withdrawn his amendment. I am sure that the Foreign Relations Committee will take action on this matter at the earliest possible moment. If they do not, I know the Military Affairs Committee will. It is of the very utmost importance. And before I sit down I should like to say to the senior Senator from New York that one of the most important things is that last clause, because it enables these other countries whose men are here—escaping service there—to get them back if they desire, and it is the only way in which we can do it. They may not want them to enlist in our Army, but it does prevent their remaining here and avoiding service in any country.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am so deeply interested in the aviation bill that I would do nothing to delay its passage for a moment; but I simply rose to state that I hope the Military Affairs Committee will report at the very earliest possible day upon the bill that it has before it on this same subject. It ought to pass Congress and become a law before the final selection of the men that were drawn yesterday for the first draft.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before the exemptions are applied?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; before any exemptions are applied.

I have a telegram, Mr. President, signed by every citizen of Brigham, Utah—including, of course, all of the business men that are in the city and without—touching this very subject and asking for immediate legislation. The telegram is as follows:

Draft from our district based on registration 75 per cent of which times: Red Cross donations double our quota. Aliens, being exempt, two or three of our American boys must answer the call as against one in communities largely American. Enlistments from Brigham have been 50 per cent beyond our quota; liberty bonds oversubscribed three times; Red Cross donations double our quota. Aliens, being exempt, will fill positions left by American boys, and many of these aliens have been called to their native countries and refused to go. Can you not have quota reduced in proportion to American population or have aliens included in draft?

Mr. President, I think that legislation ought to pass, and pass just as soon as it can possibly go through Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 4285, the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that the Senator does not intend to enter upon the consideration of that bill to-night.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I simply desire to have it made the unfinished business. I do not expect to proceed with its consideration to-night.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, does the Senator ask unanimous consent to take up the river and harbor bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I made a motion to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is that a debatable motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to have that bill made the unfinished business this evening, and if the Senator urges it we will stay here and discuss it.

There are a great many things in the bill which possibly ought to have the consideration of the Senate, but there are very many things in it which if properly considered by the Senate, in my judgment, would be rejected. To bring the bill forward at this time and hasten it here as the unfinished business this afternoon is simply to put it through without giving the Senate any opportunity whatever to study the merits or demerits of the bill. We have been engaged for the last six weeks in the consideration of the food bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state to the Senator that it was not my purpose to proceed with the consideration of the bill this afternoon.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest to the Senator to give us until Monday morning to have an opportunity to go through the bill and see whether we want it made the unfinished business at all or not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course this bill has been here, having been reported on the 9th of July. I think Senators have had plenty of opportunity to examine it.

Mr. CURTIS. Senators have been busy and they have not had time to read the bill.

Mr. BORAH. We have not had any opportunity to read the bill, and I do not regard it as a war measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is just about as near a war measure as anything can be. I do not know anything better or more appropriate as a war measure than a bill to take care of our rivers and harbors that need improvement.

Mr. BORAH. There is one thing very certain about it, and that is that a river and harbor bill is no different in war than it is in peace; it is a river and harbor bill, and I——

Mr. FLETCHER. I differ from the Senator.

Mr. STONE rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. Senators desiring to interrupt him must address the Chair.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BORAH. I move an executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Saturday, July 21, 1917), the Senate adjourned until Monday, July 23, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 21, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice, and who crownest Thy children with loving kindness, to Thee we lift up our hearts in love and gratitude.

Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord, and the people whom He hath chosen for His own inheritance.

When we remember through what dangers, trials, and tribulations Thou hast brought us as a people and made us strong and great we rejoice and our courage is renewed and strengthened.

Keep us evermore in touch with Thee and lead us onward and upward to yet greater heights of glory and Thine be the praise through Christ the Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, July 18, 1917, was read and approved.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES—ARMY OR NAVY SERVICE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FERRIS. I rise to present a conference report for printing under the rule on the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entry, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his motion for a moment while the Chair lays before the House a message from the President?

Mr. RAINEY. I will.

AURELIO COLLAZO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives:

I transmit a report from the Acting Secretary of State inclosing a draft of a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to permit Mr. Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba, to receive instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point at the expense of the Government of Cuba.

The Acting Secretary of State points out that the passage of the resolution would be regarded as an act of courtesy by the Government of Cuba and that it would follow established precedents.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, July 20, 1917.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, July 23, 1917, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, July 23, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee for Thy guidance and blessing this day. In the important and fateful business into which we have been drawn we pray that we may be found worthy of entering into the Divine plan, working together with God for the accomplishment of Thy purpose in us as a Nation. The work that Thou hast committed to us must last not only during the period of conflict but in the making of public opinion and the shaping of the spirit, the new spirit, of this land of ours. O God, grant that all our plans and purposes may be worthy the larger life and the diviner ideals which we trust will be born of the conflict of the present time. To this end we pray Thee to guide us and bless us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore [Mr. SAULSBURY] took the chair and directed the Secretary to read the Journal of the proceedings of the previous day.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, July 18, 1917, was read and approved.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is necessarily absent. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR LANE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, some days ago the Senate fixed August 12 as the time for memorial exercises in memory of my late colleague. I wish to ask unanimous consent that the time be fixed for the 19th of August instead of the 12th.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is ordered that the change shall be made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills:

H. R. 646. An act for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins; and

H. R. 5326. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Woman's Club of Rialto, Cal., praying for the establishment of a moral zone around the concentration camps of the Army, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Council of Defense of Alpine County, Cal., urging that certain lands within the county of Alpine, which have been withdrawn for reclamation purposes, be restored to entry, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. COLT presented a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of Carolina, R. I., praying for national prohibition, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Eagle Council No. 8, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Providence, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the inflation of prices charged for commodities, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the National Association of Fisheries Commissioners, praying for the protection of the tidal waters of the country, which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Grand Saline, Tex., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I present resolutions adopted by the Common Council of the City of Detroit, Mich., which I ask may be printed in the Record without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CITY OF DETROIT,
OFFICE OF CITY CLERK,
July 18, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the common council, I am transmitting herewith copy of resolution adopted by said body on the 10th instant relative to the independence of Bohemia:

[By Alderman Littlefield.]

"Whereas President Wilson declared that by entering the war 'we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the rights and liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such a concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and make the world itself at last free'; and

"Whereas the man who is now our President, writing about the Bohemians many years ago, stated that 'no lapse of time, no defeat of hopes, seems sufficient to reconcile the Czechs of Bohemia to incorporation with Austria. Pride of race and memories of a notable and distinguished history keep them always at odds with the Germans within their gates and with the government set over their heads'; and

"Whereas the powers with which our country is now allied in its fight against dynasties ruling by divine grace have declared the liberation of Czechs (Bohemians) and Slovaks from foreign domination to be one of the conditions of future peace: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the Common Council of the City of Detroit, That Bohemia ought to be of right free and independent; and be it further

"Resolved, That this council appeal to the President and to the Congress of the United States to insist on Bohemian independence as an essential part of any just and democratic reconstruction at the end of the war; and be it further

"Resolved, That the city clerk transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, to the Vice President as Presiding Officer of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of both Houses of Congress, to the United States Senators from the State of Michigan, and to the Representatives in Congress for the city of Detroit."

Adopted.

Respectfully, RICHARD LINDSAY, City Clerk.

SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 2489) to create two additional associate justices of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

DESERT-LAND ENTRIES (S. REPT. NO. 87).

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 3331) for the protection of the owners of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war. It is a war measure, and I ask unanimous consent for its consideration. I ask that it be read first and that then it be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no desert-land entry made or held under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1877, as amended by the act of March 3, 1891, by an officer on enlisted man in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Organized Militia of the United States shall be subject to contest or cancellation for failure to make or expend the sum of $1 per acre per year in improvements upon such claim, or to effect the reclamation thereof, during the period said entryman or his successor in interest is engaged in the military service of the United States during the present war with Germany, and until six months thereafter, and the time within which such entryman or claimant is required to make such expenditures and effect reclamation of the land shall be exclusive of the time of his actual service in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Organized Militia of the United States: Provided, That said desert-land entry shall have been made by the said officer or enlisted man prior to his enlistment: Provided further, That each such entryman or claimant shall, within six months after the passage of this act, or within six months after he is mustered into the service, file in the local land office of the district wherein his claim is situate a notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said desert claim under this act: Provided further, That the term "enlisted man," as used in this section, shall include any person selected to serve in the military forces of the United States as provided by the act entitled "An act authorizing the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the protection of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war."

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2657) authorizing the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint Henry S. Kiersted, late a captain in the Medical Corps of the United States Army, a major in the Medical Corps on the retired list, and increasing the retired list by one for the purpose of this act; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 2658) for the relief of settlers and town-site occupants of certain lands in the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation, Nev.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. BROUSSARD:

A bill (S. 2659) to provide for the selection of osteopathic physicians in the medical service of the Army and Navy of the United States, and to provide for their official status, rank, and pay, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 2660) amending the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918"; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2661) modifying and amending the act providing for the disposal of the surplus unallotted lands within the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, Mont.; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. WARREN:

A bill (S. 2662) granting examination privileges to certain enlisted men of the Regular Army and officers of Philippine Scouts; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 2663) granting the consent of Congress to the Wolf Creek Lumber Co. to construct a bridge across Tug River; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. CUMMINS:

A bill (S. 2664) granting a pension to Ina L. Murdock (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON:

A bill (S. 2665) for the relief of William Crawford; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 2666) granting the consent of Congress to the Sebastian bridge district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River, at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, Ark. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. RANSDELL:

A bill (S. 2667) granting the consent of Congress to the Pritchard-Wheeler Lumber Co., of Wisner, La., to construct a bridge across Bayou Macon, in Louisiana, at a point east of the town of Wisner, La.; to the Committee on Commerce.

NATION-WIDE PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment for nation-wide prohibition to the Constitution of the United States, with a view to ascertaining whether a date can be agreed upon for a vote.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] is very much interested in the measure. I do not see him in the Chamber. I think it would be well if the Senator from Texas would withhold it until his return.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall withhold the request for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has closed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. SMITH of Arizona addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4285, the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The morning hour is not over. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I desire to know whether or not I can move to substitute another bill for the river and harbor bill, the consideration of which is moved by the Senator from Florida? I should like to get up a measure during the morning hour involving an international question embodied in a treaty between the United States and Great Britain. It was at our suggestion that the negotiations were entered into, and the negotiations have been pending for more than a year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Arizona that the Chair announced that the morning business had closed, and recognized the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was attempting to get recognition before the Chair made the announcement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair regrets that the announcement was made.

Mr. FLETCHER. The announcement was made that the morning business had closed, and I moved to take up the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I know that; but I was standing, waiting to be recognized, and did not know that any other Senator has risen. I understood that morning business and not the morning hour had closed, and I thought it would be proper for me to make my motion.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Arizona a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Very well.

Mr. KENYON. I want to know if the Senator from Arizona does not realize that the river and harbor bill is a great war measure and should be disposed of at once? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not propose to enter into that question. I do not want to create any difficulty in relation to the river and harbor bill, or as to any other bill, but I should like the Senator from Florida to yield to me until I can get the bill for which I desire consideration passed this morning. I am extremely anxious to get away from the city, if I can.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator from Arizona how long it will take to dispose of the bill for which he desires consideration?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is a bill which ought to pass; and I do not think there is objection to the bill, except on the part of one Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I am willing to accommodate the Senator from Arizona. If the river and harbor bill be taken up, I will then agree that it be laid aside for a limited time to enable the Senator to test the question as to the disposition of the bill which he desires considered.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Can the Senator from Missouri, who is opposed to the bill, inform me whether or not we shall be able to obtain a vote on the bill before 2 o'clock?

Mr. REED. I do not know whether we can or not, Mr. President. I am opposed to the bill until the Supreme Court of the United States in a case before it has decided as to the constitutionality of this sort of legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. The motion is not debatable, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona, of course, could not move to substitute his bill for that of the Senator from Florida. The motion of the Senator from Florida is to take up House bill 4285, being the river and harbor bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think that motion is debatable, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is not debatable during the morning hour.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question is not debatable.

Mr. KENYON. I addressed the question to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The recollection of the Chair is that, under the rule, the question is not debatable before 2 o'clock.

Mr. KENYON. I know the matter was taken up on Saturday, Mr. President, and the Chair then held that it was debatable; but it is true that that was after 2 o'clock.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was after 2 o'clock, and therefore it came.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I hope the motion to take up the river and harbor bill will be voted down, so that I can get my bill up.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will be perfectly willing to yield to the Senator from Arizona for a limited time after the river and harbor bill shall have been taken up.

Mr. THOMPSON. Under Rule VIII a motion to take up a matter before 2 o'clock must be put without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in case the morning hour continues, the Chair thinks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Arizona that the only way in which to get his bill before the Senate at this time would be for the Senate to vote down the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will state to the Senator from Florida that if I do not get the bill through before 2 o'clock I will yield to him to call up the other bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not see that it will be the Senator's privilege exactly to yield to me. I had the floor, and I made my motion in regular order and in regular time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing to lay aside the river and harbor bill temporarily, if it is taken up by the Senate, and allow the Senator from Arizona a reasonable time within which to have his bill considered, but I want to have my motion to take up the bill first disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JAMES (when Mr. BECKHAM's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] is absent from the city on important business.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is absent on account of sickness. I am therefore compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Not seeing that Senator in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when the name of Mr. THOMAS was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, having a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is absent.

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). My pair, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], not having voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. While I am satisfied he would have voted, if present, as I have voted, I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Bankhead	James	Nelson	Sheppard
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Simmons
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Smith, Ga.

Gerry	McCumber	Tillman

So Mr. FLETCHER's motion was agreed to.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator in charge of the river and harbor bill is willing that it shall be laid aside until 2 o'clock for the consideration of the measure in charge of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. FLETCHER. I will wait a minute and allow the bill to be laid before the Senate. The Senator from Connecticut voted against the motion to take up the river and harbor bill, so that I do not know that I am under any obligations to proceed in that direction.

Mr. McLEAN. The vote on this side was largely influenced by the understanding that the Senator from Florida would consent to allow the bill in charge of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] to be considered until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays House bill 4285 before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, as stated before the vote was taken, I am perfectly willing, in order to accommodate the Senator from Arizona, to yield to him until 2 o'clock. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the river and harbor bill be laid aside temporarily until that hour.

Mr. REED. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I understand, then, that the river and harbor bill is now before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has laid that bill before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I did not hear the proposition made by the Senator at the time; but I knew that it would require unanimous consent to lay the river and harbor bill aside after it had been taken up by the vote of the Senate, and I also knew that if it required unanimous consent the Senator would object who did object.

I am a little unfortunate, probably, in coming in conflict with the river and harbor bill. I have been in sympathy with that bill always, and hope to remain so. I should like, however, to give notice to those having that bill in charge that I shall ask the Senate to take an adjournment this evening so that we may have a morning hour to-morrow, at which time I hope to be able to call up the bill to which I have referred, affecting a treaty between the United States and Great Britain. I am only asking for its consideration in the morning hour, and if I can not secure its passage in the morning hour I shall always give way to the regular order. If I could have to-morrow morning for the consideration of the bill which I have sought to have considered, I would be gratified; but that matter will come up on the question of adjournment this evening.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, on Saturday during the consideration of the food-control measure, when a motion was made to strike out the provision fixing a minimum price of $2 per bushel for wheat in certain primary markets throughout the country, I was among the Senators who voted to strike out the minimum price. I did not believe that we should make an exception in the case of wheat and fix a price for that commodity which would cause the consuming public of this country, a great many of whom are people engaged in other agricultural pursuits than that of producing wheat, to pay possibly from $12 to $14 or $15 per barrel for flour in the retail markets. I voted to strike out that minimum price because I felt that it would establish a price for flour in the retail markets of this country which would be possibly far more than the people of this country should pay for flour when conditions readjusted themselves under the other provisions of the bill. However, Mr. President, a minority of the Senators only voted to strike out the minimum price. I feel that the great consuming public of this country, including those engaged in labor working for a wage, and including a great host of the farming people of this country who do not produce wheat, should not have enacted into law a provision which will mean that during the next two years they shall pay, if I am correctly informed, what seems to me an exorbitant price for the flour which they consume. Flour is the one food consumed more or less by everybody.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. REED. The $2 minimum guaranty applies only to this year's crop. It does not apply to the crop of next year.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if the fixing of that minimum price until July, 1919, does not mean that the consumer will have to pay for his flour upon the basis of that minimum until July, 1919?

Mr. REED. If the price of wheat is raised above where it otherwise would be in the market, undoubtedly the consumer will have to pay more for his flour. The price of wheat at $2 minimum, however, is considerably less than wheat is now commanding in the market. There are many other observations I might make, but I do not want to interrupt the thread of the Senator's discourse. I know the Senator wants to be right as to his facts; and the $2 minimum guaranty applies only to this year's crop.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, that may be true in its application as far as the price of the wheat is concerned; but in its application to those who are consuming the wheat products it will fix the minimum price up to July, 1919. I am very forcibly impressed that it means that the consumer will have to purchase his wheat products—flour—upon a basis of $2 wheat up to July, 1919, because this as a minimum price is guaranteed until that date.

Mr. President, as I have understood the situation, the great clamor throughout this Nation of ours for food control has been largely in order that the exorbitant prices which were being paid by the consumer should be hereafter barred and controlled, so that the people of this country would no longer be subjected to the extravagant prices. I feel, Mr. President, that if we start out upon the only article of food upon which we fix a price by fixing a minimum price far above the normal price, fixing the price where we know that the consumers will have to pay a great deal more than they have been paying in time of peace, we shall have defeated one of the very objects and purposes of food control. I believe that the wheat farmer should be allowed reasonable returns, reasonable profits for his products, and I shall always stand up to allow him reasonable returns for his efforts, and a reasonable percentage of income upon his capital invested; but I do not believe that it is a proper policy to pick one class of our producers in this country from among the great masses of producers, fix their price at what it seems to me is going to be exorbitant, and then say to the great masses of the farmers engaged in other agricultural pursuits in this country and those who are engaged in the industrial world, "You must pay these exorbitant prices for the products of wheat."

I voted for the bill. I did it very reluctantly, on account of this provision which I had sought to eliminate by my vote. In fact, I would have voted against the bill containing this provision if my vote would have defeated the bill and forced another food-control measure with this very objectionable feature eliminated. I am firmly impressed, Mr. President, that the conditions in this country are such that we need some regulation and control of the prices of most all necessaries. Practically all food products are unreasonably high. The speculators have been feasting at the expense of the farmers and consumers of this country. Legislation is necessary to force prices down to within reason to prevent the manipulation from forcing prices even higher. I realize the necessity for such legislation, but I am unqualifiedly opposed to fixing a price for wheat which will require hundreds of thousands of people in my State to pay such high price for flour. The farmers and growers of my State under this measure will have no guaranty of a reasonable price for their products, yet under its provisions will have to pay for flour made from wheat costing at least $2 a bushel. How much more we do not know.

Mr. President, it is not my desire to delay further consideration of this matter, but, on account of this one feature of the bill, which to me is very objectionable, and I believe will be found to be very objectionable to a great majority of the American people, I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the food-control bill was passed; and if it has been sent to the House, that it be returned to the Senate for further consideration. My object in making this motion is for the specific purpose, and that only, of having further consideration upon the question of the minimum price which was fixed for wheat. I think this provision should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. President, I desired to make this motion on Saturday, immediately after the vote on the bill, and tried to get recognition of the Chair for this purpose, but, due to the desire of a majority to go into an executive session, I failed to get recognition by the Chair; consequently my delay until this morning to make this motion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the motion is not in order. The business before the Senate is the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Florida to accompany his motion to reconsider with a request of the House to return the bill. The Chair thinks that the motion, because of the limited time within which it can be made, is a privileged question. The motion to reconsider, however, does not come before the Senate until the request is made of the House, when that becomes debatable. The motion to request the House to return the bill is not debatable and must be decided immediately.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I move that the motion of the Senator from Florida be laid on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the motion to reconsider that it can not be made while another bill is pending before the Senate for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the motion to reconsider is merely entered or filed, as it has been expressed frequently; that the motion of the Senator from Florida is to request the House to return that bill from the House. That, the Chair rules, is a privileged motion and is in order.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I be heard just a moment further? I should like to have a clear understanding of what the motion is. The motion, as stated by the Senator from Florida, was to reconsider the vote by which the food-control bill was passed. That was the way in which the author of the motion stated it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I make the point of order against that motion, as stated by its author, that it is not in order, because the river and harbor bill is now pending before the Senate, and that a motion to reconsider another bill can not be entertained by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the point of order is well taken, and the Chair will refer the Senator to paragraph 2 of Rule XIII. The motion which is up now for immediate discussion, subject to the motion of the Senator from Oregon to lay upon the table, is the motion to request the House to return the bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What is the business before the Senate at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has ruled that the motion made by the Senator from Florida is privileged.

The Senator from Oregon has moved to lay that motion upon the table. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand, then, that it has displaced the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not so understand. It is a privileged question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. May I inquire how it is possible for two matters to be before the Senate at identically the same time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has made a ruling, in regard to which it requests the Senator from Washington to consult paragraph 2 of Rule XIII. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to lay on the table the motion made by the Senator from Florida, to request the return from the House of the food-control bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL and Mr. KENYON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GRONNA. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	New	Simmons
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Kellogg	Overman	Smith, Ga.
Colt	Kendrick	Page	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Smoot
Cummins	King	Pittman	Sterling
Curtis	Kirby	Poindexter	Swanson
Fernald	Knox	Pomerene	Thompson
Fletcher	McCumber	Ransdell	Tillman
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Robinson	Trammell
Gore	McLean	Saulsbury	Warren
Gronna	McNary	Shafroth	Watson
Hale	Martin	Sheppard	Weeks
Harding	Myers	Sherman	Williams
Hardwick	Nelson	Shields

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] is temporarily absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will state it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I raise a point of order against the motion of the Senator from Florida on the ground that it is a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement under which the food-control bill was disposed of. The unanimous-consent agreement provided that it should be finally disposed of upon Saturday. If this motion should be carried, it would not be finally disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that at this time it is not necessary to rule or attempt to rule upon that point of order and would leave the question to the Senate if it should be raised. The motion before the Senate is to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Florida. Unless the Senator from Nevada insists on that point of order being left to the Senate, the Chair will put the motion of the Senator from Oregon. If the Senator insists on that question being put before the Senate——

Mr. PITTMAN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the motion is lost, will the Senator from Nevada have an opportunity to interpose the point of order again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada will have an equally good opportunity. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oregon to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Florida. On that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. The junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has a pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. We have arranged to transfer our pairs so that the Senator from New Mexico will stand paired with the Senator from Colorado, which will allow the Senator from Wyoming and myself to vote. This announcement will stand for the day. I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. Has the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. TILLMAN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN];

The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]; and

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 51, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—51.

So Mr. CHAMBERLAIN'S motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the river and harbor appropriation bill be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for the purpose of amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

Mr. KENYON. I object to that unanimous consent and ask to have the bill read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think that completes the reading of the bill, does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading has been completed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to say just a word before the chairman of the committee, I assume, will go ahead with an explanation of it; and I am going to suggest the absence of a quorum so that he can be heard. I want first to say this, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I am not going to seek to delay this bill in any way. I am going to argue it as thoroughly as I can, and I think perhaps there may be a few other Senators who will argue it. I realize that it is perfectly impossible to defeat a bill of this kind. I believe it is the worst river and harbor bill that has ever been presented to Congress since I have been here because of its grouping of subjects so that no one can get at just how much money is to be expended for a particular subject.

I did not rise, however, to discuss the bill at this time, but merely, in order that the chairman might have somebody here to hear him if he was to explain the bill, to suggest the absence of a quorum, which I now do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smoot

James	Norris	Smith, Mich.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] is necessarily absent on important business. This announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR AVIATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces the signature of the Vice President of the United States to the following enrolled bill:

The SECRETARY. H. R. 5326. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

SUGGESTED PEACE BASES.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida, the eminent chairman of this committee, allows me to intrude myself at this moment for a very short time.

Mr. President, I want to submit to the Senate a suggestion which is intimated to me by telegrams received by me this morning and last night—received from very fair representative German citizens of my city of Chicago, and whose loyalty in the present trying hour I can assure the Senate I myself can attest.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the phraseology in the speech of the new chancellor of Germany, Dr. Michaelis, particularly respecting the proposal of peace. I do not know how other Senators were impressed with the speech of this new chancellor. After carefully reading the speech I am wholly of a different view than seems to be the view of Mr. Lloyd-George, speaking for Britain.

Mr. President, I am strongly struck with that which must be apparent to any reflective reader of the speech of the German chancellor. It is on this point: That it is a direct bid to the United States of America to use its influence with its copartners in conflict to have them make a request for peace. It is palpable to me in the expression that "Germany is ready for an honorable peace, but having previously offered it, it will now wait for the terms of peace to be suggested by the others"; that the term "others" is meant ourselves, as voice of the allies.

To my mind, sir, it is a bid to the United States, which was the one Nation which had asked for terms of peace, and the one Nation which at one time had submitted the humane proposition of peace without victory. It is a bid to us to again ask either for ourselves or in behalf of those with whom we are cooperating for peace.

Mr. President, I am satisfied that the deduction from the speech of Chancellor Michaelis is justified, which would read as follows: That if peace will be asked by the allies, the mere asking of that peace by the allies is a sufficient excuse for Germany yielding to the terms that will be asked by the allies. I am impressed at this time, sir——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. What is the language in the German chancellor's speech which gives the Senator reason to assume that that would be true? I ask this because I did not get that impression.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I can understand that an impression at variance from my own could readily have been obtained. The atmosphere was against my construction. Another reason for the opposite viewpoint is the suggestion of their construction from eminent statesmen who are opposed to my view. All this leads to an opposite conclusion. I reply to the eminent Senator from Idaho by reading the words of the speech quoted, that Germany is ready for an honorable peace, and the phrase afterwards used that she will not now ask it, having asked it before, or, as is gathered, that she will wait for others to ask it who are interested more in the terms and the details of it, particularly the following. I read:

SEEK HONORABLE PEACE.

The burning question in our hearts, however, is how much longer the war is to last. With this I come to a matter which stands in the center of all our interest and all our proceedings to-day. Germany did not desire the war in order to make violent conquests, and therefore will not continue the war a day longer merely for the sake of such conquests if it could obtain an honorable peace.

The Germans wish to conclude peace as combatants who have successfully accomplished their purpose and proved themselves invincible. A condition of peace was the inviolability of German's territory. No parley was possible with the enemy demanding the cession of German soil.

We must, by means of understanding and in a spirit of give and take, guarantee conditions of the existence of the German Empire upon the continent and overseas.

Peace must offer the foundation of a lasting reconciliation of nations—

Then proceeding to say that Germany will continue to fight, and so forth, as the Senator recalls. I construe that latter statement as meaning that if these requests are not made from any of those who are called allies Germany will then continue to fight for that which she will not ask—peace.

But I also gather, Senators, that if peace shall be asked for by any of the allies, or the United States in behalf of the allies, which would set forth the terms upon which we should deem peace could be had, Germany would then yield the peace upon the theory that she would not be humiliated by accepting the terms proposed by the allies, for the reason that if peace was asked by the others she was compensated on her part in accepting the terms on which they demanded it from the fact that it was the others who asked for it.

Now, Mr. President, I am strongly moved to feel that we in the United States have not given the construction to the speech of Chancellor Michaelis which it would bear, and which, if I am not altogether in error, it was intended to suggest.

Mr. President, I take the liberty to inform the Senate that at a later time, when I shall not be interrupting the program which has been very carefully prepared upon this river and harbor bill, I shall tender to the Senate such form of resolution as will give appropriate opportunity for the discussion of my views in more detail.

Mr. President, at this particular time I wish to suggest to the Senate the propriety of our considering the speech of the chancellor, considering it to the extent that it is meant peculiarly as I see it as addressed to the United States. I refer to that particular phraseology that is evidently intended wholly for us. I have quoted it. I therefore, sir, am of the impression that if the United States, in view of this speech and in view of the fact that it comes from the new chancellor as his very first utterance after having been put in power—also, sir, note the fact palpable to you, Mr. President, and to every Member here that it was a composite speech; it was not a speech only written by the chancellor, it was a speech contributed in several parts by several agencies and then mosaiced together as an expression of the military, the legislative, and the reform parties as those who sought peace, and then, sir, was embodied the impression particularly addressed to the allies or friends of the allies touching peace terms.

Mr. President, my judgment is, sir, that now is a time when Germany will accept the offer of peace based upon the terms, first, the restoration of Belgium; second, the restoration of the possessions which she has held of France; third, the return to the countries of Serbia, Bulgaria, and Roumania to their previous status; in consideration for that the return to Germany by the allies of those particular parts of the German country which have been taken, to wit, her colonies in Africa.

Then, Mr. President, there can be a board constituted upon which there shall be the representatives of the different warring countries, and before this board the respective countries to present their terms as to all the other details, then that board to give hearings and finally to reach conclusions as to what would be equitable under all the circumstances looking to peace, and with a view of preventing a return of the conflict, harmonizing the situation and avoiding years and generations of hatred, that board to finally submit its conclusions in that light upon the theory that as to those details they may be accepted as matters of compromise and adjustment.

Mr. McCUMBER rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Did the Senator rise to interrupt me?

Mr. McCUMBER. For a moment.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield gladly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator give vent to those sentiments as an expression of what he thinks would be right and just and what ought to be done, or does he gather from the speech of the chancellor an inspiration that the chancellor intends to convey to the world the acceptance of peace precisely along that line?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator I am not able to deduce from the speech itself that those terms would be accepted, nor am I able to say that the speech conveys to the world that those are the terms in the mind of the chancellor. I am suggesting that this is the time in which, if peace be asked by the allies or the friends of the allies, those terms which we regard at the outset just and necessary would be accepted upon the theory that they would allay all friction of the present and would make prospective harmony in future years possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will recall that in that speech the chancellor stated that the U-boat has accomplished even more than was expected, and it would bring Great Britain to her knees in a very short time, and that the support that the United States could give to the allies would be very negligible in every respect. Does that look to the Senator as though it was addressed to the United States as a basis for peace, as a request that we interpose for peace, after having paid that tribute to our ability as a warring nation?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, strange to say, sir, it is among those very expressions on which I found the conviction which I am now expressing.

Let me say, sir, my view: In the first place, with reference to the U-boat, I say to the Senator from North Dakota it was a mere indication that if the peace which Germany says she is now ready to make, an honorable peace, shall not be acceptable, that the future course as the penalty for not accepting the opportunity of peace would be that which the U-boat could inflict. Second, the reference to the United States as being a negligible quantity in war, so far as aid to the allies, I might say, is the sentence carefully framed, refined, changed, reduced, and revised before it ever found its way to final expression, because it does not say that the United States is not competent in war, nor does it say we are not a potent power, nor does it make reflection upon us as a power to be reckoned with by Germany, but speaks of us as being negligible as to our aid to Britain, making specific qualifications, I say to the eminent Senator from North Dakota, as I think, and calling attention to Britain, indicating that if Britain should conclude that she will now not again accept any advances of peace she must keep in mind that she herself may be overrun eventually by U-boats, and however potent in other directions as to her our aid would be a negligible matter. It carried to my mind, I will say to the Senator, the direct statement that they look to the United States as turning the power it would have to its own necessities and its own uses and could be of little value as a mere aid to Britain.

Such, sir, was my conclusion; such, sir, is my view.

Therefore, Mr. President, with the view that I have, I am of the conclusion that this is a righteous and appropriate hour for us seriously to consider the bid that Germany made for peace.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to address an inquiry to the Senator, if it does not interrupt him.

Mr. LEWIS. It does not.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator states as a part of the program of peace that France should have returned her possessions. Does he refer to that portion of the territory of France now in possession of the Germans as a result of the present war or does he mean the return of Alsace and Lorraine?

Mr. LEWIS. I refer to both. I may say to the Senator that Alsace and Lorraine I treat as a possession of France, as she so regards it, and also that part of France now in the possession of Germany as a part of the battle field and battle operations.

Mr. PENROSE. The surmise, then, from reading the speech is that Germany will be ready to hand back Alsace-Lorraine to France?

Mr. LEWIS. I would rather answer that by saying it is my judgment that if terms of peace should be asked by the allies the present condition of Germany is such that she would be willing to return Alsace-Lorraine and the other part of the French possessions back to France in consideration of the allies returning her her colonies which have been seized in Africa and other places.

Mr. PENROSE. Now, one more question. The Senator does not refer to the status of Italy. What would be done in the case of Italy? Would she have her frontiers realigned? What would be done in that connection?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator has apprehended correctly one of the many things which were in my mind when I said it is my judgment when the principal terms of peace have been settled upon, such as the return of the French possessions through the restoration of Belgium, the freeing of the open seas, that then a board would be constituted made up of representatives of the warring powers, and before this board each of the contestants would present their respective claims, and that finally that board would adjust the matters upon such an equitable basis and submit it to the world. In that respect the claim of Italy to the Trentino would undoubtedly be included. That was a suggestion of mine as one of the ways and means in which those dispositions might be reached. The United States would be represented to protect the rights and claims of little nations.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has not reached any distinct conclusion as to the status of Italy that would go before this board?

Mr. LEWIS. Such is my judgment: If Italy and other countries offer at this time what I think would be a satisfactory solution to them, then I do not know what would be——

Mr. PENROSE. Then one further question and I am done.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator may take the time, unless I am intruding upon my eminent friend from Florida.

Mr. PENROSE. Has the Senator any thought of compensation to Belgium?

Mr. LEWIS. Since the Senator has asked me—that I may startle the Senator by saying I have often felt and dwelt on this, as I have often dwelt on the prospect of peace, fearing if we did not have an early peace we would have a very long war—I have felt that if peace could be reached within possible distance, and terms of peace, there would be a fund raised from all the participants in the peace terms for the rehabilitation of Belgium, and that that fund would come from all the parties participating in the adjustment rather than any one solely of the belligerents.

I say to the Senator my desire is that Belgium should have her future peace restored and assured, and one of the ways to assure it is that the fund that should restore it should be made up from all the contributing agencies participating in the peace, that thereafter they would stand something as a sponsor for the permanent peace for all times, and the permanent security and friendship of Belgium at all times.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Idaho rose first. I yield first to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator is speaking of the distribution or the redistribution of territory, but does the Senator take into consideration what seems to be now the great controlling question with reference to the war, and that is as to the future form of government of the German Empire? It has been stated repeatedly that the world could not be safe, for democracy so long as the powers which now control Germany continue to dominate that Empire. It seems to me—and I suggest this in order that I may have the views of the Senator—it seems to me that Germany has by no means approached the point where she would permit any outside power to modify in the least her form of Government or interfere with the controlling, ruling powers of Germany.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator strikes a very live chord, and it should respond with freedom and frankness. This, sir, is my view. It was not my intention to express it at this time, but I am content to do so.

Mr. President, I do not think that the President of the United States, historian and scholar of government as he is, ever intended by any remark of his to intimate that the United States would direct the form of government of Germany in conduct of purely internal affairs, but that it was his wish expressed that some conditions should arise within Germany itself that would dictate the transformation of government and install in the present place of the Imperial Government some republic in future.

I now answer the Senator's query. I say, sir, my judgment is that if peace can be approximated, and we arrive at peace, we can trust to the new civilization of Germany, the new aroused sentiment of Germany, that new spirit that has been awakened by the example of forcible speech, particularly in Russia, to take care of that situation and to take its own future by its own reformation.

I say to the Senator from Idaho that it is my judgment that one of the things which moved the chancellor in that composite speech made up of the careful, deliberate views of many to make the suggestion which I see as an offer of peace, a request of the Germans, was a fear that unless something is done some inherent and subtle force would arise in Germany that will remove the Government from out the control of the Hohenzollerns, without regard to what other form it may take, and that the fear of that, sir, is one of the things which incited, in my judgment, that message, for it is my opinion, and I express it solemnly, that the present house of Hohenzollern would rather have peace upon the terms of the allies and retain power than to have a peace which would put it out of power and be succeeded by another power in Germany.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I again yield to the Senator from Idaho if he desires to interrogate me.

Mr. BORAH. If it be true that the present chancellor of Germany, who is distinctly representative of the bureaucratic power in Germany, has come to feel great uneasiness about the danger to the governing and ruling powers of Germany and has been moved by reason of that uneasiness to suggest possible terms of peace which will preserve that ruling power, while I have never been in favor of our Government interfering with the Governments of Europe, I should really feel if kaiserdom is near a fall that the Government of the United States would be doing a service to mankind and to the people of Germany if it stayed in the fight until that breakdown came.

Mr. LEWIS. I would say to the Senator that while that is very commendable, if we did no other service to mankind as a result of the war than to break down the imperial military dynasty of Prussia and give to Prussia and the German people a liberty of action and freedom of government such as we ourselves enjoy, we would do a great service to civilization. It is my conviction, sir, that already the spirit aroused in Germany is such that whatever control the power would possess of Germany would be forced to yield to many of those instrumentalities and operations of legislative reform and elective reform such as we are now enjoying and such as we hope for Germany.

I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator having by some occult power which I confess I do not possess derived from the speech of the chancellor some hope and some basis for a peace, and the Senator already having expressed himself as to what he thought might be acceptable terms of peace, I would like to ask the Senator what he thinks would be the terms with reference to the Turkish power in Europe. The Christian civilization having responded to the support of the orphans and widows caused by the periodical massacres by Turkish fanatics feel quite deeply interested on that phase of the question, and it does seem to be an important question.

May I also at this time call the Senator's attention to what I rather gleaned for myself from the speech of Lloyd-George some time ago, indicating a willingness on the part of Great Britain to allow the colonies wrested from Germany to determine for themselves what country they might desire to be attached to, if any. The colonial question possibly might be settled without serious difficulty, but it does seem to me that it would probably require some change of geographical lines, some realignments in southern Europe. I should be glad, and I am earnest in my desire, to find an early peace, if the Senator can tell us what he thinks ought to be done and what probably could be done by diplomacy and without the further force of arms and before the annihilation of any of these powers in bringing about a satisfactory solution of the Balkan question.

Mr. LEWIS. The United States would be present to protect the demands and rights of the little nations. Mr. President, referring first to Turkey, the Senator from North Dakota heard me express my viewpoint as to this board of mediation and arbitration, before which all claims would be presented, and which would in its adjustment suggest the solution for all the minor questions other than the mere restoration of the greater territory to which I have referred.

I say to the Senator the question he has put me has given me serious concern. I dwelt upon it this morning, reflecting on the subject, and this, then, was my conclusion, and it is now my statement.

This board, which would be made up of adjusters representing the different countries engaged in the conflict, if the Senator reflects, would be Christian by a very large majority. The dominant Christian churches, dominant in numbers, I refer to, would have representatives from those countries that are distinctively Christian. I assume they would regard this question, as the Senator has well put it, one of a Christian civilization to be preserved. That Turkey would be taken charge of in the form of a protectorate supervised or superintended by representatives of the largest Christian countries which have heretofore shown great interest and much knowledge of Turkey; that that form of supervision or protection would then open up the Dardanelles and the seas to all those countries and all of civilization that would use the same for the betterment of mankind; and that then out of this would come the proposition for the government of Turkey in such way and such manner as would not destroy the right of Turkey merely because it was not a Christian country, nevertheless completely preserve Christianity to the extent that it is exercised and preserve those who are Christian people to the full extent of their right.

Such was my viewpoint as to that.

Now, as to the Balkan States, I assure the Senator there is some confusion as to what shall become of the Balkan States. I am unable to satisfy myself as to any solution. I feel that those States, some of them being Slav and having sympathy with Russia, some of them bearing a more southerly relation and having their sympathy in other directions, these with Italy should be left to themselves as much as possible to determine among themselves what is for the best welfare of its people. And that being my creed and the creed of every Senator here where American sentiments will dominate them, and that applies to every Senator, I can go no further than to say I would be in favor of an agency that would leave to each of these independent governments some method of carving out for themselves the form of government applicable to themselves, the United States having at heart the rights of Ireland and Poland and the other little nations.

Mr. President, I have taken in these views considerable time, far beyond the excess of speech I had intended to throw out. I have made these statements so that Senators who are interested in the subject may reread the speech of Chancellor Michaelis, and that they may gather my views now and see if they can find in that speech any similar conclusions from that which they draw; if they can find it in justice to their own views, and if they can not find it that way consistent with our position, to make a suggestion as to what terms of peace from the American standpoint would be consistent with our institutions and the object for which we have entered into this conflict.

Mr. President, the time is ripe, as I see it, where a truce could be had and peace within the next six months assured the world through the condition that Germany is now in; and, sir, if I am in error and the truce and the peace which are hoped for shall not transpire within the next six months and the present atmosphere be availed of, I fear, sir, war for six years, with all its indescribable horrors, untold atrocities, and consequences beyond the depiction of tongue or pen. Out of deep solicitude for my own people, the sons and the mothers of America, the boys and the fathers of our land, and the future peace of the world, I am deeply solicitous, if there be any real foundation for my hopes, that I may enjoy the cooperation of the thought and reflection of my brother Senators upon this subject.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as is known, all Senators are always so deeply solicitous (?) for the passage of the river and harbor bills, a bill of that character now being under consideration, that I am tempted to make a few observations, of course not for the purpose of obstructing its passage nor with respect to such measure, but apropos of the suggestions which have just been made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

I did not know, Mr. President, but that my good friend the Senator from Illinois, with prophetic instinct, having solved the war questions, and having prepared a treaty of peace, would move before we adjourn this afternoon that we go into executive session for the purpose of approving the workmanship of his hand.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is folly for our Nation to talk about peace now. We are at war, and the thing to talk about is not peace but war—war with the most formidable foe that any nation ever confronted. Germany is waging the most cruel and devastating war of all time. She is not fighting for liberty or for existence but for conquest and indemnities. Our country, the great democratic nation of the world, was challenged by this autocratic military power and forced into this awful conflict. I can not agree with the Senator from Illinois in the construction which he places upon the recent speech of Dr. Michaelis.

The chancellor, in his memorable address, extols his predecessor, Dr. Bethmann-Hollweg, and, in effect, approves his war policies and his general administrative methods. As I read his address almost every sentence is an indorsement of the policy of brutality, blood, cruelty, and rapacity that has characterized Germany in the prosecution of the war from the day when she set her foot upon helpless Belgium down to the very hour the address was delivered. Dr. Michaelis not only indorsed the ruthless submarine warfare pursued by Germany, but he boasted of the success which had attended the execution of this atrocious, wicked, and cowardly policy. So indurated is the chancellor in Prussian barbarism and inhuman methods of warfare that he regards them as proper, and so lost is he to the instincts and sensibilities that find repose among civilized nations that he boldly declares that submarine warfare is not contrary to international law and is not violative of the rights of humanity.

I have hastily glanced at portions of the chancellor's speech, as reported in the press, since the Senator from Illinois began his address, and I repeat that I can find nothing in the reported language of the chancellor to warrant the conclusion drawn by the distinguished Senator. Instead of indicating a desire for peace, the chancellor boasts of Germany's invincibility and triumphant victories. Indeed, he declares that Germany can not again offer peace, although it must be known to everyone that Germany at no time has made an offer of peace. The chancellor boasts that France and England are unable to supply their armies, and he further declares that Germany can look forward to the further labors of the submarine with complete confidence. He speaks derisively of the entrance into the war of the United States, and clearly conveys the idea that this Nation is no factor of any importance to the great contest. He further declares, in substance, that Germany has been victorious and that she and her allies look forward with the greatest confidence to ultimate victory. As I read the speech, it is in consonance with the predetermined policy of the military caste of Germany. There will be no departure from the methods of warfare formerly employed, and, indeed, greater efforts will be made than have characterized Germany's course in the past. There is not a gentle word, a sympathetic expression, or a humanitarian view in the entire speech. It is a bloodless, cruel, iron speech; and he gives no hope of an honorable peace to the warring nations.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that my friend from Illinois, in his desire to have peace, has been more interested in reading into the statement of the chancellor meanings that were never expressed than in placing upon the words the true and correct import which they bear.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WEEKS in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator not think that it will be time enough to talk about peace after Germany has vacated Belgium and northern France?

Mr. KING. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I shall not care to talk peace until Germany solicits peace at our hands and the hands of the nations she has robbed and despoiled; until she returns to Belgium and to France the thousands of helpless women, children, and men carried away by her into cruel and inhuman slavery; until she withdraws her military forces from Belgian soil; until she makes reparation to the bleeding, crucified people of Belgium and France for the foul and wicked crimes that lie at her door.

The allies desire peace, our country desires peace, but peace is impossible until Prussianism is vanquished and the German people seek peace and in good faith meet their opponents in a spirit of amity to write the treaty that will end the war.

The suggestion of the learned Senator that the nations of the world, or at least the participants in the war, contribute a fund to indemnify Belgium strikes me with abhorrence. The allies and our country indemnify Belgium? And for what? For the crimes—the ruthless, wicked, and fiendish crimes—committed by Prussian militarism. Assess the people of America, assess the people of France, Great Britain, Italy, and Russia, who have been battling for liberty, for territorial integrity, if not for the existence of their nations, and for the democracy of the world, in order to recompense poor, ravished, and stricken Belgium for the atrocities and crimes that lie at the door of Germany! That Belgium shall be restored and compensated, the civilized world demands, and Germany must make such restoration and give compensation. We want no indemnity, no territory; but, if I mistake not, the United States will demand that our rights as a Nation and the rights of the American citizens upon the high seas and in all the world shall be respected; that the unspeakable, barbarous crimes against Belgium and France shall be expiated, and that a righteous peace shall be secured.

Why, Mr. President, Germany for years has been preparing for war in the interest of pan-Germanism, which she has asserted as a national creed. Since Bismarck's time she has founded her national and political policies upon the doctrines of Bernhardi, Neitzsche, Treitchske, and Haackel. The military caste controlling her has forgotten the glorious philosophy of Kant, the high spiritual ideals of Goethe, the ethical concepts and generous sympathies and altruistic faith of many of the German people. Her military leaders, the Kaiser, and the bureaucratic caste who have controlled the destiny of Germany have accepted the biological theory of Haackel and the extreme natural selection views of Darwin and sought to apply them to the social, political, and governmental policies of their nation. Might has been deified and physical power has been taught to be the dominant factor in the civilization of the world. The philosophy that finds expression in the teachings of extreme revolutionists and finds more or less exemplification in the animal and vegetable kingdoms and the theory of the survival of the fittest were sought to be applied to the social organism and to the industrial and political institutions of the State. In the biological world the strong and the predatory, by natural selection, become the fittest to survive. The ethical, the moral, and spiritual forces find no justification in this creed. Bernhardi, with a brutal callousness that is wholly incompatible with a Christian civilization, has glorified force and power and might, and many of the teachers and philosophers of Germany have sought to inculcate this inhuman and materialistic philosophy into the minds of the German people. They have challenged attention to the history of the past and contended that in all ages there was one dominating, overpowering, and overshadowing nation, the nation which was, by reason of its strength and its power, arbiter and controller of the world.

These teachers have pointed to the nations of antiquity and to the powerful ones such as Babylon, Greece, and Rome, which held the small and helpless nations within the hollow of their all-powerful hands. They have argued that it was the philosophy of life and of nations that always and at all times there should be one overlord, one nation, that should dominate the world. Charlemagne and other mighty figures since the fall of Rome have been pointed to by the German teachers as illustrations of the philosophy which they so learnedly expounded. Indeed, German textbooks and German publications during the past 30 years contained the subtle creed, which in the end must undermine the spiritual and the best that is within humanity, that physical power and military greatness are of the greatest, and indeed the highest, importance, and that Germany was destined to rule the world. I repeat, Germany, particularly during the past 30 years, has held that there can be but one dominating and controlling nation in the world at a time, and that Germany was destined to control the world politically and to determine its philosophy and dictate its culture.

Li Hung Chang, after visiting Bismarck and Germany, wrote substantially in his diary the words—

> I am convinced from all that I have seen in Germany that Bismarck and the Kaiser meant what they said when they averred that the German Empire was destined to become a dominant factor in Europe.

And the imperial chancellor said in the Reichstag in 1912 that the German people were living in an atmosphere of passion; that at the root of this feeling was the determination of Germany to make its strength and capability prevail in the world.

Everybody knows that has been the dream of German teachers and philosophers for years—that Germany would dominate industrially and politically the nations of the world. She has built an efficient industrial machine, and the greatest and most powerful military organization the world has even seen. All efforts have been directed toward military efficiency, and everything has been subordinated to the elevation of the military power and to the building up of a strong military machine, that in the end would smite the world and rivet the chains of servitude upon the helpless nations of Europe. There are millions of the German people who do not share these aims; there are millions who are unacquainted with the ambitions and hypocrisy that led to the war. They want no conquests, no indemnities, but think they fight for their country. It is not of them I speak.

So far as I am concerned, I would say that we are in this fight to win, and we shall not talk peace until Germany sues for peace; until she rights the wrongs she has committed; until the foul crimes of which she has been guilty are "burnt and purged away" by sacrificial confession, restorations and compensations, or upon the battle field; and in the accomplishment of this end there will doubtless be shed the blood of patriotic boys who will go from this land carrying the Stars and Stripes across the sea; and they, by the supreme sacrifice of their lives, will vindicate the rights of the American people and the rights of democracy in all the world. Let us talk no more of Michaelis and no more of peace. Let us further prepare for war and fight on until we and our heroic allies win a righteous and a lasting peace for our country, for democracy, and for the world.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I regret that my excellent friend, Judge KING, the eminent Senator from Utah, should have viewed my observation as one for the purpose of executing a treaty of peace. While I appreciate his delicate satire, I would have advised him that the splendid speech he seems to have written with a view of delivering it upon my resolution when it came up might have been withheld for a while.

Mr. President, surely the Senator from Utah does not mean to tell America that, as a representative of his sovereign State, he would be in favor of continuing this war, notwithstanding Germany's willingness, if it was such, to make peace upon our terms. Surely no Senator will have his people understand that he wants the children of his land to go to their death, and their land to the misery of its human hearts, merely for revenge. Surely, sir, no Senator would say that he wants the country kept at war and continued at war merely because it had entered the war. But if it be true, as I have assumed to apprehend, that Michaelis meant to speak for Germany, that she was ready now to take the terms of the allies if proposed through the United States, or Britain merely in exchange for the United States or the allies asking for them—surely, sir, we shall have then reached the full conclusion of my eminent friend from Utah; we shall have vindicated all of our principles and saved our men in millions from death; sustained our land in glory and encouraged all civilization by the result. Where is that man, if such a result could be obtained without the destruction of our people and the death of our people, who would not welcome it? Sir, I was merely suggesting, as I shall continue to suggest, what we should do if Germany should send us this lead of thought, that she would accept our terms of peace. We did not go into this war to fight perennially, ceaselessly, endlessly, for at some point peace is to be, but if it can be had at the outset rather than at the end of the great conflict with the universal death or general slaughter of mankind, surely there is no Senator who would decline it.

Now, sir, such was my view. If the able Senator is right, that Germany is merely tendering a ruse through Michaelis, and that her purpose is merely the domination of the world by power that she shall command, then I was wrong in my apprehension of that speech and in my deductions from it; but if I am right in my deductions from it, as I have given them to the Senate, that Germany would now accept peace and indicates very clearly that she would accept the terms of the allies and the United States if we but propose them, then, sir, I would ask, if such proposal could be accepted by the mere proposing of it, where is the man who would decline to do so?

I have concluded. I regret to so stir the heart of my distinguished and rather ferocious friend from Utah, but I am still a profound believer in the doctrine of the eminent poet Milton that

> Peace hath her victories
> No less renown'd than war.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I am very glad that this digression has intervened, as it gives me an opportunity to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that under the guise of peace there has been a great deal of discussion that might savor of treason. When a country is engaged in war and calling upon its resources of men and treasure, at the very time when the moral effect is most desired, a futile discussion of peace, no matter how much we may desire it, is out of place and probably embarrassing, not only to the Executive, but to the Army and the Navy in the field and on the sea.

I received yesterday a letter from an alarmed constituent, who inclosed me a paper published in Los Angeles, the American Woman, edited by Clara Shortridge Foltz, a brave and loyal woman, in which former Senator John D. Works has an article in answer to a patriotic appeal made by the editor to change his views on the war.

He replies that it is a pretense to claim that the war is one waged for democracy; that it was inaugurated by us for the purpose of supplying a market for the manufacturers of munitions and was inspired by corporate greed, and that it is "a disgrace to humanity and a crime against civilization." I suppose a Senator after he has departed from this body carries with him a certain amount of prestige, certainly among his neighbors and his friends, and the responsibility which is upon him for his utterance is not removed by the fact that he no longer sits in this Chamber. His service here was too recent for me to expatiate upon the character of the man. We know his pacifist views, and those views, sir, were for the most part expressed before we were engaged in war and during the period of proposed preparedness. But now that we are actually at war, I must say that any comment of the character contained in this article, from which I will briefly quote, not only involves great danger to his country by undermining that sentiment upon which this war must be conducted and that public opinion upon which our Government rests; but in conveying to the enemy even the intimation that among a considerable body of our citizens—claimed by him to be 75 per cent, if you please—there is disloyalty and lack of harmony in prosecuting the war upon which we have embarked, and which is no longer a debatable question.

I presume a man has a right to express his own sentiments whether in the Senate or out of the Senate; and, although it would be very easy to construe this matter as treasonable, I do not believe that the ex-Senator will be prosecuted for seditious utterances; but I am not quite sure whether an attempt will not be made by the post-office authorities to exclude the publication from the mails, because in the city of San Francisco a paper was excluded from the mails for containing very much less, in measure and in quality, of treasonable matter. The former Senator from California says:

> I look upon our entry into the war between foreign nations, involving issues in which our country had, and still has, no concern, as the most colossal mistake the Government has ever made. * * * It is a disgrace to civilization and a crime against humanity. * * * It is loudly declared that we entered the war to protect and defend democracy. What democracy? Not the democracy of our own country. It needs no protection against foreign aggression. It should confine its warlike efforts, if any are necessary, to the defense of American democracy and American rights on American soil. Did we enter the war in defense of democracy or to uphold any great governmental principle of liberty and justice? Not at all. * * *

There is much more to the same effect. In this manner, propounding questions to himself and answering them himself, the learned ex-Senator makes it appear that the war was unnecessary and was entered into not for the purpose of preserving democracy, liberty, and justice but of protecting merchants and manufacturers engaged in international trade, principally in war materials. In the pursuit of his argument he attacks the change of front of the President, ignoring the fact that it was the front that changed and not the President.

Former Senator Works has been fairly consistent in opposing measures of preparedness and has generally taken the pacifist view of nonresistance. The Spaniards, in their ruthless campaign against the aboriginal natives of America, called the people "pacificos" who bowed their necks without resistance to the Spanish yoke, and they were treated with the contempt which they deserved and suffered for centuries from the oppression which overwhelmed them, until the armed democracy, in 1898, unshackled them in Cuba and the Philippines. The Belgians, the French, the Russians, the English, the Italians, and the Irish have preserved their dignity and self-respect by resisting oppression, and they have bequeathed this priceless possession—honor and courage—to their descendants, who have largely peopled the United States. In order to preserve liberty and justice they have never hesitated to make the supreme sacrifice.

When Richelieu directed De Mauprat to deliver at any cost an important message, De Mauprat protested the difficulty and the danger, in which his life might be lost. Then thundered the great cardinal-statesman:

> I bade thee grasp that packet as thy honor, a jewel worth whole hecatombs of lives."

I bring this matter up because there is in the minds of the people a question whether we are making too great a sacrifice in entering a war prosecuted by our allies, and in which it is claimed we have no direct concern. President Wilson has demonstrated that this is a war against mankind, and therefore it is our concern and more intimately that it affects the honor, aye, the life, of the Republic.

President Wilson, sincerely committed as he is to peace, criticized by his countrymen from one end of the land to the other for "watchful waiting" and "intolerable delay" and for being "too proud to fight," said in his message to Congress,

February 3, 1917, announcing the severance of diplomatic relations with Germany:

I think that you will agree with me that, in view of this declaration, which suddenly and without prior intimation of any kind, deliberately withdraws the solemn assurance given in the Imperial Government's note of the 4th of May, 1916, this Government has no other alternative, consistent with the dignity and honor of the United States, but to take the course which, in its note of the 18th of April, 1916, it announced that it would take in the event that the German Government did not declare and effect an abandonment of the methods of submarine warfare which it was then employing and to which it now purposes again to resort.

Patience exhausted and driven to the wall, the President declared at last for resistance. He is a pacifist—patriot,—but not a poltroon.

But Senator Works says that only a comparatively few people were affected by the lawless and barbarous acts of the Germans not only in violation of international law but in violation of their own voluntary agreements. The freedom of the seas is an established doctrine, and the right of our citizens in the pursuit of peaceful commerce to use the seas is fundamental. Commerce has been described as "the calm health of nations," and it is erroneous to say that only a few people are interested in it. Every farmer and artisan—every producer—as well as every merchant, manufacturer, shipbuilder, and shipowner, is interested in keeping the seas open, and when the Senator intimates that it is a national right which might easily be surrendered to avert war it would be interesting to know at what stage he would begin to resist encroachment upon national rights. I gather from his article that he would wait until the enemy had actually invaded the continental United States, and then, if he could not compromise, like the natives of Cuba and the Philippines with the Spaniard, he would, in order to prevent absolute extinction, put up some sort of a fight with sticks and staffs. Having neither the means of fighting nor the disposition to fight, the American democracy, according to the ideals of Senator Works, would not only be a pusillanimous and helpless thing but would not be a democracy at all. If we did not bow our neck to the oppressor, our neck would be broken by the oppressor. We either have to effectively defend our house or take the place of the doormat.

Some one has said:

There are two kinds of government—one in which the people show their teeth at one another, and the other in which they show their tongues and lick the feet of the strongest.

As between the armed, virile, and vigilant democracy showing its teeth, and the craven population, cowering under the lash of the aggressor, there can be no choice in the minds of free men.

Is life so sweet and peace so dear that they are to be bought at the price of chains and slavery?

Germany showed her set purpose to break down international law, flout international rights, violate international treaties, enslave and destroy innocent people by land and sea, disregard solemn obligations, and ignore the protests which were made in courteous yet firm language by the President of the United States, speaking for the American democracy, until the President, in his boundless patience, gave notice that, however great was our reluctance to engage in costly and murderous warfare, if Germany persisted in her aggression, there was only one course for a self-respecting people to pursue. Germany chose war. Here was the stage at which we either had to stand fast or run away. If we stood fast, there was a reasonable expectation of defending our place, our position, our rights, our dignity as a sovereign nation, under whose sheltering ægis the people of the world were free to come, untrammeled by tyranny, and pursue life and happiness. If we ran away, we would not have avoided war, because war unfailingly would have pursued us. If democracy, liberty, and human rights are locked up in the fortunes of the United States, then democracy, liberty, and human rights, and their survival become the issue of the war, and it was the part of wisdom to enter the war against Germany and German pretensions in alliance with the other powers, because sooner or later, in case of the success of German arms, we would have had to meet the enemy alone.

Has the Senator forgotten the Holy Alliance and the treaty of Verona, where the autocratic powers, after the Napoleonic wars, banded together for the purpose of preventing the spread of democracy at home and abroad? The South American Republics had declared their independence, and the powers had allied themselves to destroy them and destroy the democratic sentiment which had sprung up in Europe and which threatened to overthrow the domination by the few of the lives and happiness of the many.

Has the Senator so soon forgotten the bold attempt of the German Secretary of Foreign Affairs Zimmerman, before the declaration of war, to establish a secret alliance with Mexico and Japan to invade our rights and to turn friendly nations against us and transfer the war to this continent? Was not the wicked design to restore the border States to Mexico and give the Philippines, and, perhaps, the Pacific Slope, to Japan? Does the Senator forget the actual invasion of our peaceful land, before the severance of diplomatic relations, by murderous spies and dynamiters, who destroyed both property and life, which led to the expulsion of officers accredited to the German Imperial Embassy? Does he not see in these things an attempt on the life of free government on the American Continent?

This has therefore developed into a war for democracy, because Germany, the sternest military autocracy in Europe, had set out to Prussianize the world. If victorious its first attack would be upon the Monroe doctrine, and it would put every land south of the Mexican border under its rule and establish in this hemisphere that condition which would ultimately involve irrepressible conflict and make us permanently a militaristic nation.

No one can read the message of the President delivered to the Houses of Congress on April 2, 1917, without finding ample justification for the war, and believing that the very existence of America as a peaceful democracy was involved in its outcome. We might have stayed out, abandoned France, England, Italy, and Russia to their fate, accumulated great wealth, and bided our time, but that our time would come there can be no manner of doubt. Our national humiliation, however, the consciousness of cowardice, the pusillanimity of our Government would have so undermined our national self-respect and so impaired our powers of organization and resistance, if not our very national spirit itself, that we would become as easy victims to the aggressor as the lamb is to the wolf. I can not think of Senator Works—amiable, benevolent, and optimistic—but that I recall the lines of Alexander Pope:

The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason would he skip and play?
Pleased to the last, he crops the flowery food
And licks the hands just raised to spill his blood.

Such leadership as his would lead us into the shambles. The President in this message said:

The present German warfare against commerce is a warfare against mankind. It is a war against all nations. * * * Each nation must decide for itself how it will meet it. We must put excited feeling away. Our motives will not be revenge or the victorious assertion of physical might of the Nation, but only the vindication of right, human right, of which we are only a single champion. There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making; we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. Wrongs against which we now array ourselves are not common wrongs; they cut to the very roots of human life.

Judge Works was once a committing magistrate and punished offenders, and still says the law must be obeyed, even though he personally dissents from the wisdom of the law. What answer has he, then, to this sentiment taken from the same message of President Wilson?—

We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrongdoing shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized States. * * * The steadfast concert for peace can never be maintained, except by a partnership of democratic nations. No autocratic government could be trusted to keep faith within it or observe its covenants. * * * Only free people can hold their purpose and their honor steady to the common end and prefer the interests of mankind to any narrow interests of their own.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], ingenuous as he is, confiding, believing what he hears, is disposed to regard the oracular utterances of the new minister of state of the German Empire as opening the doors of peace. The President gravely questions whether an iron and autocratic Government, whose methods are those of tyranny, can sit down in a council of democratic nations and cease to be a disturbing and a disorganizing element. So there will have to be more than oracular intimations; there will have to be written in black and white terms of peace before they can be considered as being offered in good faith; and if they are offered in black and white they may become, alas, a "scrap of paper," and they may be introduced merely for the purpose of disarming the more confiding and honorable nations in order to make the final blow more effective. We must be on our guard.

Germany has put herself out of the pale of civilized nations, and the Senator from Illinois must certainly bring to the Senate greater assurances of good faith than are indicated in the press dispatches.

But the President's message, which I have just quoted, gives a forecast of that concert of nations, loving freedom and willing to make sacrifices for it, which can alone insure the permanent peace of the world.

We are glad—

to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German people included; for the rights of nations great and small; and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon trusted foundations of political liberty.

It is a glorious thing, Mr. President, to see this free Nation, after having built its structure of liberty deep and strong in the hearts of its citizens, to shelter the hopes of mankind, maintain the power and at the same time the spirit to fight for its ideals in a world at war, not for the purpose of its greater enrichment or for the acquisition of territory, but simply to preserve what it has won in the past by the blood of its martyrs. It can not allow the world to recede under the dictation of a German Kaiser, having for his purpose greater power and further domination, trampling under his feet, in his unholy ambition, the rights of the humble and defenseless. America, dauntless and determined, resolute and resourceful, says, in the name of human rights which are epitomized in democracy, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther."

I am glad to have had this opportunity of making these reflections, because I have been in receipt, from my fellow citizens of various European extraction, of expressions of grave doubt as to not only the wisdom but the necessity of our having gone to war. I have not often obtruded my views upon the Senate, and I doubt if I have ever spoken at a time when a measure was before this body not strictly relating to the subject of my remarks; but receiving from my constituents this treasonable comment by the former Senator from California, I should like to stigmatize it as it deserves, and yet I would not stigmatize him.

Thomas Jefferson, in defense of the privilege of free speech, free thought, and free press, as I recollect, said that it did not affect the welfare of the Republic where reason was left free to combat error and every hostile and even treasonable utterance. Jefferson would bring before the forum of conscience every fact, every shred of evidence; and he says a man will be judged not by the rightness but by the uprightness of his decision. I believe the former Senator from California is wholly conscientious, that he believes exactly what he says; and as long as we are free here, without censorship in the Senate or in the press or on the platform, to answer him, I would give him the greatest freedom in his charter to speak. It was said of the British Parliament that, "Girt around by friends or foes, a man may speak the thing he will"; and, at any rate, he can be as wrong as he likes and as long as he likes in this Chamber.

I acquit ex-Senator Works, but I answer him. I hope the Post Office Department will not visit punishment upon the press that gave expression, without approval, to his utterance by denying it post-office facilities, because wherever this paper has gone I am going to see, if that is possible, that an adequate answer goes. That is the best way to meet treasonable utterance, and I can not say that any utterances possible in this land are more reprehensible than treasonable utterances, which give comfort to the enemy and demoralize our citizens and soldiers; and yet let us even tolerate the ebullitions of the former Senator from California, though they be manifestly not only in bad taste but dangerous and unpatriotic at this time, because he is by conviction and conscience a pacifist; he is a noncombatant; he will offer no resistance, no matter what humiliation is put upon him. He can not conceive that any insult would under any circumstances—and he so says—justify the blow. Feeling that way, we have more of pity than of blame to express; and when it is made known of men that such are his convictions, then his influence will just in that proportion be of little value. They may even evoke patriotic reaction by the apathetic. But no treason should be allowed to go unchallenged; and any incitement against the enforcement of the law should be suppressed because it is the law. This is a Government of law, and the Government has spoken.

I trust that my constituents who look dubiously upon this war under suggestions of that kind will realize when they hear the answer of their President, which I have quoted, that pacifist though he is, patriot he also is; that there is a time when resistance becomes absolutely necessary for the existence of the individual or of the State.

They say that self-defense is the best of all laws because the lawyers have not made it.

Whatever we have done in this Chamber by way of legislation for preparedness for war and providing the means for war, it counts as nothing compared with the primal and instinctive right of a man, and equally of a State, to defend himself or itself. Therefore I claim that this is a war of self-defense, a war of self-preservation, untainted by the unholy ambition of any Kaiser, unaffected in any degree by aggrandizement sought or advantage to be gained, and that we have come to look upon it, under the leadership of our President, as entitled in this world crisis of democracy to the help and support of our arms.

If we had remained out of the war and saved our sons and saved our treasure, we would be very rich in pocket and secure, temporarily at least, in the possession of our boys; but, as I heard a Senator say the other day, he could not explain without shame to his posterity that living in this time, with a family of boys, that they had failed to respond to the call of the colors—failed to respond to the call of country. "It is not all of life to live, nor all of death to die." No man who survives this war, having participated in it, shall ever regret it. As Henry V said before the Battle of Agincourt, so says the Republic, "He to-day who sheds his blood with me shall be my brother." No man who is a slacker and avoids his duty and who "holds his manhood cheap" can hold up his head among his fellows when history shall record the heroic events of this heroic year.

Mr. FLETCHER obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator. I will only take a very few moments, Mr. President.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me one minute?

Mr. McCUMBER. I was about to present a matter in the time of the Senator from Florida, and as he has the floor the Senator will be compelled to address his request to him.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I ask the Senator from Florida, then, if he will give me just one minute? There are two sentences I should like to say just at this point.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is entirely agreeable to me, Mr. President. I shall be very glad to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Apropos of what has been said by my colleague from California [Mr. PHELAN].

Mr. President, there are very few of the views of John D. Works with which I am in sympathy. There are fewer still of my views with which he is in sympathy. I am in little sympathy with what has been quoted to-day by my colleague from California; but I feel that there is one thing that ought to be said:

When this Nation was in danger, when the call came from the President of the United States for volunteers in 1861, John D. Works shouldered a musket, and, in the old uniform of blue, he fought through that war for the preservation of the United States of America.

Mr. PHELAN. I am very glad the Senator has reminded me of that, and I am pleased to have it in the RECORD.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will also yield my time to the Senator, if he desires it.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, Mr. President, like the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I am not in entire harmony with some of the views of ex-Senator Works, and with some of his views I am quite out of harmony. But during the time that ex-Senator Works was in this Chamber as a representative of his State I regarded him as one of the most sincere, one of the most conscientious, and one of the most courageous men in the Senate, and I have no doubt but that when he wrote this article he wrote it from motives quite as patriotic as the motives which actuated him when he shouldered his musket and went to fight for the flag.

We may be wholly in disagreement with him, as I am, with reference to the views which he entertains with reference to war under the circumstances which confronted us at the time war was declared. Nevertheless I pay to former Senator John D. Works the tribute of my sincere respect, and I wish that all men were at all times in their public service actuated by as high and courageous motives as those which actuate John D. Works. He is, in my judgment, the proud possessor of a clean conscience and of a fearless and upright mind. We may wholly disagree with some of his views, but no man can doubt his sincerity.

DISLOYAL UTTERANCES IN NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have received a large number of letters from constituents in my State appealing to me to ascertain some means by which they could rid themselves of copperheads and traitors in their midst. I have felt that there was no better or more appropriate time than this time to read one of those letters into the RECORD, that I may speak to the President of the United States, and through the President of the United States to the Postmaster General concerning the loyalty and patriotism of some of those whom they have appointed and who are now holding Federal positions in my own State, and leave it with the President and the Postmaster General to determine whether or not the latter—because I do not hold the President himself responsible for these appointments—will be as active in putting traitors out of the post offices as he was active in getting Republicans out, that their places might be filled by others.

I want to call attention to one little incident in one of the small towns in my State where a lecturer was enertained and dined by the postmistress the next day after the lecture. In this lecture she referred to the American mothers who had sent their sons to die in France as brood sows, producing only for slaughter for the protection of J. P. Morgan's millions, or words of like import. She referred to the soldiers who had responded to the call of President Wilson, who did not wait to be drafted but who answered his first call and enlisted as volunteers in the Army and Navy, as fit only for use in France as fertilizer.

I ask that one of these letters may be read without the name. I will read one other letter, or a portion of it, and let the Postmaster General know in this way that unless he takes cognizance of matters of this kind there are patriotic people in the State of North Dakota who are liable to take the matter into their own hands and deal with it in their own way.

I ask that the Secretary may read this letter, omitting the name. I want to say that I omit the name simply because I have not had authority to use it; but I know the gentleman who writes, and I am positive that he would be willing that I should use the name, as he is not lacking in courage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks that a letter may be read without using the name. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

BOWMAN, N. DAK., July 18, 1917.

Hon. P. J. MCCUMBER,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The people out in this part of the State of North Dakota, who are really Americans and who feel it their duty to support the Government, and who are doing their utmost to support the Government and assist in any way possible during these critical times, have been consulting together relative to what steps should be taken in order to suppress sedition and disloyalty toward the Government. It seems that the authorities in this immediate vicinity either do not want to or else do not understand how to render such aid and assistance to the Government as should be at this time. After consultation these citizens requested me to take the matter up with you in hopes that you may be able to break through or get behind the breastworks of the coterie which upholds such disloyalty. I do not know whether or not you have any means of bringing the condition which exists here directly before the authorities who should deal with them, but the condition has become such that unless the Federal Government takes a hand in the matter the good citizens of this community, those who are real Americans, will take matters into their own hands with possible serious results.

Last night we had a speaker here in town by the name of Kate Richards O'Hare, who, I was informed, was a former editor of the National Rip-Saw. Her entire speech, I was informed, as I was not myself present, was of an anarchistic variety, tending in its entirety toward the discouraging of enlistment and resistance of draft. Among other statements, she stated that it was a good thing that those who enlisted did so, as they were no good and only fit for fertilizer anyhow. Those few from here who have enlisted in the Navy and are not yet called into active service are to-day being ridiculed and made the object of derision by this same coterie of traitors, and it really seems to us that after these young men have offered their services to the Government and have been accepted—and they are splendid young men, the kind that make American citizens that we are proud of—that the Government owes them the duty of protection from attacks of this kind, and the sentiment here is such that if the Government refuses, fails, or is unable to do so, the citizens here who are friends of these volunteers and who recognize their sterling and honorable qualities, will do so. These citizens, however, are peaceful and law-abiding citizens and desire to bring the matter before the constituted authorities. A telegram has been sent to our United States district attorney, also to lieutenant commander of the Navy at Minneapolis, Minn. We do not know of any further steps to take and we are appealing to you as our representative in Washington in hopes that you may be able to do something for us.

Another statement by this speaker last night was to the effect that the American women who did not oppose the war and resist the Government in taking of the young men for the purposes of war were no better than the American brood sow, as they willingly raised sons for the purpose of being murdered in the defense of the $4,000,000,000 that J. P. Morgan owned. Now, we do not feel that the Government should ask us to submit not only to the insults to our young men who have the patriotism and courage to lend themselves for the protection of our Government but also submit to the vulgar insults to our wives, mothers, and sisters.

It is also an unfortunate thing that the only representative of the Federal Government which reaches every small town and hamlet, namely, the postmaster, is here well known to be in sympathy with speakers and principles of this kind. As a matter of fact, the husband of the postmistress here, and who is really the controlling influence in the post office, is one of the leaders for the distribution of propaganda of this kind. In fact, he has right in the post office made slurring remarks about the American flag to a patron who came into said post office wearing an American flag in the lapel of his coat. The speaker last night was brought here by the bunch spreading this seditious propaganda. A bill announcing the meeting, with a large picture of the speaker, was conspicuously posted in the post office—the postmistress and her husband both attended the speech and enthusiastically applauded the seditious utterances of the speaker. It is common knowledge in this village as well as the surrounding community that all the employees in the post office are opposed to the aims and efforts of the Government. I am a member of the executive committee of the chapter of the Red Cross that we have organized. We are going to do our utmost, but it does not seem to us that the Government should permit such obstacles to exist and to be thrown in the path of those who are endeavoring to do what they can in assisting the Government. Secret meetings are being held by the people who are spreading this propaganda almost nightly. We have almost reached the limit of our endurance and we feel the Federal authorities should make an investigation and take drastic action.

I have been informed that the present postmistress is intending to resign and that the frame up is to have a nephew of her husband appointed in her place. This young man was just naturalized as an American citizen during the month of June last. His registration card would scarcely hold all the reasons he gave for being exempt from military service. He was formerly editor of the Bowman Citizen here, and the files of this newspaper which he edited will indicate his feeling toward the Government and his ideas of patriotism. We believe that our community needs attention from the Federal authorities, and we hope that you may be able to assist us in bringing this about.

Will you not kindly let me know whether or not you will be able to be of any assistance to us; and if not, would you direct our efforts into such a channel that they would receive attention?

Very truly, yours,

Since writing this letter I have learned that our postmistress has been entertaining last night's speaker to-day; that they had dinner together at the hotel and visited and hobnobbed together.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it just to say at this time that as I understand it neither the postmistress nor the husband is German or German born. It is not a German question at all. They are, as I understand it, simply socialists, with anarchistic tendencies, if the information which I have received is correct. The German people of the State of North Dakota, while they very naturally regret that there exists a state of war between their fatherland and this country, are nevertheless patriotic American citizens, and will do their whole duty in this war, and this propaganda is not stirred up by them, nor are they in any way responsible for it.

Now, Mr. President, I ask that another letter coming from the same town, but from another source, or a copy of the letter, which has been sent to the district attorney, may be read into the RECORD. I am taking this method of presenting the case to the Postmaster General. I am certain that President Wilson would not knowingly retain in official positions those guilty of sedition or who countenance the traitorous words charged in these letters.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Before the letter is read, will the Senator mention the name of the village or town?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Bowman, N. Dak.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. What is the name of the postmistress and what is her husband's name?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The name is given there. Potter, I believe. It is in one of those letters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota wish to have the letter sent to the desk read or ordered printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wish to have the letter read, Mr. President. It is a copy of a letter that was sent to the district attorney of the State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unless there is objection, the letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

JULY 19, 1917.

Mr. M. A. HILDRETH,
United States District Attorney, Fargo, N. Dak.

DEAR SIR: On Tuesday evening, July 17, as I understand it, an alleged socialist, Kate Richards O'Hare, formerly editor of the National Rip-Saw, gave a lecture in the Cozy Theater at Bowman under the auspices of local Socialists, which includes the husband of the Democratic postmistress at this point. In the course of this woman's remarks it is stated to me on good authority that the woman said in her lecture that "It was a good thing that those who enlisted as soldiers in the present crisis did enlist, because they would be converted into fertilizer, and that is all that they were good for, anyway." And further on she made a remark to the effect that "American women were being used simply as brood sows in the rearing of men to be used as soldiers."

A person coming into a town and being allowed to talk that way at the present time, you can realize, arouses a good deal of honest indignation among loyal citizens. The matter was put up to W. A. Fleming, county attorney for Bowman County, asking to have a warrant issued for the woman's arrest, but, as I understand it, he read over the telephone a letter purporting to have been received from your office advising against arresting people for such an offense, because it might stir up trouble among the foreign population. I am certainly surprised at this and really do not know what to think of it.

I am submitting the above to you as it was related to me at my office at Bowman yesterday morning, and I was asked for my advice in the premises. My advice was to the effect that this should be put up to the proper authorities, but in the event of the proper authorities not acting, an exhibition of that kind should not be tolerated in Bowman in the future but should be prevented by the loyal and law-abiding citizens of this community. I am satisfied that you will agree with me that this is no time for cowardice. Discretion at all times is advisable and commendable, but there is a limit to toleration along such lines. The Goldman woman and her partner have just been sent to Federal prison for a similar offense, and I do not know of any reason for showing partiality in that line. I will be glad to hear from you on the subject.

Very truly, yours, ——— ———.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Postmaster General will investigate this matter upon the statements as they will appear in the RECORD.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not know but that it might be in order now to take up the river and harbor bill. The Senate has been engaged in discussions which are all very interesting in many ways, but at the same time foreign to the bill that is pending before the Senate. I hope the relief upon the mental pressure will be sufficient now to enable us to get down to a cool and deliberate consideration of what is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Referring to the observation of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], made some time ago and applicable now, it is incumbent upon me to make a statement regarding the nature and provisions of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator pardon me for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KENYON. I think there are some Senators out of the Chamber who desire to be present when the Senator speaks. I made the point of no quorum a while ago, when I thought the Senator was about to take the floor, and I now make the point of no quorum.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish the Senator would not make it, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. KENYON. There are only about 20 Senators here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Bankhead	James	Norris	Sheppard
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sherman
Borah	Jones, N. Mex.	Page	Smith, Ariz.
Broussard	Kendrick	Phelan	Swanson
Culberson	Kenyon	Pittman	Thompson
Curtis	King	Poindexter	Tillman
Fletcher	Kirby	Ransdell	Underwood
France	Lewis	Reed	Vardaman
Hale	McCumber	Robinson	Wadsworth
Harding	Martin	Saulsbury	Watson
Hollis	Nelson	Shafroth	Weeks

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BRADY] on account of illness, and to let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I will ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] are engaged on a conference committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. COLT, Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. NEW, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names.

Mr. LODGE, Mr. STERLING, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I shall attempt to present as concisely as I can the characteristics of the bill. The further observation of the Senator from Iowa to the effect that the bill is, I believe as he characterized it, one of the worst ever presented to the Senate, arises, I am quite sure, from an entire misapprehension on his part of the nature and character of the bill. I must believe that the Senator has misconceived the whole purpose of the bill and its provisions. I think he has a misconception of the plan upon which the bill is framed, the policy back of the bill, and the purposes of the bill. Otherwise it is incomprehensible to me how he could reach the conclusion that the bill ought to be condemned.

Perhaps just at this point I ought to make reference to the history of the bill, how the bill originated, and that will indicate what was in the minds of the framers of the bill and to a considerable extent the nature of the bill. I do not know that I had better do that than to give as authority upon that subject the statement made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House when the bill was presented there. It is so clear and so admirable in itself that I could not hope to improve upon it, and I will just say it comes with additional force—it is what might be said to be ex cathedra. Mr. SMALL, when the bill was presented, said:

> Every appropriation made in this bill is made for purposes which are not covered by the available balances on hand.

That, I believe, is the basis of some criticism of the bill and has given rise to some misapprehension that there appear available balances on hand yet unexpended which have been appropriated in past years, and it is argued that they are sufficient to meet the present emergency. Of course if it were true that argument would be sound and we could not find fault with our friends who oppose the bill if they felt really and could show that the appropriations already had been made and there were available funds already on hand to take care of the matters which need attention at this time. The report of the committee, however, will show the fact to be that these alleged available balances are in no wise applicable to a single item in the bill. They are largely available balances which are dependent upon cooperation or conditions precedent before they can be used. They are available balances for carrying on projects outside of the bill, and none of those available balances can be employed in the improvements mentioned in the bill. So when you consider that fact the criticism that available balances are already on hand sufficient to accomplish this work, and therefore there is no need of the bill, falls absolutely to the ground. Yet I can see how people, giving a casual attention to the bill, might reach a conclusion such as I have indicated, that there is no absolute necessity for the bill because available balances are still on hand.

It must be remembered, as I said, that those available balances shown by the report to be on hand can not be applied, not one dollar's worth, toward the improvements specified in the bill; that they are available balances which can not be used until certain conditions are complied with, as specified in the appropriations which provided them, on the one hand, and available balances that must be applied to projects entirely outside of the bill and that are not mentioned in the bill.

Another ground of criticism has been that there is a group system provided for in this bill. I shall refer to that somewhat later. That group system has been in operation and has been the practice, the plan, or provision in every river and harbor bill since Mr. Burton was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House and established that practice there. It is enlarged upon somewhat here for reasons which I shall give, purely because of being beneficial in the administration of the act. I will mention that somewhat later.

Mr. NELSON. Does not that very grouping, as a matter of fact, lead to greater economy and to the lessening of appropriations?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; that is the object of it; and undoubtedly it had the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the War Department upon the conviction that it leads to economy and efficiency in the matter of administration of the river and harbor act.

Now, Mr. SMALL went on to say:

> Every appropriation made in this bill is made for purposes which are not covered by the available balances on hand. I will ask gentlemen, if they will kindly do so, to wait until I present the general features of the bill, although I will be very glad in the meantime, if gentlemen think it proper, to submit to an interruption.
> If there should be a lapse of a year, there will be great loss ensuing to the country. There will be deterioration of channels. There will be loss in the laying up o' tugboats, of dredge boats, snag boats, and other vessels; the discharge of trained crews; the disorganization of other trained forces in the different engineering districts connected with permanent river and harbor works. Many improvements which have heretofore been adopted, other than channels, such as jetties, dikes, retaining walls, piers, breakwaters, and revetment work, will disintegrate and decay unless they are kept in repair. It will cost less to make those repairs promptly than if postponed. The passage of this bill at this session is distinctly in the interest of economy.

He was speaking first of the need and demand for this legislation at the present time. Then he says:

> I do not hesitate to say that at the beginning of this session it was my opinion that we should pass a river and harbor bill similar to the bill which passed at the last session of Congress, subject only to such modifications as might have been made necessary by the lapse of time or by war emergencies. But it seemed to be the opinion of the House—

And here we get to the origin of this bill, the foundation upon which it has been built—> upon both sides that this bill should be confined to such items as could be considered emergencies, so that the River and Harbor Committee at its first meeting, after full discussion, directed the chairman to confer with the Secretary of War and ask him to make specific recommendations within those limitations. And it is not improper to state that the Secretary called upon the Chief of Engineers and directed him to make specific recommendations covering—

Now, this is the gist of the whole matter—

first, the necessary maintenance items—

That is, to maintain projects already adopted and in the course of improvement and completion, maintenance pure and simple, to see that the work they have done does not go to pieces and become a total loss and waste. That is the first item covered in this bill—maintenance of the completed projects—second, such items for the further improvement of projects as have been heretofore adopted where great loss would ensue if there was a lapse of a river and harbor bill, or were connected with national defense.

That is the second item, where there are improvements under way and where there would be a deterioration of the channel, where there would be waste and loss unless those improvements were continued. That item is taken care of here.

Third, such new projects as might be necessary as war emergencies or connected directly or indirectly with the successful prosecution of the war:

Those are the only three heads by which this legislation is to be classified. It is upon one of those three propositions that every item in this bill is based. Can you find any objection to it? The bill provides, first, for the maintenance of projects already completed; second, the improvement of projects under way, so as to prevent waste and loss of what has been done, and all of them heretofore approved by the engineers and adopted by Congress; and, third, those which are considered as war emergencies or connected directly or indirectly with the successful prosecution of the war.

Can a bill which takes care of these three propositions be denounced as a "pork-barrel bill"? Can it be condemned as the worst bill ever submitted to Congress? It is an absolute emergency measure, and was framed for the purpose of accomplishing the three essential necessary objects which I have mentioned.

The last river and harbor appropriation act was approved July 27, 1916. It carried appropriations aggregating $40,598,135. The amount yet to be appropriated of the balance unappropriated for contracts authorized by previous acts is estimated to be $2,500,000.

The act of July, 1916, provided the appropriations estimated to be necessary for maintenance and improvement of the rivers and harbors to the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1917. That has already passed.

Another bill was due before the close of the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session. Such a bill was reported to the House on January 13, 1917, and passed by the House of Representatives on January 26, 1917. With some amendments it was reported to the Senate February 10, 1917; but, with several other annual appropriation bills, it was not reached for consideration before the session came to a close March 4, 1917.

This bill is absolutely necessary, if we are not to abandon our rivers and harbors, in order to provide for the essential maintenance and improvement of these highways of transportation.

On the advice of the War Department some new projects have been included which have been surveyed, estimated for, and approved as being closely related to the national defense. They are shown by the reports which are before you and will be mentioned more particularly later.

NEW PROJECTS.

The bill approved March, 1913—March, 1913, mind you; four years ago last March—was the last river and harbor bill which made appropriations for new projects, except the Senate inserted a few carrying less than $2,000,000 in the bill of 1916.

Please do not forget that the last river and harbor bill which carried an appropriation for new projects was the bill of March, 1913. I believe that in 1916 there were a few projects placed on the bill after it came from the other House and got to the Senate, but they did not amount to a great deal.

The bill which passed the House January, 1917, carried appropriations for 81 new projects selected from a list of 167 unadopted projects which had been favorably reported on and accumulating, demanding attention, since March, 1913. It was estimated it would require to complete these 81 new projects, $47,050,112, with initial appropriations of $8,967,839, or 19 per cent of total estimate. The total of appropriations in that bill for new projects amounted to $8,967,839. If that bill had passed the Senate and been approved, the total of appropriations for new projects since March, 1913, would have been only about $10,000,000. That bill, as stated, was not reached on the Senate Calendar.

The pending bill carries appropriations for 36 new projects selected from a list of 187 which have up to this time been recommended by the Chief of Engineers as worthy of improvement. The estimated cost to complete all those 187 projects is approximately $144,000,000.

To complete the 36 new projects adopted and provided for in this bill the estimate is $37,978,573. To complete those new projects in New York Harbor alone the estimate is $19,240,000. So that the New York Harbor improvements under this bill will cost nearly half of the total of the new projects provided for in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to ask the Senator how much is appropriated in this bill for the 36 new projects of which he speaks?

Mr. FLETCHER. The initial appropriation carried in this bill for new projects amounts to $6,719,000.

As to surveys, as indicating that we have nearly reached the limit—and this is important, I think; the country ought to understand it, and the Senate ought to understand it—as indicating that we have nearly reached the limit of the necessity and the demand for new improvements it is interesting to note the diminution in the surveys required. The act of 1915 provided for 215 surveys. That of 1916, for 128 surveys. The surveys in this bill are practically the same as in the bill which passed the House in 1917 and was not reached in the Senate, to-wit, 76.

So in the last three years we have gone from 215 surveys in the river and harbor bill to 76. Remember that only about 33 per cent of the surveys which have been ordered by Congress have been favorably reported by the engineers.

Only about 33 per cent of all the surveys for the six years prior to 1915 were favorably reported. Of all the surveys ordered in past river and harbor acts, 147 have not been reported on by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may ask a question for information, the Senator has referred to a given number of projects which have been reported upon favorably by the Board of Engineers. I have forgotten the number.

Mr. FLETCHER. There have been 187 such reports up to this time.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator advise me what number of such projects were reported unfavorably by this commission during that time?

Mr. FLETCHER. I was just stating that.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will recall, that was the exact point that I was making—that of the surveys which have been ordered by Congress, only about 33 per cent have been reported on favorably, and that of all the surveys ordered under river and harbor acts, 147 have not been reported on by the Chief of Engineers at all as yet. Of these 5 were ordered in the act of 1912, 4 in that of 1913, 43 in the act of 1915, and 95 in the act of 1916. We are therefore fast approaching the end of new projects. It will soon be simply a question of maintaining those which have been adopted and improved. No new rivers are being created. No new harbors are being discovered. Soon all we possess will have been examined and those considered worthy of improvement will have been improved. The rivers and harbors act of 1914 carried a lump-sum appropriation of $20,000,000.

Senators will recall that the bill of 1915 carried $25,000,000. Then came the bill of 1916, which I have mentioned, which carried a few new projects, which were put on in the Senate. Then came the bill of 1917, which failed because it was not reached. Now we have this bill, which is purely an emergency proposition.

The total of appropriations provided for in the bill which passed the House last January amounted to $38,362,339 and authorizations aggregating $1,125,000. The total carried by this bill as it passed the House June 26, 1917, is $27,696,150, and as reported to the Senate by the Committee on Commerce July 10, 1917, $27,826,150.

We have added $136,000, in other words, $100,000 of which is to take care of the commerce provided for under section 16 of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator a question concerning the Mississippi River. The river and harbor bill generally carried, did it not, five or six million dollars for the Mississippi River, which in the flood-control bill now takes an appropriation under the sundry civil bill, so that the Mississippi is not covered, as I understand, by this bill except the upper part of it?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Iowa is entirely right. The lower portion of the Mississippi River, which is taken care of in the flood-control bill, was not included in this bill.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if it was $5,000,000 which we appropriated in this last Congress?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is my recollection—$5,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. With $27,000,000 in this bill, it would bring it up to $32,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. That was formerly taken care of in the river and harbor bill, until the flood-control bill was passed.

NECESSITY FOR THE LEGISLATION.

As stated, the bill is required to provide for the necessary maintenance and improvements of rivers and harbors for the period ending June 30, 1918. I need not argue the wisdom of such legislation. It would be sheer folly to exhibit indifference, let alone opposition, to the measure. It would be almost a crime to permit the measure to fail. I can not conceive of any such attitude on the part of any Member of this body.

It must be recognized that the people of this country rightfully insist on the improvement by the Government of the navigable waters and the harbors, over which the Government has jurisdiction and exercises control, as instrumentalities of commerce. This has been our policy for a century. It is the policy of every great country. Even now, in the midst of the most distressing war in all history, Germany and France continue the work on their waterways. When there is an appalling car shortage, when the very necessities can not move to markets as needed, when railroads are inadequate to transport the freights tendered to them, when there is insistent demand for the utilization of every available means of transportation in order that producers and consumers may be served, when ships are needed and being sought to carry our products across the sea and bring to us those we require from other lands, we can not afford to abandon our waterways and our harbors. It would be difficult to conceive a course that would lead to greater injury to the country and more serious inconvenience and harm to the people generally.

That is putting it purely on the commercial feature and saying nothing of the necessity for these projects in this bill as military needs and as national-defense measures.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Perhaps I did not make my question clear. The Senator answered, but I did not quite understand his answer. The Senator has stated that certain surveys have been authorized by the Congress and a certain number have been reported upon favorably. The question I intended to ask the Senator was, How many of the surveys which have been authorized by the Congress have been reported by the engineers unfavorably?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will recall my statement that the surveys provided for in all previous acts and not yet reported on amount to 147.

Mr. POMERENE. I recall that.

Mr. FLETCHER. As to the total number that have been provided for and favorably reported on, I do not believe I have the figures before me. I think, however, they are in the report. I stated that only about 33 per cent of those that had been ordered were favorably reported on.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; I understand that; but, to put the question in another way, how many surveys have been made which were reported on unfavorably?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know that I can give the precise number. I will be glad to look that up for the Senator. It may be possible that I have the figures somewhere of the precise number of surveys that have been ordered—does the Senator mean from the beginning down to date?

Mr. POMERENE. Well, the Senator has dwelt upon the number of surveys which have been authorized since the present plan of river improvement was adopted. I am interested in knowing with what circumspection this board of engineers goes about its work. Are these projects favorably reported upon as a matter of course, or are they really decided upon their merits? I have heard so many things about them that I would like to know with what care the examining authority has proceeded.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will allow me, and if I am not anticipating the chairman of the committee, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that while in this bill we provide, as in other river and harbor bills, in a general way for new surveys, yet at the end of the provision there is found this language:

Provided, That no examination or survey herein provided shall be made until after the close of the war with Germany, except such as the Secretary of War shall direct.

In other words, while there are a large number of surveys provided for in this bill, yet none of them may be made or will be made unless the Secretary of War especially directs.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it is well to have that safeguard; but still that does not answer the question about which I was seeking information.

Mr. NELSON. None of them can be made during the war, unless the Secretary especially so directs.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is right.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator will find that on page 41 of the bill. It is a provision that has never been in any river and harbor bill heretofore.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will yield to me, I should like to answer, if I can, a portion of the question of the Senator from Ohio in regard to the circumspection with which the surveys are made.

I beg to say to the Senator from Ohio that it seems to me they are as carefully made as it is possible for human beings to make anything. To illustrate the process: In the first place, before a survey can be made by the Engineer Corps an act of Congress ordering it is required. The Chief of Engineers then sends to the local engineer in the locality ordering him to make an examination. Say there is a survey, for instance, ordered in the vicinity of Cincinnati or Cleveland in the State of the Senator from Ohio. The United States engineer located at either of those places is instructed to make, first, a preliminary examination of the project. He makes that, finding out all he can on what might be called a preliminary recognizance. He goes over the ground; he goes over it in a boat, if he can, or on horseback, if he can not go in a boat; he looks into it as carefully as possible and finds out all he can. If it looks good to him, he reports to the division engineer that he thinks the project is worthy of being very carefully surveyed. That preliminary report is then sent to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, a body composed of seven engineers of the United States Army, officers with the rank, usually, of major up to colonel, most of them being lieutenant colonels and colonels. They examine the preliminary report, and, if they think well of it, report to the Chief of Engineers that, in their judgment, a survey should actually be made of that project. Then the Chief of Engineers sends an order back to the local engineer with instructions to make the survey. Thereupon, the local engineer sends a surveying party into the field, and frequently it takes a year or two to make the survey. It is gone into in very great detail and circumstance. Every physical fact connected with the project is ascertained; everything in connection with the commerce, present or prospective, is ascertained by this engineer, and when all of this is found out he makes his report to the division engineer, an officer with the rank of colonel, who passes upon the project. If the local engineer is adverse to it, that usually ends it. If he is favorable, the division engineer passes upon it, and sends it back to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, who then pass upon it.

It is customary for the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors to give a hearing to the local people. The Senator from Ohio would probably be called upon, if it were in his State, to appear before the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, accompanied by the citizens of the locality, and be requested to assist the board by giving all the facts in his possession relating especially to commerce and to the need of the project. I have attended many of these hearings where large bodies of citizens have come long distances in order to convey to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors everything that it was possible for them to tell about a project.

With the reports of the local engineer, the division engineer, and the statements of citizens, briefs, and everything the men can possibly bring to bear on the project, the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors finally says, "This is good" or "This is bad." If they say it is good, it then goes before the Chief of Engineers, who, if he also approves it, recommends it to the Secretary of War, and then the report is made to Congress.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. In just one moment I will yield. The local engineer is 1, the division engineer 2, the 7 engineers who constitute the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors make 9, and the Chief of Engineers makes 10; in other words, 10 men must pass upon a project and approve that project before it has any status before Congress. It seems to me it would be impossible to devise a scheme more carefully worked out and safeguarded.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. KENYON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio first.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator's recital as to the course of procedure is all very interesting, and I have no doubt it gives opportunity for the exercise of very great care. Ten engineers are required to pass on these projects, according to the statement made by the Senator from Louisiana. They have passed upon a given number of these projects, and my question is up to date. Since the adoption of this plan of procedure how many of these projects have been favorably reported upon by the 10 engineers, and how many have been rejected?

Mr. RANSDELL. I can not answer the Senator how many have been favorably reported upon and how many have been rejected, but I think I can get the information by to-morrow. It is found in the reports of the engineers. The engineers make their reports in three large volumes, such as I have before me.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think I can answer what is in the Senator's mind. He is not concerned so much about the precise number of projects that have been ordered surveyed from the beginning of time to date——

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no.

Mr. FLETCHER. What he wants to know is how many of the projects which have been reported on by the engineers favorably, perhaps, have not been adopted by Congress and how many of them are pending.

Mr. POMERENE. No; that does not quite answer my question. I recognize that propositions of this kind are presented to Representatives and to Senators, and they are urged to use their good offices in getting surveys made and having these improvements authorized and appropriations made therefor. Now, let me just give a single instance that disturbed me a good deal. Several years ago I was written to concerning a certain project in my State. I immediately wrote that I would oppose it. I was advised at that time that a certain candidate for the lower House would favor it, although it was a little bit of a creek that never had even a toy boat on its placid and muddy bosom.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if that is among the survey items in this bill?

Mr. POMERENE. No; I do not think it ever got that far. It was used for campaign purposes more than anything else.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that if such a proposition had gone to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors it would have been turned down cold and hard, and it should have been turned down cold and hard.

Mr. POMERENE. I am sure that is true.

Mr. RANSDELL. These engineers are as high class a set of men as there is in this country. They are the most independent men I have ever had to deal with. I have never asked them to do anything improper; but if I had, I am sure that they would have turned it down. I can say to the Senator that they have turned down considerably more than one-half of the projects upon which they have been asked to make surveys. That is my understanding of the matter.

I will say further that authorizations for surveys are placed in the bill without a very great deal of difficulty, because we do not have a chance to examine them. We put them in frequently on the request of a Senator, who comes before the committee and says, "This project in my State is a good one." We take what he says about it, and leave it to the engineers to decide; but we know that they are a disinterested set of men; we know that they are under oath when they make their reports on these projects; and, as a matter of fact, they have reported adversely on more projects than they have reported favorably. I think I can find the exact number for the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I will be glad to know that.

Mr. RANSDELL. Before I close I should like to show the Senator how elaborate these reports are. The three large volumes I hold in my hand [exhibiting] are the reports of the engineers for just one year. Every year we have three large volumes from the Engineer Corps in regard to river and harbor improvements.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I think it ought to be added to the graphic description of the Senator from Louisiana as to the course that one of these projects goes through, that it seems to have been the custom when the Board of Army Engineers reported against some of these important projects for the Senators and Representatives from the State affected to assemble and argue the matter out before the Board of Army Engineers; and, of course, even though they are the most honorable men, strong men, they could not always stand against the persuasion—the legitimate persuasion, undoubtedly—of Members of the Senate and Members of the other House. That has happened many times as the records show.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator put in the RECORD the facts in that case, because I think he is mistaken about it.

Mr. KENYON. I will show when I get to it that the Senator from Louisiana was interested in some of these projects. I am not criticizing the Senator; it was a perfectly legitimate thing to do; but those things do influence the Army engineers. There is not any question about that.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say, Mr. President, in regard to that, that I have appeared before the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, composed, as previously stated, of seven men, who act, in a sense, as an appellate court. I do not know any reason why a Senator, representating his State, or a Member of the other House, representing some interest in his State, should not appear before such a court to present facts and arguments. I have done that, and probably every other Senator and Representative interested in river and harbor improvements has done it; but I have never appeared, and I do not believe it can be shown that any Senator has appeared, before the local engineer or before the division engineer. We do not have an opportunity to appear until the case is presented before the Board of Engineers, sitting as a supreme court, with the record made up from the district and with the understanding that any new facts can be brought out. Citizens' committees and Senators and Representatives usually attend such hearings. Thank God, I am not so suspicious as to suppose that these seven engineers, these men trained at West Point, these men who have had but one scandal in their ranks in all the history of this country, these honorable men who retire with a big salary at the age of 64, honored by the American people, are going to forget themselves so far as to be unduly influenced by the argument of some Senator or Representative who holds his position for a brief time.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, it may be helpful to the Senator to draw his attention to the fact that there are at this time, as the record shows, 187 projects which have been approved by the engineers, and we are taking care of 36 of those in this bill—36 selected out of the 187 as being emergency projects. There are, as I stated a moment ago, 147 surveys ordered which have not yet been reported on by the engineers.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. The records show that not exceeding 33 per cent of the surveys ordered by Congress are reported on favorably by the engineers. The records further show—that is the statement of Gen. Bixby, former Chief of Engineers, one of the best we ever had—that not exceeding 1½ per cent of all the projects adopted by Congress have proven of doubtful merit.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Florida has stated that 187 projects have been approved. Will the Senator state within what time those 187 projects have been approved by the Board of Army Engineers? What period does it cover?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the number remaining, not acted on by Congress and approved by the engineers. It covers all the period of the past, clear up to date—all that have not been acted on by Congress.

Mr. STERLING. Can not the Senator from Florida in that connection state how many have been disapproved by the Board of Army Engineers? He states that 187 have been approved.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not give the Senator that figure; but estimating 33 per cent of all the surveys that have been ordered as approved, and having now a balance of 187 which have been approved, we know about how many have been rejected—not as a total, perhaps. I can not give the figure from the time we began to legislate on this subject, but that is the situation now—187 approved; and the records show that 33 per cent of all the surveys that have been ordered have been approved. Out of those 187, 60 are covered in this bill, and there are still remaining 147 which have not been reported on by the engineers. So that that covers the entire amount of our standing surveys.

Mr. STERLING. I regard that as a very important piece of information. The Senator from Iowa has been seeking to elicit that information, for we can then determine from the projects that have been disapproved as to the feasibility of some of the projects that are being proposed. We can make a comparison between those that have been disapproved and some of those that have been proposed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly. As the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] has said, it is not a very difficult matter to have a survey ordered in a river and harbor bill. If a Senator or a Representative reports to a committee of Congress that a waterway is worthy of improvement, Congress simply says, by ordering the survey: "We will let the engineers investigate the matter." It simply amounts to a decision to investigate, to inquire. Congress only commits itself so far as to say that it is worth looking into; that is all.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply wanted to ask the Senator from Florida in that connection how many projects in this bill, if he can tell me, have been rejected by the engineers?

Mr. FLETCHER. Absolutely none. Every project in this bill has not only been approved by the engineers but has been reported to the Senate and to the House as an emergency matter that needs to be taken care of right now, as directly or indirectly connected with the national defense, except such as are purely maintenance items. There is not an item here that has not the approval of the engineers—not one.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator in no controversial spirit, but because I am anxious to know this fact: Does the Senator say that every item in this bill has been approved by the Army engineers as an emergency war measure?

Mr. FLETCHER. Every item in this bill, except as to maintenance matters and improvements on projects heretofore adopted and actually being improved now in order to save loss. I read to the Senate some time ago the three features of this bill.

Mr. KENYON. Somebody interrupted me at that time and I am sorry to say I lost it. I want to ask the Senator if he was reading from the speech of Congressman SMALL in the House? I so understood him.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; at page 3361 of the RECORD.

Mr. KENYON. I have seen the statement made that the Secretary of War had approved these projects, but I also saw in the record of the House proceedings a denial of that statement. I wish that that were a fact that we might have established to a certainty, as to whether or not the Secretary of War has said that all of the projects in this bill are necessary war-emergency projects. That would make a great deal of difference with my view of the situation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that he does say that as to all the new projects in the bill. As to the projects which have been previously adopted and completed, of course, he says nothing, because there the only provision in the bill is for maintenance.

Mr. KENYON. I understand.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then, the next class of items consists of projects which have been adopted by Congress and partially completed, and the appropriation is made and recommended by the War Department as being necessary to save from waste and destruction what has been done. Those are the three classes.

Mr. KENYON. Then, I understand the Senator to say, as to the first two propositions, that there is no question of war emergency about them?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; absolutely none.

Mr. KENYON. The other propositions are war-emergency measures?

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. KENYON. That does not apply in any way, I take it, to the surveys provided for in this bill. They are not war emergencies?

Mr. FLETCHER. Oh, I do not think that has been considered in connection with surveys, because, as I was just saying, when a survey is ordered by Congress included in the bill, it simply means that Congress thinks it is worth while to look into the matter.

Mr. KENYON. Let me ask the Senator another question, because he probably has more information about it than anyone else. The Senator says that there are no projects in this bill against which recommendations have been made by the engineers. I want to ask the Senator—I am not certain about it—whether it is not true that a resurvey was ordered, for instance, of Fishing Creek, and that the Army engineers reported against that project, and is not that project in this bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. Fishing Creek? In what State is that?

Mr. KENYON. North Carolina. I think it will hardly be claimed that the improvement of Fishing Creek is a great war emergency.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a survey ordered for it now, is there?

Mr. KENYON. There was a survey ordered, and a resurvey ordered in the last river and harbor bill that was passed, and then an adverse report from the Army engineers. That is my recollection of it, and that Fishing Creek is taken care of in one of these lump-sum appropriations in this bill, and also that a new survey is ordered of Fishing Creek. The Senator can look up that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no recollection of that specific item. I think I can turn to it in a minute.

Mr. KENYON. I think there are one or two others of the same kind in the bill, and I feel quite confident as to Fishing Creek.

Mr. RANSDELL. Can the Senator refer me to the page?

Mr. KENYON. Fishing Creek is in the North Carolina items.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can find it in a minute, then.

Mr. KENYON. I have not a copy of the bill before me.

Mr. FLETCHER. On page 12 of the bill is the following item:

> Manteo Bay, Scuppernong, Pamlico, Tar, South, Bay, Neuse, and Trent Rivers, Fishing, Contentnia, Swift, and Smiths Creeks, and waterway connecting Swan Quarter Bay with Deep Bay, N. C.: For maintenance, $15,500.

I suppose that is what the Senator has reference to. That is the only reference I see in the bill to Fishing Creek; and I will state to the Senator in that connection that there is no appropriation whatever in this bill for Fishing Creek. Where they are grouped in that way—and I will give the Senator the precise amount of appropriation for each one of those items—the money must be used in pursuance of the estimates which the engineers have sent in.

In the case of those items, from line 12 to line 16, page 12, the following amounts will be spent by the engineers out of that $15,500 for the following projects:

Manteo Bay, $500.
Scuppernong River, $3,500.
Pamlico River, $4,500.
Nothing for Tar River.
Nothing for South River.
Nothing for Bay River.
Neuse River, $2,000.
Trent River, $4,000.
Nothing for Fishing Creek.
Contentnia Creek, $1,000.

That makes up the total of $15,500.

Mr. KENYON. Anything for Swift or Smiths Creeks?

Mr. FLETCHER. Nothing at all for those; nothing for any of those items except those I have mentioned, and that takes up the $15,500. Those are shown by the reports of the engineers to be the estimates for the specific items I have mentioned; but they are grouped in connection with those various other tributaries, in pursuance of this policy of grouping, for the reason that if there should be left over $500, say, out of this $15,500, and it could be economically and wisely spent for Swift or Smiths Creek or Fishing Creek, for instance, the engineers would be authorized to do it in that event. They would be authorized to use that unused portion of this appropriation for the specific items I have mentioned in some of the other tributaries connecting the waterways that are specified.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I suppose the Senator's theory is that wherever an improvement has once been made, that improvement must be maintained thereafter. Am I correct in that?

Mr. FLETCHER. Generally speaking, that would be so. Of course there might be some instances where it would be wise to abandon a completed project; but, generally speaking, as I say, the records show that less than 1½ per cent of all these projects have turned out to be failures; and wherever we have a failure, I take it that we had better not keep up the maintenance of that failure. That, however, is a very rare case.

Mr. STERLING. My thought was, Mr. President, that some of these improvements might have been made without any real demand for them from the commercial standpoint. If so, an appropriation for their further maintenance would hardly be justified.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely. I quite agree with the Senator that if that appeared we ought to drop the appropriation; but the engineers would not recommend the appropriation in that case.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say that this provision was adopted, according to the report of the engineers, under the river and harbor act approved September 19, 1890. It was to clear the stream of logs, snags, trees, and so forth, and improve it for 50 miles above its mouth. The commerce on the river is not very large, I must admit; but the project was formally adopted by act of Congress as far back as 1890, and some little work has been done on it from time to time since then.

Mr. STERLING. I will ask the Senator from Louisiana if he can state the amount of the commerce?

Mr. RANSDELL. This report shows that in 1913 there was a commerce of 2,459 tons. In 1914 the commerce was 1,096 tons. In 1915 the commerce was 2,450 tons. It is not a very large commerce, but the appropriation is very small, and no specific appropriation for it is carried in this bill.

Mr. STERLING. Does the statement show the value of the commerce?

Mr. RANSDELL. Yes, sir. The value of the commerce of the last year given, 1915, was $34,926—2,450 tons, valued at $34,926. The commerce consisted principally of cotton seed, cottonseed meal, fertilizer, lumber, and timber, and there is no appropriation at all provided in this bill. It is just carried in that lump sum, as the Senator from Florida has explained, so that if the condition of the stream should get bad some of the money might be utilized to carry on the work.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was going to speak of this grouping plan, and perhaps I might do so right at this point, although it interrupts my line of thought in presenting the bill. This is an illustration of what the grouping plan means, and perhaps we might just as well consider it at this point.

That plan has been criticized somewhat. Some people seem to think that it is a scheme to cover up unworthy projects and put them in with good projects, and take care of the bad with the good; but there is no such purpose as that at all.

In the case of these very items on page 12 of the bill, between lines 12 and 16, while there are 12 projects mentioned, only 6 of them would get the benefit of this appropriation, because only 6 of them have been estimated for by the engineers and the amount specified for each, so that that $15,500 will have to go to the 6 projects for which estimates have been made. There are six others included in this provision which will get nothing under this bill unless and perchance there should be an excess of this appropriation not needed to take care of those specified, in which case the most worthy of those not specified, but covered by the general provision, would be taken care of by the engineers. Otherwise, they would not have authority to spend a dollar of the money for them. The engineers must spend it for the specific purpose and for the specific project for which the estimate is made.

Mr. STERLING. I will ask the Senator, merely for information, now, as to the reason for grouping so many of these in this one paragraph, to be covered by this one general appropriation of $15,500. Do they all form one connected system of waterways?

Mr. FLETCHER. They are all connected, but they have to be specified and an estimate made for each by the engineers, and then the money must go precisely as appropriated by Congress. They are grouped in this way so that the engineers will have some latitude in administering the fund.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Florida misunderstood the question of the Senator from South Dakota. All of these waterways are not necessarily connected physically.

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it that they are.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Not at all. They are different projects that are grouped, put together, so that when the money appropriated is not needed for one, and a little more is needed for another, the Government work may be kept up, and in that way prevent deterioration for lack of appropriation. For instance, one waterway may have $500 more than it needs and another may have $500 less than it needs, and by transferring the appropriation the Government work could be kept going, and in that way render a substantial service to the public.

Mr. STERLING. I will say that the Senator from Mississippi understood the sense in which I asked the question, and I thought the Senator from Florida was answering it in the same sense; namely, that these different streams were connected together as one system of waterways.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think undoubtedly that is generally the case, but perhaps there may be instances where there is not one river flowing into a bay, or another river actually flowing in, but of the same community; so that if the Government has a plant in that vicinity—a dredge, for instance—it can put it right to work without any great expense in moving it about from place to place.

Perhaps I could not do better than to quote just here from the very splendid statement made on that subject by the chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, at page 3362 of the RECORD.

Mr. STERLING. May I ask the Senator what is the date of that RECORD?

Mr. FLETCHER. This is the RECORD of June 11. Mr. SMALL said:

> In this bill what is known as the grouping system is amplified. Gentlemen who have studied the bill will observe that there are a large number of items of maintenance and some items of improvement, which are grouped together. This is not a new method in a river and harbor bill. The grouping system dates back as far as the time when Mr. Burton was chairman of the committee, in the early days of his service, and this bill only increases or amplifies the plan. This is criticized in the minority report, and I would like to explain briefly to the committee the reasons for amplifying it. It makes for more economical administration in the expenditure of the appropriations.
> To illustrate, there are in this bill a number of groups containing three, four, five, six, seven, and eight projects, carrying a gross sum for maintenance. Out of a group of eight it may be that estimates have been made for only two or three, and yet in the expenditure of the gross appropriation during the fiscal year it may become necessary to expend a part of the sum on one or more of the projects for which no estimate was submitted because some deterioration not anticipated had occurred, due to storm or flood. The grouping plan permits this to be done; otherwise there would be a delay of a year or more, awaiting another river and harbor bill.
> Some gentlemen have asked what limitation there was upon the engineers in the expenditure of this money. In answer I may say that the engineers are limited in the expenditure of the gross appropriation for maintenance to those items for which estimates have been made, unless in the meantime some necessity of expenditure for maintenance upon the items for which estimates have not been made shall have occurred.
> So that this grouping system makes, as I said, for better and more economical administration.

I think it is perfectly plain, if the Senator will take these items that have been referred to in North Carolina, 12 of them grouped, that if we followed strictly the nongrouping plan we would make a separate appropriation, for instance, of $500 for Manteo Bay. That is recommended by the engineers and said to be necessary. We would make another separate appropriation of $3,500 for the Scuppernong River. We would make another one of $4,500 for the Pamlico River. We would make a separate one of $2,000 for the Neuse River, and then another separaté one of $4,000 for the Trent River, and another separate one of $1,000 for Contentnia Creek; and there you would have the $15,500, each sum required to be spent for that particular separate project. Where can there be any objection to putting all those projects together, and then adding to them others in the immediate vicinity that may possibly need the attention of the Government while the work is progressing on these projects?

For instance, one channel has been filled up by sand; logs have drifted in, or something, and stopped it up. Why can not the Government use a dredge to open that channel and render useful that waterway, which otherwise would have to wait another year before it could be opened up, or another appropriation, and cover the whole thing under one clause like this? You have not burdened the Government at all, you have not wasted any money, you have not appropriated a dollar more than you would have appropriated without the grouping plan; but by grouping them you have appropriated the money in such a way that the engineers have a latitude to use it where it is most needed within the limitations of the group, each group being under one engineer.

Mr. STERLING, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. RANSDELL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield, and to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to either of the Senators.

Mr. STERLING. I just wanted to ask one question to follow up the last statement made by the Senator from Florida. As I understood the Senator from Florida a while ago, in the case of these 12 several projects certain estimates are made, and those estimates for a part of the 12 only amount to $15,500.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; for six of them.

Mr. STERLING. For six of them?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; six of them. I used the names when I illustrated the point a while ago.

Mr. STERLING. No part of the $15,500 could be used, then, for any other improvement than the six for which the estimates have been made, could it?

Mr. FLETCHER. That could not be done except by grouping them here, and in this way we appropriate the $15,500 for the whole 12; but primarily the estimates must be followed, of course, and by those estimates we know what the engineers have it in mind to spend, what they have pledged to spend for these particular 6.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if this system of grouping has been used in bills before, or does it commence with this bill?

Mr. FLETCHER. It has been used ever since former Senator Burton was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House.

Mr. KENYON. Not to the same extent, has it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Not to this extent, but that has been the practice. It began during the time he was serving as chairman of that committee in the House.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator one more question. Is this grouping system the result of recommendations of the Army engineers or is it the thought of the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Army engineers recommend it. At any rate, my understanding is that they have found no fault with it. I am not sure whether there is a specific recommendation to that effect or not. I do not know that they were asked about it, but the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House and the Commerce Committee of the Senate have approved it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say, with reference to this grouping matter, that it began in a small way years ago. I have been connected with the Rivers and Harbors Committee for over 20 years, and my recollection is that the first grouping was at the instance of the War Department, as being in the interest of economy, and because it enabled the War Department to use the appropriations where they were most needed, and it would entail less expense. It has been found to work so well that they have been gradually increasing it and extending it, most of all in this bill, and it meets with the hearty approval of the War Department.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can say further, in answer to that question, that this bill was prepared in the office of the Chief of Engineers, and this grouping was prepared there likewise. This is the plan of the department, the plan of the Chief of Engineers, recommended by him and submitted to Congress; and every group here has been approved, therefore, by the department.

Mr. President, proceeding to a conclusion about this matter as fast as I can, I submit a letter from the Chief of Engineers, written just before Congress adjourned last March, on the subject of what it would mean if there were a failure of the bill at this time and Congress did not take care of these matters up to June 30, 1918, as provided in this bill.

The pending bill now under consideration takes the place of the bill which was passed by the House and was never reached in the Senate before Congress adjourned. In this letter—and I shall not take time to read it—the Chief of Engineers said it would be a direct loss to the Government of hundreds of thousands of dollars unless this appropriation was made, because there were numerous plants of the Government, owned by the Government and operated by the Government in carrying out this work, that would be idle. Thousands of men would be thrown out of employment, and work under way would have to wait until Congress took care of the situation later on. I will just ask to put it in the RECORD without reading. It meets the situation at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

1. It is practically impossible to give any reliable estimate of the loss to the Government or of the damage to navigation interests that might be caused by the failure of the pending river and harbor bill to become a law, but it can be positively stated that the loss would run into hundreds of thousands of dollars, and that serious consequences to shipping would result. The loss in dollars and cents results from disorganization of working forces, as well as loss of work partially done. Every large work which involves the employment of day labor is much more effectively prosecuted after the work is well organized and the men are accustomed to their various duties, and the closing down of the various works involves the scattering of the well-organized forces and the loss of competent men. The competent men find employment elsewhere, and it is only by a long process of sifting, requiring several months upon resumption of the work, that the forces again become well organized and as effective as when the work was closed down. This fact is so well recognized that in many districts the nucleus of the main organization has been held as long as possible, even though higher priced employees are performing work which might equally well be done by lower priced employees.

2. In some cases it is especially important that the work proposed in the bill be carried on without loss of time. This is particularly true, for instance, with reference to such an item as that relating to East River, which is of urgent importance on account of its relation to national defense. The joint board has recommended as immediately needed for operations of the fleet of defense that there be provided a depth of 40 feet to the Brooklyn Navy Yard and a depth of 35 feet through East River. The pending bill, as amended by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, makes provision for this important work. If the channel to the navy yard is first deepened to only 35 feet, as now authorized, and later to 40 feet, it is probable that the loss on this one item will be over a million dollars.

3. There is also work of urgent importance carried by the bill with reference to the Hudson River Channel, in order to provide access to the new piers being built by the city to accommodate the steamships of great length that come to this harbor. Another urgent item relates to the Narrows of Lake Champlain, where improvement is necessary in order to take advantage of the facilities that the State of New York has provided in its new Champlain Barge Canal, after an expenditure of millions of dollars. Another item of special urgency is that relating to the Passes of the Mississippi River, where work has just been inaugurated under modified plans to secure a project depth of 35 feet through Southwest Pass.

4. There are many cases where work of maintenance is essential in order to accommodate commerce of great importance which may be seriously affected by deterioration of the channels. This is illustrated on the Delaware River, where continuous operation of Government dredges is necessary to keep open the channel to the port of Philadelphia. The maintenance to full project dimensions is doubtless more important now than ever before on account of the shortage in tonnage of shipping available and the necessity of employing it to the maximum draft to which it can be loaded.

5. There are a number of other improvements where work has been under progress and the benefits of the improvement can not be obtained until the project is completed. The delay in carrying on the work postpones securing any return on the investment made. Some improvements, such as that of the Ohio, the Missouri below Kansas City, and the upper Mississippi, are being prosecuted with large annual expenditures in accordance with programs of construction, to which Congress has practically pledged itself, with a view to completion within a definite term of years. The large forces engaged on these rivers would, of course, become scattered if no funds are provided, and the enforced delay, due to lack of appropriations, would be still further prolonged by loss of time in getting the forces organized again. On the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers a stoppage of work will cause an absolute loss of many revetments and levees now in place. This, to a greater or less extent, will also be the case for all unfinished work of construction, such as locks and dams.

6. The monthly cost of the operation of Government seagoing dredges runs from $3,000 to $10,000 per month, according to the size of the dredge. Many of these dredges would have to be laid up on account of exhaustion of funds. New crews would therefore be necessary when the dredges resume work. It takes at least two or three months to break in a dredge crew properly so that they can do effective work. This therefore is equivalent to the loss of one or two months in the cost of operation of each dredge which is laid up.

7. It may be of interest, in this connection, to give the results of an inquiry made in 1915 to ascertain the loss to the United States caused by the delay of about three months in the passage of the river and harbor act which was approved on October 2, 1914. A tabulation of the data submitted by the various district engineer officers throughout the United States indicated that the late passage of the act caused a definite loss to river and harbor appropriations of $395,554.23 and an indefinite loss of $486,911.86, making a total of $882,466.09.

8. The definite losses included such items as the dismantlement of plant, its storage and care during period of suspension of work, and reinstallation; definite increased cost of work due to unfavorable conditions during which it was prosecuted later in the season; losses of work which was partially completed and which had to be replaced; and other similar definite items.

9. The indefinite losses included such items as a higher percentage of cost of office expenses, superintendence, etc., due to the smaller amounts available for work, losses in efficiency due to the training of new crews, depreciation of plant while laid up, and other similar items.

10. From an examination of the data available it was believed that the total was an underestimate rather than an overestimate of the actual loss due to the failure of the bill to become a law at the proper time.

11. Attention is also invited to the importance of some of the items of general legislation, particularly with reference to section 9, which gives the Secretary of War much needed authority to prescribe regulations for navigable waters of the United States. Lack of this authority has prevented action that should be taken to safeguard life and property and the interests of navigation, especially in congested waterways.

W. M. BLACK,
Brigadier General, Chief of Engineers.

Mr. FLETCHER. Regarding the importance of this work and what has been accomplished in the past, and how we should be impressed by experience, I can not do better than to quote from the speech of Hon. S. M. Sparkman, then the honored chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, when he reported the bill in January, 1917. He said:

Mr. Chairman, 22 years ago I entered this body and soon thereafter sought and obtained a position on the Rivers and Harbors Committee—not that the class of work a position on that committee entails was especially congenial to me; on the contrary, my vocation in life had been such that I would, in other circumstances, have preferred a different committee assignment; but I sought and accepted a position on that committee because I thought I could be of more service there to the people of Florida and to the country than on any other committee.

During the years I have remained here Congress has appropriated more than half a billion dollars for waterway improvement, the most of which has been expended on more than 200 harbors and upward of 25,000 miles of navigable waters, including canals, with the result that the waterways of our country have been improved from original and unserviceable conditions to the point where many of them are meeting the demands of even our fabulous commercial growth. During this time our commerce has grown from less than 250,000,000 to nearly 1,000,000,000 tons, valued at $30,000,000,000, while freight rates have been reduced, it has been estimated by some, as much as $1 per ton on water-borne commerce alone. Placing it, for the sake of argument, at 50 cents per ton—and we are carrying 200,000,000 tons each year—you can readily see the saving thus made to the producer, to the shipper, and to the consumer.

All this shows more clearly than any logic or language at my command can demonstrate the absurdity of the claim that the money, or even any considerable part of it, thus expended has been thrown away. But suppose a portion of it has been unwisely spent, and it would be a wonder if some waste did not occur, because in the expenditure of that large sum of money in any kind of work mistakes will be made resulting in loss. It may be that improper projects have, from time to time, been adopted, and I think they have been, but in going over the various river and harbor bills for the purpose of determining as best I could the merits of all the projects undertaken during the past 20 or 22 years I have come to the conclusion that not more than 2 per cent of these projects, if so much, has, in the light even of subsequent events, proven to be without merit. I venture the assertion that in no line of governmental activity has there been as little waste as in our waterway improvements. Still, with the great benefits coming to the people from those expenditures, what difference does it make if a few thousands or even a few millions of the money used has not been properly expended? The people even then are largely the gainers and can well afford the loss, for the producers, the shippers, and the consumers of our country have been paid a hundred times over for every dollar of this great expenditure in increased shipping facilities and the reduction of freight rates, which, while lowering the cost to the consumers, has increased the value of the product to the producer.

This, Mr. Chairman, has been a great work and is an honor to the membership, Democrats and Republicans, who have responded so generously during the past quarter of a century to the demands of the people for improved water transportation facilities. And, Mr. Chairman, in leaving Congress as I will after the 4th of next March, I shall look back upon even the small and inconspicuous part I have taken in this work as the most important of the services I have rendered as a Member of this distinguished body. I could ask no greater honor or higher privilege than an humble place in the ranks of those who have thus added to the Nation's wealth and to the happiness and prosperity of the people.

On this subject there is ample authority, but I will only refer to one more: Gen. William H. Bixby, retired, who made one of the ablest and best Chief of Engineers the country ever had, from 1910 to 1913, said, in an address delivered December 7, 1916:

On one particular occasion I remember distinctly when I was called upon to say whether the bill was an improper bill, the question being whether it should be turned down by a veto, and I was able to say on that occasion that when that bill left the Rivers and Harbors Committee there was not a single item anywhere in it against which there could be the slightest ground for accusation of impropriety, and that when that bill had got through both the House and the Senate and was before the President for signature there was not one-half of 1 per cent of the items in it as to which there was any good ground for discussion. Moreover, during the three years that I was Chief of Engineers and officially watched those river and harbor bills go through, and also during the three years since then, none of the river and harbor bills which have gotten before the President for signature have contained over 1½ per cent of items as to which there was any good reason for doubt or discussion. I would like to see anybody find anywhere in ordinary business life in these United States anything that is better than that; if the ordinary business man can get along in ordinary business with 5 per cent, about which there is some doubt or discussion, he is doing very well. There has never been 2 per cent, and hardly ever has there been one-half of 1 per cent of seriously doubtful items in river and harbor bills for the past six years, and those items, when carefully discussed as to all their pros and cons, have been shown to be allowable.

The bill referred to was that approved March 4, 1913, and the projects adopted and undertaken in that bill are the projects calling for most of the appropriations carried in this bill.

Gen. Bixby further said:

The men that fight the hardest against river and harbor appropriations are often those gentlemen who represent districts where there are no rivers or harbors, and because they or their constituents are not to receive direct benefits themselves they object to seeing other people get any. They forget the many other appropriations where they are the principal beneficiaries. They ought to be told by you every time you get a chance at them that they are lacking in that national spirit which you have just heard about a few moments ago from one of the preceding speakers. They are selfish and lacking in national spirit, and you should tell them so. [Applause.]

And again:

Then the men that object next strenuously are usually those who have gotten everything that they want for their districts or State; they do not see any chance of getting anything more, and therefore they do not see why, their State being already provided for, they should contribute to other States which have not yet got theirs. [Applause.] Those gentlemen are another set of men that should be told by you that they are selfish and lacking in national spirit. They ought to know that they are selfish and lacking in national spirit without being told of it, but it would not do any harm to have them told so in the public press.

Then there is another set of men who object to small-river improvement appropriations, asking "Why should we pay for the improvement of any river or creek around the country that is dry in the summer time?" We have heard that sort of an outcry a great deal in the last two or three years. "Why should we do anything for such and such a stream when it has not got any water?" Well, generally they make a mistake, because the stream they ridicule does have water enough for its useful navigation, only they do not know it. I know personally of a great many streams along the north Atlantic coast, the south Atlantic coast the Gulf coast, and out on the Pacific coast where in parts of that stream there may not be, in summer time, more than enough water to float a skiff that only draws 3 inches. I have been on some of them where the flow was not any more than that, but it had much more in the navigation season. I have also been on some large streams and on the Great Lakes, in the northern part of the United States, which were frozen up so tight in the winter time that you could not run any boat at all, not even a 3-inch-draft boat, through them at that time; yet nobody questioned the justice of looking after the navigation of those northern streams, even if they were icebound for three or four months of the year. Then why should they question the justice of improving some southern streams just because they lack water for three or four months in the year?

There is no need of water for navigation purposes at a season of the year when you do not need navigation. All along the Atlantic coast you will find streams, many of them, possibly, small streams, for which money has been appropriated for their improvement, where such section of the country could not have been developed except by water transportation. If the farmer can get his fertilizer sent upstream in the spring and his crops sent downstream in the fall he often does not care a rap what happens in the summer or the winter, when there is no special need of transportation; and he ought to have all the benefits of the transportation that he does need, so that his section may grow up into settlements or towns large enough to make it profitable for the railroads to build spur tracks thereto.

And again:

It is unfair to expect much increase of travel and commerce until the increased depth and width of waterway is extended over the entire length of the water route. Half-finished transportation routes, even on land, rarely show any increase of business; neither do half-built houses or factories. Why expect more from half-built waterways?

The present Chief of Engineers, Gen. William M. Black, on the same occasion, in an able address, said:

To my mind we have hardly any need of greater importance to society in general than the need for better transportation facilities—transportation facilities which will, at the least cost, transfer from the point of production, no matter where in the world, to the point of consumption, no matter where in the world.

And:

So there is ample room, as well as the utmost need, for the development of all routes of transportation, be they by rail or by water.

And again:

They take all possible care; as stated to you frequently before, there is no bill that passes through Congress which has more careful scrutiny or more care devoted to its composition than the river and harbor bill.

And again:

No matter how good theoretic consideration you show for a single investment, or the putting of all the appropriation in any one improvement, be it New York Harbor, be it San Francisco, be it the Mississippi, the people simply will not have it so; and as long as they will not have it so, it can not be.

There are certain things about our popular government which may be considered drawbacks, if you will; but we know there are so many great and glorious things about it that we love it with all the drawbacks. [Applause.] But we must see the drawbacks, and it is perfect nonsense to expect that altruism shall be carried so far that any section will be found perfectly willing to give up the things it thinks it needs, for the time being, on the ground that another section needs the money more. The people say, "It is our money that you are spending. We all give to it and we must all get a return."

You have to consider local claims; and the utmost that can be done, I think, is to see that no improvement of any kind is recommended unless it is a good investment, unless the returns to the people annually are equal to, or greater than, the interest on the money invested plus cost of maintenance. If that be so, it is a good investment. It may not be so good as another, but it is a good investment and is a proper one to put the people's money into.

Admiral Benson, before the same convention, the day before, said:

Now, as I said in the beginning, we have a great number of small craft and our coast is so formed that its defense must necessarily depend very largely on the submarines and the smaller craft; and in order to utilize what we have to the fullest extent there should be some means of moving this craft from one part of the coast to the other.

Our national means of defense, particularly from Key West north, would be through our inland waterways by our submarines. Not that the submarines are not able to go outside, for they are; and even our coast submarines are able to go to sea and cruise a hundred miles offshore successfully. They can go even farther; but what I refer to is the fact that they want to be protected. We do not want them exposed to the attacks of the enemy on the outside in case we desire to move them from one point of the coast to another, or in order that they may go out from various openings and attack the enemy. So you can readily see the tremendous advantage that improved inland waterways would be to the Navy in the event of war in moving submarines and destroyers through the inland waterways.

Of course, anything that helps commerce helps the Navy; anything that helps the Navy helps commerce; and whatever helps both helps the country. [Applause.]

There is one feature of the development of the inland waterways that has impressed me very deeply in my study of it, and I would presume to suggest it to you gentlemen who have given this subject more careful thought; that is, the study of the map of our country, and particularly the eastern part of it, and you will see a complete network of rivers leading down to the coast.

Mr. Joy Morton, of Chicago, in a strong address before the same convention on the subject of the "Potentiality of waterways," expressed his conclusions thus:

There is no means of transporting freight so cheaply as to float it. The potential advantages of canals to the Commonwealth have been overlooked in the craze for railroads, and it is time in these days of congested lines and choked-up railroad terminals to consider the waterway as a relief.

"PORK."

The public has been misled by the slander which certain scribblers started by the term "pork barrel" in connection with rivers and harbors legislation, public-buildings bills, and the like. It was catchy and sensational and came into such extended use that it has had the effect of poisoning the public mind to some extent, and created a prejudice against a bill the sole purpose of which is to confer the greatest benefit to the largest number of citizens. I will not dwell on that kind of criticism of the bill—I have neither the time nor patience.

When the last bill was before the House the leader of the minority in the House had this to say, which seems to me unanswerable [CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1976–1977]:

Whatever men may think about the merits of particular propositions in a bill, there is no legislation which comes before Congress which is so critically scanned by experts as are the river and harbor bills before they reach the House. In the first place, the War Department itself can not institute any recommendation upon its own motion. It is the only branch of the Government that is not permitted to do so. The Executive can not order the War Department to make a report or an estimate or a recommendation to Congress in reference to a river and harbor improvement. You can not reach the War Department through political influence exercised upon the President or the Secretary of War. A provision in the river and harbor bill begins with an item for a survey, and under the law the engineers can not make a survey until as experts they have made an examination as to the probable economy of the improvement, the use that will be made of it, and the benefit that it will be to the shipping industry and to the public.

The Board of Engineers of the United States Army are selected men from West Point, who hold their office for life, or for good behavior if they do their work. They are the least subject to political influence of any body in the United States by reason of their position. [Applause.] They can not go to the political activities which exist in the War Department with reference to promotions, because all of their promotions are automatic except as to the Chief of Engineers. When we determine by reason of the activity of a Member of Congress representing his constituents to ask that board to make an examination, they have to first determine whether it will be a profitable adventure if entered upon, and then they are permitted to make an estimate of the cost and present the project to the House. The House itself can not order them to do this. It could at one time by a resolution. The Senate itself can not order them to do this. It is the only case in the Government service where the House can not by resolution ask Government officers to render a service, or where the Senate can not by a resolution ask Government officers to render a service. After they make their estimate, made by the local engineer aided by a civilian engineer working under him, also permanently employed, they have to go through the form—in many cases it is a form, though in some cases it is the real thing—of having the report pass through the district engineer and the engineer of the enlarged district, whose title I do not now remember. Then the matter goes before the Board of Engineers. Then it comes before the Chief of Engineers. Then it comes before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There are more processes involved, and far more expert men, wholly disinterested, unbiased, uncontrolled by politics, in reference to a river and harbor item than any other legislation provided by any legislative assembly in the world. [Applause.]

Some suggestion has been made of its being a questionable practice about Senators and Representatives appearing before the Board of Engineers on an appeal from the district engineers. The only instance where they appear there is where the district engineer has reported on a project, for instance, we will say, adversely, and that is passed up to the division engineer, and the division engineer has passed on it adversely, and the friends of the enterprise feel that all the subject has not been exhausted. There may be new facts that have developed in the meantime, and they want to present them to the Board of Engineers. The Board of Engineers sits, and they have these hearings in a formal way, and they consider such new facts and such arguments as may be presented and the reports which have been sent up to them, and then they take it under advisement and render their opinion according to the rules that govern them, absolutely always true to the public interest. I do not believe there is any such thing as that board recommending a profligate waste of money. I do not believe that there is any such thing as that board recommending a proposition that has not merit in it, justification, commercial and otherwise. There is no reason to do it. They are under no obligation to anyone who appears before them, either for their position or to maintain their position. They are perfectly independent. They are high-class, intelligent men, the best-trained minds of the country, and of the highest integrity, and why should they betray their trust? There is no temptation to betray their trust, no reason for betraying their trust. There is every reason why they should conduct themselves as honorable men of integrity and strength of character, and they do. There is no question about that at all. It is simply ridiculous and absurd to intimate or charge anything to the contrary.

There has been some intimation that this is a sectional measure. I would not go into that. It is nonsense to claim that the bill is framed to advantage some particular section of the country to the prejudice of some other section. I want to refer, though, in this connection to a statement made by Mr. Sparkman and to a table he furnished, and I shall drop the subject there. Mr. Sparkman is giving his experience of 22 years in Congress. He says:

Mr. Chairman, I can say of a truth that during the 22 years of my membership here and the more than 20 years that I have been on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I have never thought that any member of that body was influenced in the least by sectional motives in the making up of river and harbor bills. Each member of that important committee, no matter from what section he came, whether from the North, South, East, or West, has in that great work been influenced alone, in my judgment, by the merits of the project under consideration and what he considered his duty to the whole country.

In this connection I wish to call attention to a table I have here, and which I will print with these remarks, showing the amounts appropriated for projects in the different sections since I have had the honor of presiding over the deliberations of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I find that $45,899,056 have gone to projects in what might be called the Northern States, $41,181,721 to those in the Southern States, and $19,000,000 for projects in the Pacific Coast States, which in the sectional sense meant by such critics are properly classed with the Northern States, so that we would have $65,000,000, in round figures, as the amount appropriated for works in what you might call the Northern States since I have been chairman of the committee and $41,000,000 for the Southern States.

These figures do not include the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, which, being essentially and broadly national, should, in my opinion, not be charged to any section. The projects for the improvement of these rivers were adopted prior to the time I became chairman of the committee, which was subsequent to the passage of the bill of 1911; but since and including the bill of 1912 there had been appropriated for these streams, as will be seen, sums ranging as follows: $36,353,000 for the Mississippi, $7,175,000 for the Missouri, and $22,068,500 for the Ohio, or upward of $65,000,000 in all.

I may add, further, that appropriations for these three rivers have for the past several years made up more than a third of each river and harbor bill, and that more than one-half of the amounts yet to be appropriated for old projects is to go toward the completion of the projects for their improvement adopted in the bill of 1910. So that, eliminating them, you dispose of the larger part of the work yet to be done outside of the new projects in this measure.

Table showing amounts appropriated and allotted under river and harbor acts from 1912 to 1916, inclusive, for the country by sections.

Year.	North.	South.	Pacific coast.	Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico.	Mississippi River.	Missouri River.	Ohio River.
1912	$7,429,070	$7,619,050	$3,196,750	$306,000	$8,945,000	$1,025,000	$5,600,000
1913	13,010,855	12,040,321	6,051,218	225,000	9,001,000	2,325,000	5,550,000
1914	4,125,530	5,103,750	2,442,500	100,000	4,954,000	900,000	1,769,000
1915	6,863,246	5,678,050	3,483,175	43,000	5,371,000	1,100,000	3,040,000
1916	14,470,355	10,740,550	4,242,200	376,800	8,082,000	1,825,000	5,509,500
Total	45,899,056	41,181,721	19,415,843	1,050,800	36,353,000	7,175,000	22,068,500

So you will see, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that there is no ground whatever for this charge of sectionalism. Every section of the country has received the same treatment, the purpose always being to adopt projects and make appropriations upon the merits of a proposition and in accordance with the demands of the commerce to be accommodated. To these considerations we have looked, and to nothing else, and as long as I remain in this body and have responsibility here I shall adhere to that rule and never consciously depart from it. [Applause.]

Mr. President, I challenge criticism of any item in this bill. I am prepared to answer in detail any question that may be asked respecting any item in so far as the information can be gathered from the official documents dealing with such items.

Regarding the commission provided for in section 16, I may say that the work and function of such commission are the same as that provided in the bill as it was reported to the House. The composition of the commission was changed by the Committee on Commerce. The subject is discussed in the House report, page No. 6, and I will submit at another time some further observations on the desirability and need for such a commission.

Instead of having it a departmental commission, the commission is made up as shown by section 16 of the bill, and in that respect it differs from the provision in the bill as it was reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House originally.

Mr. President, I am going to leave the matter there for the present, but I challenge criticism of every item in the bill from start to finish. I am prepared to furnish the detailed information regarding every item as shown by the document, and I submit that the bill ought to be passed, and passed speedily. It is surely an emergency measure. I now move that we proceed to consider first the committee amendments.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator from Florida if he proposes to go on with the bill to-night?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say, as far as I am concerned, I want to suit the convenience of other Senators. If anyone wants to go on to-night, I am willing, but I believe an executive session is desired.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] wanted to proceed, but I am sure he would not want to proceed with only seven or eight Senators in the Chamber. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that we adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let us first have an executive session.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here a report from the Committee on Commerce on a bridge bill which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is very desirous of having passed this afternoon. It is to meet a certain emergency which exists that demands immediate passage. Out of order, I ask that the bill be considered and passed. It is an ordinary bridge bill, in ordinary terms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Texas requests the Senate to proceed to the consideration of a bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask out of order, without displacing the pending bill, to report the bill and to have it put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Florida to the request of the Senator from Texas and the ruling which has been made heretofore as to matters of this character.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will withdraw the request for the present and attempt to have the bill passed during the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; that is better.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Florida yield to me?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered.

MRS. NANCY E. MULLINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair announces his signature to the following enrolled bill:

The SECRETARY. H. R. 646. An act for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 24, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 23, 1917.

RECEIVERS OF PUBLIC MONEYS.

Mrs. Annie G. Rogers, of Colorado, to be receiver of public moneys at Leadville, Colo., her term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

Edward J. McLean, of Montana, to be receiver of public moneys at Billings, Mont., his term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

Edward C. Hargadine, of Montana, to be receiver of public moneys at Glasgow, Mont., his term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

John T. Hamilton, of Montana, to be receiver of public moneys at Miles City, Mont., his term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

REGISTERS OF LAND OFFICES.

Albert F. Browns, of Colorado, to be register of the land office at Sterling, Colo., his present term expiring August 26, 1917. (Reappointment.)

Fred H. Foster, of Montana, to be register of the land office at Billings, Mont., his term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

Fletcher W. Appleton, of Montana, to be register of the land office at Bozeman, Mont., his term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

Thomas R. Jones, of Montana, to be register of the land office at Glasgow, Mont., his term of office having expired. (Reappointment.)

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

FIELD ARTILLERY ARM.

To be major with rank from May 15, 1817, to fill a casual vacancy.

Capt. William F. Morrison, Field Artillery, detached officers' list, vice Maj. Frank E. Hopkins, promoted.

To be captains with rank from May 15, 1817, to fill original vacancies.

First Lieut. Donald M. Beere, Field Artillery.
First Lieut. Herman Erlenkotter, Field Artillery.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 23, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, in whose all-encircling love we dwell, strengthen us, we beseech Thee, for the duties of the new day. Widen the scope of our vision. Give to us great thoughts and a firm resolve to follow in the wake of duty whithersoever it leads.

Now and always in the spirit of the Lord Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, July 21, 1917, was read and approved.

THE LATE BO SWEENEY.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the life and character of Hon. Bo Sweeney, late Assistant Secretary of the Interior, who died on Monday last.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the life and character of the Hon. Bo Sweeney, late Assistant Secretary of the Interior. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, the Hon. Bo Sweeney, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, was born in Henry County, Mo., on September 20, 1863, and died at Washington, D. C., July 16, 1917.

It is fitting that at this time the House of Representatives should suspend its regular course and pay honor to the memory of not only an exceptionally able man but a patriotic and faithful public officer.

He was my fellow townsman and my friend. It is easy to flatter the dead, far easier than to flatter the living. In the life and public service of Bo Sweeney there is no necessity, no need of flattery. The history of his life, the record of his public acts, the uprightness of his daily association with men, speak in far more eloquent terms than any poor words of mine. Of such a man it would be unpardonable to use a single sentence of false and pleasing praise.

Mr. Sweeney was essentially a man out of the West. He loved the mountains; he longed to be in the hills of the great far West. That had been his home since almost boyhood, and it was from these he came to the Nation's Capital to do his duty here, as he had always done it amidst his friends at home.

Born on a farm near Clinton, in Henry County, Mo., in the year 1863—a year not noted for gentleness and sentiment—he grew to young manhood in Missouri and Texas. His boyhood life was not one of easy swing. He was taught to know that the things worth while in life were not extended with lavish hand except to those who should deservedly gain them. He was early taught to appreciate the truism that he who wears the spurs should wear them in the open field.

Like most successful men and women, he had the guidance in childhood of conscientious and upright parents. The stress of the times early brought the element of economy into his life, a trait he always reasonably and consistently followed, though in after years he reached a bountiful competency—the reward of his own industry and ability.

He was educated for the bar, at which he soon gained singular distinction. His first years of mature manhood were passed in the State of Colorado, where he commenced the practice of the law. It was in that State that his first political honors came by being elected to the lower house of the legislature. The construction of the new State capitol building was projected while he was thus in office, and to this he gave singularly valuable service. Though a member of a political party then in hopeless minority, he freely and unreservedly joined with his colleagues of the majority and brought to the enterprise all the enthusiasm of a young, fearless champion of efficiency and honesty. He was loved and respected by the people of that State, and had he chosen to remain there he doubtless would have achieved political recognition equaling, if not surpassing, that which came in after years.

It was in the State of Colorado where he found his life's partner and coworker. She, like her husband, was a child of the West. They endured the trials and together shared the success which inevitably come to those who toil with patience, which is always power.

In 1897 Mr. Sweeney, following the Star of Empire, came to Seattle in the far Northwest.

To him it was going from one broad land to another; from the view of one snow-clad range to another. From the first he took a prominent place in the community socially, professionally, and politically. While always a consistent and unyielding Democrat, he uniformly exercised tolerance and respect for the political opinions of others. I bear witness to this exceptional trait of his character. At the bar he won signal success. Memory comes to my aid in recalling many a hard-fought legal battle, and I can say many of his brethren at the bar still bear scars from his undeniable skill as an advocate. But whether he won or lost he was still the same generous, considerate, and kindly character, never boasting, never cringing, always the same magnanimous and manly man. His attainments of good, pure, Christian manhood will always remain a standard of excellence and be an inspiration for those who believe in the worth of giving and receiving fundamental justice in all intercourse with men. He always stood square to the four winds.

While practicing his profession in my city he was called here as Assistant Secretary of the Interior. No better selection could have been made out of the multitude of good men of the West. He had breathed in him the inspiration of the West, of the rugged honesty of the mountains. Schooled in the thought of the West, he brought to this high administrative office all the resources of a busy, proper, and industrious life. He brought activity, which was a part of his very being; he brought enterprise and fair dealing, frankness, and firmness. Every Member of this body feels the loss of the Nation at large, and to those of us who knew the true worth and value of his friendship the loss is keenly personal.

He was a man thoroughly in love with life; he enjoyed every hour of every day; he loved to look upon the beauties of the world; he loved the mountains, the plains, the fields, and meadows of his land. Death came to him in the very prime of life, at the very hour of his greatest usefulness. It seems strange that it should be so. Perhaps it is better that we do not understand; perhaps it is best that those we love the best should answer when no call has ever come. It is hard for finite men to understand the will of the Infinite.

At a time in his life, in the beauty of the midday, when eager winds were filling every sail, he heard the breakers on a foreign shore—the other beautiful shore—where each and all must sooner or later moor his bark of life.

A truly good and able character has gone into the great, unseen world, where the mountains and the waters are of transcendent beauty, gone to the land where the good, the pure, and the faithful shall live and dwell eternal. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense, by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, had insisted upon its amendments, had requested a conference on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. GORE, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. KENYON, Mr. WARREN, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. PAGE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 5326. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 33. Joint resolution to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 646. An act for the relief of Mrs. Nancy E. Mullins; and

H. R. 5326. An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Signal Corps of the Army and to purchase, manufacture, maintain, repair, and operate airships, and to make appropriations therefor, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on July 16, 1917, they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 5405. An act making appropriations for certain session employees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Sarah B. Scott (H. R. 2086, 64th Cong.), no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HAWLEY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence from the House for the day, July 23, on account of the funeral of his mother, Mrs. Emma A. Hawley.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES—ARMY AND NAVY SERVICE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 1811) providing for leaves of absence from homesteads during service in the Army or Navy of the United States, and crediting such service in the Army or Navy as residence upon the homestead, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent to his widow or minor children, and ask for the present consideration of the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk began the reading of the report.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. It is a little shorter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I think the report ought to be read.

Mr. FERRIS. Then I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

The Clerk read the conference report and statement as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 108).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1811) providing for the counting of service in the Army or Navy of the United States as equivalent to residence and cultivation upon homestead entries, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent for such land to his widow or minor children, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert the following:

"That any settler upon the public lands of the United States; or any entryman whose application has been allowed; or any person who has made application for public lands which thereafter may be allowed under the homestead laws, who, after such settlement, entry, or application enlists or is actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as a private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, national guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during any war in which the United States may be engaged, shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, have his services therein construed to be equivalent to all intents and purposes to residence and cultivation for the same length of time upon the tract entered or settled upon; and hereafter no contest shall be initiated on the ground of abandonment, nor allegation of abandonment sustained against any such settler, entryman, or person unless it shall be alleged in the preliminary affidavit or affidavits of contest and proved at the hearing in cases hereinafter initiated that the alleged absence from the land was not due to his employment in such military or naval service; that if he shall be discharged on account of wounds received or disability incurred in the line of duty, then the term of his enlistment shall be deducted from the required length of residence, without reference to the time of actual service: Provided, That no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of at least one year.

"SEC. 2. That any settler upon the public lands of the United States; or any entryman whose application has been allowed; or any person who has made application for public lands which thereafter may be allowed under the homestead laws, who dies while actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States as a private soldier, officer, seaman, marine, national guardsman, or member of any other organization for offense or defense authorized by Congress during any war in which the United States may be engaged, then his widow, if unmarried, or in case of her death or marriage, his minor orphan children, or his or their legal representatives, may proceed forthwith to make final proof upon such entry or application thereafter allowed, and shall be entitled to receive Government patent for such land; and that the death of such soldier while so engaged in the service of the United States shall, in the administration of the homestead laws, be construed to be equivalent to a performance of all requirements as to residence and cultivation upon such homestead."

And the House agree to the same.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
I. L. LENROOT,
Managers on the part of the House.

KEY PITTMAN,
REED SMOOT,
JOHN F. SHAFROTH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments added to the bill (S. 1811) providing for leaves of absence from homesteads during service in the Army or Navy of the United States, and crediting such service in the Army or Navy as residence upon the homestead, and in the event of the soldier's death in such service providing for the issuance of patent to his widow or minor children, submit the following statements in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report:

The House struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted a new bill. This bill went to conference without instructions. The Senate receded substantially on all House amendments and acceded to the House draft of the bill with certain minor changes improving the phraseology.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
IRVINE L. LENROOT,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, unless there is some question, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the conference report is agreed to.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE BILLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there are nine bridge bills on the calendar, introduced by various Members of the House. The committee did not report them until we had consulted gentlemen on both sides of the House and found that there was a general willingness that they should be reported. I asked both the consent of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and finally we reported them.

Of course, it is with the House now as to whether it will consider them or not. These gentlemen are all interested in their local bills, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be considered. It will take but a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration, seriatim, of bridge bills. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] if any steps are to be taken to-day on the food and fuel control bill?

Mr. LEVER. Not to-day. The bill has not yet been printed. We ought to get the bill in a very few minutes, but it had not been printed 15 minutes ago with the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. I had the Senate amendments early this morning.

Mr. LEVER. It is not the intention to call up the food bill to-day, but to-morrow.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina how it is that he has not a printed copy of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says he had a printed copy this morning.

Mr. LEVER. I tried to get it this morning.

Mr. MANN. I have not a printed copy of the bill, but a printed copy of the Senate amendments. But the bill ought to be printed with the Senate amendments.

Mr. LEVER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit, I would say that it is my intention to-morrow to take up this bill and ask that this bill be sent to conference.

Mr. MANN. To ask unanimous consent that it be sent to conference. The gentleman should amend his request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not asking that now.

Mr. MANN. No; but he will have to ask it to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina announces that on to-morrow he will ask unanimous consent to send the food bill to conference.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I have no objection to the consideration of the bridge bills.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I may want to move to concur in some of the Senate amendments to the food bill, and I do not want to lose that right to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not lose any rights to-morrow.

Mr. RAINEY. I wish to state that after the consideration of the bridge bills I will move to adjourn.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the request of the gentleman from Georgia the business before the House?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia how many bridge bills there are?

Mr. ADAMSON. There are nine. They are bills that different gentlemen on both sides are interested in, representing districts in various parts of the country.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the House ought to be asked to grant unanimous consent for the consideration of nine bills providing for bridges crossing navigable streams in the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will modify my request, Mr. Speaker, by permission, and will ask that all of the bills be called in their order, with the privilege of objection as each one is called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia modifies his request and puts it in this shape, that all these bridge bills be called seriatim, with the House retaining the right to object at the end of it to any one of the nine.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Are these bills on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent?

Mr. ADAMSON. They are not, because I did not know whether the House wanted to consider them at all or not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I dislike to interfere in anyway with the desires of my friend from Georgia, but——

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not discommode me at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But the Unanimous Consent Calendar is one of the most important calendars which the House of Representatives has to-day. It is the only calendar that affords Members of the House an opportunity to be notified of business coming before the House. Sometimes things on that calendar are of exceeding importance. Therefore I feel constrained to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman have any objection to agreeing that to-morrow, when the Members have had an opportunity to examine the bills between now and then, they may be called up for consideration by unanimous consent?

Mr. ADAMSON. It will be perfectly agreeable to me; and I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that he does not discommode me by objecting. These bills have been introduced by different Members of the House, and I am anxious to accommodate them, and I am told that each bill is an emergent one.

Mr. MANN. I understood that in the case of the bridge provided for in one of these bills certain people have obtained contracts for the steel to be used in the bridge, and the contract expires at the end of this week, and they will lose the benefit of that contract if the bill is delayed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold a moment?

Mr. MEEKER. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to modify my request, Mr. Speaker, and ask that to-morrow——

Mr. MANN. After the disposition of the food bill——

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; after the disposition of the privileged business to-morrow morning, the bridge bills be called from the desk and the privilege accorded to anybody to object to any particular bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia modifies his request again and asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the transaction of privileged business, the reading of the Journal, and so forth, and so on, including the disposition of the food bill, these bridge bills be called seriatim. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. ROGERS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of drafting aliens.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the draft of aliens. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the finishing of the food bill, the House may consider the bill H. R. 4954.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What is that?

Mr. RAKER. It is a bill providing a law for irrigation districts, so that the irrigation districts in the various States may be in a position to obtain money from farm-loan banks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. CHURCH, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. RAKER, was granted leave of absence for three weeks, on account of illness of his wife.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. TINKHAM, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Mrs. Agnes K. Hedman, Sixty-fourth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE ARKANSAS RIVER.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, one of the bridge bills which it was desired should be considered is one that I wish to explain, laying the conditions with respect to it before the House, and trusting that there will be no objection to its consideration. It is proposed to build a million-dollar bridge across the Arkansas River at Fort Smith. It is a public bridge. The option on the steel that goes into that steel and concrete bridge will expire on Saturday, as I understand, and unless the bill can be passed through this House and through the Senate by that time they will lose the difference between the option price under the contract which was entered into about 30 or 60 days ago and the present market price.

Mr. HAMILL. Has the bill passed the Senate?

Mr. WINGO. No; the bill has not passed the Senate. For that reason I am going to ask unanimous consent that we take it up at this time and pass it. It is the bill H. R. 5147.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Can the gentleman tell the House what is the difference between the option price and the present market price?

Mr. WINGO. Fifteen thousand dollars, if the price of steel does not go up any more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that we take up for consideration the bill H. R. 5147. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Reserving the right to object, I should like to complete my inquiry of the gentleman. Then, if this bill is not passed this week by Congress, the public, the county, and city interested in this bridge will lose at least $15,000?

Mr. WINGO. That is the information I have by wire from the chairman of the bridge commission, a public commission created by act of the legislature.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it not possible that by the end of the week the price of steel will have advanced?

Mr. WINGO. Sure.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. And is it not also possible that when the option is lost it will be impossible to get a contract of any kind?

Mr. WINGO. Aside from the loss of the $15,000, the possibility that they may not be able to get any contract at all is worrying the officials.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was the contract made?

Mr. WINGO. I do not know just when this option was taken. I have not the exact details with me, but the facts which I have stated have come to me from different sources, including a wire from the chairman of the bridge commission, stating that if they lose this option they will lose $15,000, based on the price of steel last week, and then, further, there is a very grave question whether they could get another option.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. When was the bill introduced?

Mr. WINGO. The bill was introduced last month—about 30 days ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, I see that this bill was introduced on the 22d of June, but was not reported until the 14th of July. That option was secured, of course, before the bill was introduced.

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If this was so urgent a matter, and they had aa option expiring within a few days from this date, why was not the thing pressed to a hearing before this? Why was not the House informed?

Mr. WINGO. I have made insistent and persistent efforts to have this bill reported and acted on. The delay has been caused by the agreement made at the first of the session that nothing but war measures be considered; but the emergency situation I present caused the bill to be reported, and I trust that the facts will so appeal to the sense of justice of Members that no objection will be offered to the present consideration of the bill. Of course under the rules of the House it can be considered only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. I can make a statement about that. The gentleman from Arkansas has been insistently appearing before the committee on this subject; but we reported a few bridge bills earlier in the session and received a severe castigation at the hands of the House for reporting any bills that were not war measures; so we told the gentleman from Arkansas that we could not report his bill until we had some intimation from the House that they were willing that such bills should be reported; and after we received information that the House was willing that such bills should be reported, we at once reported the gentleman's bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the Sebastian bridge district?

Mr. WINGO. It includes a portion of Sebastian County, in which is located the city of Fort Smith, a city of 30,000 people.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that the bill provides for the granting of consent to the bridge district or to its successors or assigns. Its assigns might include anybody. Is there any purpose to assign?

Mr. WINGO. No. This bridge project was by act of the legislature submitted to the people and approved 3 to 1 at the polls. It is a public commission, and the taxpayers of the district will pay for the erection of the bridge.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So this will be constructed under public control?

Mr. WINGO. Oh, yes; it is a community bridge.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Reserving the right to object, what is the necessity for the immediate passage of this bill?

Mr. WINGO. I explained that before the gentleman came in.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I was here, but I could not hear the gentleman's statement; there was so much noise around me.

Mr. WINGO. The option on their steel will expire Saturday night, and if the option expires they will lose $15,000, and in addition to that might not be able to get a new contract at all.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Saturday night of this week?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Has it occurred to the gentleman that inasmuch as there is serious discussion about fixing the price of steel, there might be a change downward in the price of steel?

Mr. WINGO. They can not get it for any lower price than the one for which they have the option. We do not think there will be any lower price possible.

Mr. SNYDER. That is a fair supposition.

Mr. WINGO. They might not get it at all.

Mr. SNYDER. The price of steel can not go much higher. There is only one way it can go and that is downward.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let the bill be reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill (H. R. 5147) granting the consent of Congress to the Sebastian bridge district to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River, at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, Ark., was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Sebastian bridge district, created by the Legislature of Arkansas, under the provisions of an act approved February 26, 1913, and amended by an act approved March 30, 1915, and its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Arkansas River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at the foot of Garrison Avenue, at Fort Smith, in the county of Sebastian, in the State of Arkansas, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, lines 5 to 8, inclusive, after the word "Arkansas," strike out the words "under the provisions of an act approved February 26, 1913, and amended by an act approved March 30, 1915, and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for half a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks for half a minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. I advise the authors of these bridge bills to go to the Senate and get them passed there to-day, which will give them a privileged status here to-morrow on the Speaker's table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to extend my remarks on the drafting of aliens.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the drafting of aliens. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if the remarks which he desires to extend include anything except his own remarks?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. I serve notice that I shall object to any further requests to extend remarks after this request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois serves notice that he will object to any more extensions of remarks. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]?

There was no objection.

FAMILY NEWS POSTAL CARDS.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Reserving the right to object, I desire to say that at the conclusion of the three minutes I shall move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I have received this morning a petition signed by several thousand citizens, residents of this country, of Hungarian birth and extraction, in the following language:

The Hon. F. H. LAGUARDIA,
The Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned appeals to you to have an exchange of personal family news, duly censored, arranged between people living in the United States and our motherland, Hungary.

Many among us have not heard from their closest relatives for nearly three years. Many among us don't know whether their relatives are living or dead. Shall parents or children, wife and husband, brother and sister be left entirely without news of one another for years?

The exchange could be arranged through a special office to be established in New York City for the censoring and rewriting of family messages, and for forwarding same United States embassy bags to our representatives in Switzerland, Sweden, and Holland for transmission through a neutral embassy to the embassies of Austria-Hungary. Our State Department could easily arrange for this humanitarian work. The expenses connected with it could be covered by imposing double or triple postal charges.

Our Government communicates with the central powers regarding many subjects through the medium of neutral countries. Why should not citizens receive censored family news?

Please cooperate in such ways as you can in this worthy work, and at least urge the State Department to help relieve thousands of anxious hearts.

I presume that similar petitions have been sent to the membership of this House. My purpose at this time is to explain the nature of this request. These petitions were collected by the Magyar-Amerikai Nepsava, a Hungarian paper published in my district. I want to make it clear that all these people are asking is a form of postal card which shall be drawn by the Government here just stating that "I am in good health; how are the folks at home?" and signed with the address; these postals to be sent through our embassy to Switzerland or one of the neutral countries, and from there forwarded to Hungary. I understand England has adopted a system of this kind so that the residents there can communicate with their families at home. It is simply a stereotype form that they ask the Government to supply as a means of communication. This could in no way work to the interest of the enemy. I ask the cooperation of the membership of this House in order to take the matter up with the proper departmental authorities. It is humane and charitable to establish some means of communication for these unhappy people.

I want to say in conclusion that I am somewhat familiar with local conditions and the situation in Hungary, for I served in the American Consular Service in that country for a period of over five years. I know that the sympathies of the true Hungarian people are entirely with our cause. They are a liberty-loving people with a glorious history. There is no people in this war that could do more to bring this conflict to an end than the Hungarian people. Their enemy is our enemy. It is advisable and prudent that we give them all the moral support we can, because if the Hungarian people know that they have the support of the American people they may soon repeat the efforts of 1848 and wrest themselves from the Hapsburg domination. I am sure the lesson of Kossuth, the great Hungarian liberator, is not forgotten. [Applause.]

I hope the gentlemen of the House will give this petition their serious consideration and cooperate in bringing about some safe method of communication. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CROSSER. Will not the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. RAINEY. I will withhold the motion.

Mr. CROSSER. I ask unanimous consent that after the business on the Speaker's table is disposed of to-morrow, together with the pure-food bill, it be in order to call up House joint resolution 116.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that to-morrow after the matters on the Speaker's table and the pure-food bill are disposed of he may have permission to call up House joint resolution 116. Is there objection?

Mr. MEEKER. I object.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to let me proceed for one minute.

Mr. RAINEY. I will withhold the motion for one minute.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I ask unanimous consent for one minute to have read a resolution passed unanimously by the Legislature of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 1. (By Mr. T. Sambola JONES.)

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the course of our Representatives in both Houses of Congress in firmly upholding and cordially supporting President Woodrow Wilson in all his proposals and purposes incident to our relation to the European war, and especially since German brutalities no longer permitted us to remain neutral, has the earnest commendation and approval of this general assembly.

Resolved further, That in the very delicate and perplexing times of stress and trouble, in our judgment, they measured fully up to the standard of faithful and patriotic Representatives of this Commonwealth.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions properly signed be forwarded to each of our Senators and Representatives.

HEWITT BONANCHAUD,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ARMAND MOUTON,
Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate.

Approved:

R. G. PLEASANT,
Governor of the State of Louisiana.
THOS. W. CAMPBELL,
Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withhold his motion for one minute.

Mr. RAINEY. I will withhold it for 30 seconds.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to add a word to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. LA GUARDIA] said of the people of Austrian extraction. We have in the community I represent about 10,000 of these people. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LA GUARDIA] has said, they are with us and not with Austria.

There is in Kansas City, Kans., a large community of Croatians and many Servians from Austria. They are making fine Americans, have good homes, good schools, and good business houses. They are making the same reasonable request the Hungarians make. Quite a number of them served with our Twentieth Kansas Regiment in the Philippines. One Magyar came home a lieutenant. I see several of their names drawn as soldiers at this time. It is unreasonable to prevent them from corresponding with their kinsfolk in Croatia, Herzegovina, and Bosnia. Such worthy people in such a trying situation deserve our kindliest consideration. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for his 30 seconds. I will remember and try to show him as much consideration some time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 24, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.
